Orthily might I bee condemned of arrogancie, (most Noble Lord & Lady) because, hauing past the Pikes in a peece of the selfe-same seruice (followed with fauour and kinde acceptation) I should therefore presume vpon
 the like succeffe: knowing the inconstant nature of Times, that as they alter, so do mens humours & dispositions with them.
 For, that which carrieth liking and allowance to day, falles into loathing and contempt tomorrow; Opinions being more varius in the case of Bookes, then are the Arguments whereon they discourse, because carping curiosity will haue his censure. But, as the Last for Hercules, was not fashioned to fit euerie foote, nor his Lyons skinne to be worne by any base Lout; euen so the sublimitie of true iudgement (in matters of such industrious and painfull labor) should be left to the Learned;

The Epistle Dedicatorie.

not to euery course and mechanike conceite, capeable of nothing, but of such occasions as are suteable to his owne condition.

I haue read of the great Riuer * Euphrates, which ebbeth and floweth seuen times a day, and with such violence; that it carrieth Ships vpon it with full sayle, directly against the winde. Seuen times in an houre ebbeth and floweth rath Opinion, in the torrent of indiscreet and troublefome apprehension: carrying Criticke calummie, and squint-eyed detraction, mainly against the winde of Wisedome and Iudgement; because their braines are no better ballast, nor their capacity of further reach or extendure.

And yet, if the saying of Hesiod be true; That nothing can bee more pleasing, then variety, which is the soules cheefest solace: Then (not fearing folly, but speaking to peerelesse Noble nature) giue mee leaue to tell you, that there can hardly bee any especiall subiect imagined, but one Argument or other heere meeteth with it. From Sacred Diuinity (the most solide and supream of all other) through all other Artes and Sciences whatsoever, euen to any lowly, and the meanest (worthy) profession; here is some notable marke or Monument thereof (if it be either Ancient or Moderne) stored vp in this Treasure, for future Ages to delight in, and to receiue no meane benefite thereby.

Then (Honourable Lord and Ladie) all these blessings beeing Yours (as also my selfe, in endlesse dutie and seruice) when any subiect of great, graue, and serious consideration (as of Nations, Monarchies, Kingdomes, and People, in their Originall, Rising or Declining, by Warres, Dissentions, Combuitions, or otherwise in the like occurrences) shall seeme troublesome or tedious to you: walke on but a little further, & then you may enter into a spacious Forrest, affording all choise of pleasing Game, either for Hawking, Hunting, Fishing, Fowling, or any other Noble exercise beside.

When those Forrest pleasures shall faint you (as all delights dull, by too much continuance) an Orchard standes wide open to welcome you, richly abounding in the fairest Frutages: not to feed the Eye onely, but likewise to refresh the Heart, inuiting you to plucke where, and while you please, and to bestow how, and when you list: because they are all yours, and whosoever else shall taste of them, do enioy such freedom but by your fauor.

There is one especiall recreation more (Gracious Madam) which remaineth soly to your selfe, and such as may enter by your admittance; in a goodly large Garden, abounding with all kind of the fairest Flowers, that open with the cheerefull mornings Sun, and shut againe at his sad departure, all sweet, and all soueraigne. And, because Ladies of elder times (as many haue had the like delight in our more Moderne daies) were singularly skilfull in Physick and Chirurgery: there is not a vacant place in the whole Garden, but it is fitly furnished shed euerie where; the verie common walkes (euen as if they were Bride-like strewed by hand) are covered with the choicest Simples, purest distillatorie Plants, and wholesome Herbes of euerie Vertue: for which, the Garden was purposely founded, and not for fruitlesse idle vanity.

And were you all alone, without companie, and by your selfe, yet can you not so continue there: For, you may meete with a faire Beuey of Queenes and Ladies, at diuers turnings as you walke, and euerie one will tell you the Historie of her life and fortune (rare examples of Vertue and Honor) as themselves can best, truly & plainly discourse vnto you. Some other also you shall see, sadly sitting vnder Eughe & Cipresse trees, with Garlands of those leaues wreathed about their heads, sighing out their diuers disasters: whom your Noble nature cannot choose but commiserate; as greeuing to see a scratch in a cleare skin, and a bodie beautified by Nature, to be blemished by vnkinde Destiny.

From manie remote Kingdomes and Countries (where naturally they spake those seuerall Languages) are all these variable pleasures come hither, onely to kisse your Noble hands. It was no mean infelicitee for them, to find no fitter a Tutor, that might haue taught them to speake more eloquent English; which (indeede) also was my fault, seeing none else would tie themselves to so hard a Taske. But howsoever it may prouoe, your rich iudgements, and all-sufficient ability in the Languages, as also my weakenesse, will (I hope) bury all defects in your fauor, & beare out from scandall my willing endeouour, that I may finish the other (yet remaining) eleuen Bookes behinde, to perfect so rich and rare a Treasure.

The Printer to the Reader.

SOME few yeares past, I intended the whole Worke of Pedro Mexia, with some other Authours on the like Arguments of variety. I then published nine Bookes, with intention to haue made them vp fifteen, for the first Volume: but being preuented by sicknesse, I finished but the first nine Bookes; and finding the good acceptance of them, I haue aduentured now on ten Bookes more, of the like Ancient and Moderne Times: sauing only some particular Heads but lightly touched, are now (by the same Authors) more at large illustrated. And may this finde equall fauour vnto the former (without any harsh censure, or vnkinde discouragement:) the other eleuen Bookes shall follow with all conuenient speede, to finish vp so faire a Treasury.

Farewell.

THE TREASVRIE of Ancient and Moderne TIMES.

THE FIRST BOOKE.

Of the ancient Countrey of Gaule, now called France; what Lawes, Customs, Ceremonies, and other manners were used among the people of that Nation in their first Original: and how (since then) they have continued.

An Introduction to the whole Discourse.

IN ancient times, the Countrey of Gaule was enclosed within the limits of the Rhein, of the Alpes, of the Mediterranean sea, of the Pyrenean Mountains, and of the Ocean sea. But after that the Gaules had passed the Alpes; all the Countrey which was from the Mountains, so farre as the river * Rubicon, along by the coast of the Apennines, and so vp into the high Sea (which at this day is called the Gulfe of Venice) took the name of Gaule: as Galatia did the like, after that wee had subdued some people of Asia. That Gaule then which is in Europe, being halfe parted by the Alpes, is diuided into two parts; the one on the higher side of the Mountaines, and the other beyond. That which is on the further side, yet concerning vs, w^s called by the Romanes * Togata: as Romane, in regard of the habit of the Romanes, being commonly called a Gowne, and which they then did vsually weare. That on the hither side, was (by themselves) named properly Braccata (by a certain fashion of garment then worne by them, termed Beeches) and partly * Comata, in regard that the haire on their heads was verie bushy. Braccata in the time of Julius Caesar, had his extendure from the Alpes, so farre as Rhone or * Rhodanus bending towards the Pyrenean Mountaines, where were comprized the Volca, Armoricanes, Rhutheni or Rhynteni, and Heluctians, as it is to be seen in the seuenth Book of Cæsars Commentaries. This country was one while called Prouence, and then againe Narbonne, after the name of Narbon, then the chiefe and capitall Citie of the country. In Comata dwelt the Aquitans, which are they of Cuene, even from the Pyrenean Mountaines, so farre as the river * Garon: on the hither side whereof are the Celts, inhabiting so farre as the Rivers of Sena and Marna. All the rest of the country extending toward the North, is possessed by the Belgians.

Now the search would bee very great, and hard to be performed by any m^a, that would (with a certaine history of all the times) set downe the fashions, manners, and customes which the ancient Gaules had held and observed, vntill the daies of Iulius Caesar and their nouell qualities from those dayes to ours. But such as can content themselves with that diligence, which generally may be deliuered by the proofes of good and sufficient Authours, worthy of faith and sound credit; perhaps shall finde their expectation well fitted, both with honest pleasure and profite in their reading. And with this intention am I determined to make (namely) a collection out of many writers, that haue carefully employed their penes, concerning the manners and behaviour of the Gaules, according as matters might be remembered, in such diversity of distant places. And first, we will select out the most Ancient: first, ward (since can bring our purpose to full effect, and as our endeavour shall nothing be wanting) we will as diligently seeke for the more customes.

Caesar hath comprehended a certaine forme and semblance of Gaul in her ancient dayes; especially in the first booke of his Commentaries, of the warre in Gaul: albeith he hath sown many other things throughout his Bookes: which I haueing collected here and there, and from infinite places in other Authours, so that the whole may serue to encrease and fully illustrate the course of our purpose; wee may the more reasonably accomplish that which shall serue to make knowne our full aime and scope. Neuerthelesse, I am not to learne, that the Greekes which haue followed Caesar, were it that they understood not the Latine tongue, or were it through carelesnesse and negligence; haue declared in many places, that they scarcely vnderstoode the matters contained in his Commentaries. Wherefore we will first of all imitate Caesar, as the most great and singular Author and master of our history: and then pursue others, according as they haue borrowed any thing of him, or as they serue to make the whole subiect vnderstood.

But in regard that the principall parts of Great Britaine, as also of Germany, haue bene seized by the Gaules, as that appear in due time and place; and forasmuch as there hath bene great resemblance of the Britaines and Germanes with the Gaules, as will bee declared by that which Caesar hath written; I imagined with my selfe, that it would very conueniently suite with our purpose, to compare such fashions as carried any coherence in these Nations. Considering that Caesar thought it fit, to compare the customes of Gaul, with them of Germany. And Strabo, perceiving the Germanes to be called to by the Romanes, as true brethren to the Gaules, by resemblance of their manner of liuing, when he wrote the fashions and customes of the ancient Gaules, he reproued them, and began with the Germanes. But although that Tacitus hath sayd, That they were named Germanes, by an appellation proper to their Nation, and such as they pleased to stile themselves; yet notwithstanding, howeouer at first they receiued that name, there may be discerned, in the great Germany, or (for our better vnderstanding) a Fraternity, both in behaviour and customes, answerable one vnto another.

For our better beginning then, we will conclude on certaine kindes of manners, to the end, that each thing may be carried as may be most conuenient. Plato sayeth, There are three principall parts in the body of Man, wherein are lodged the three principall powers of the soule; Concupiscence in the Liuer, Anger in the Heart, and Reason in the Head, as in a Citadell. In like manner, there are three severall kindes of vertues that do command & gouerne them: Sobriety or Temperance, ouerway Concupiscence in the Liuer; Courage, against Anger in the Heart; and Wisdome, in thinking and iudging with Reason. The common consent & agreement of all which, is the faithfull dutie of each one, euen as it were with diuers voices, & worthily may be called Iustice. Caesar and Diodorus, Titus Livius, Strabo, and others, who are as interpreters of Caesar, do declare many things of the Gaules; & if I would haue set down at large in my Discourse, according as they are written by them: I should rehearse one and the same matter too many times. Wherefore I will rather imitate their intention in each place, then bee constrained to alledge their multiplicity of words.

CHAP.

CHAP. I.

Of the Temperance in eating and drinking used among the Gaules: as also of their Marriages and single condition of life.

Enter then on the behalfe of Temperance, wee might speake of their abstinence in eating and drinking, reſort to women, their manner of speech, their modesty in Garments and lodging; their sportes, delights and alſiſtance, which they afford to one another in ſuch things as they haue. Concerning the eating and drinking of the ancient Gaules, the Plurid for the moſt part (according to Diodorus and Strabo) on white meats, and diuers kindes of fleſh, & principally on Porke freſh and ſalted. They vſed to haue ſtanding by their fires, pottes full of boyled fleſh, and ſpits well loaden with roaſted fleſh; the better part whereof they would giue to men of worth, to doe them honor: as Homer writes, That the Grecian Captains did to Aux, when he had won the victory againſt Hector body to body. Caesar granteth the ſiſſe-fame manner of life to the Britaines, and to the Germanes. The Britaines (ſaith he) which dwell furtheſt vp into the Countrey, the moſt part of them do not ſowe any corne but liue onely vpon milke and fleſh. Neuertheleſſe, they hold in deteſtation (by what religious opinion I know not) to taſte of an Hare, of an Hen or Chicken, and of a Goole. Hee ſaith alſo the very ſame in his ſeuenth booke, ſpeaking of the Germanes; That they do not addit them ſelues to any kinde of labour, and that their very greateſt nourishment is vpon white meats, cheefe and fleſh. But Tacitus hath written much more amply concerning the manner of life amongſt the Germanes. Each mother (ſaith hee) doth nurſe her child with her owne beſt, and neuer truſteth it in the hands of their ſeruants, or other Nurſes. Thou canſt not know the Maſter from the Varlet, by any kinde of more delicate feeding. They liue nakedly and ſlovenly, euen amongſt their Heards or droues of Cattle; & lying vpon the ground, vntill ſuch time as age doth ſet apart ſuch as are Matters, & vertue doeth enouch and make them to bee knowne. Their viands are ſimply dreſſed or prepared, being of wilde fruits, ſometimes of freſh Veniſon, or curded milke, without any dainty cooking or dreſſing. So much for their manner of eating.

As for their drinke, that amongſt the Gaules, and termed Zythum: This (ſaith Diodorus) was made of barley and water, haueing paſſed thorow diuers honycombs. Tacitus writeth almoſt the very ſame of the Germanes. They make a drinke (ſaith he) of water, mingled both with barley & wheate, diſguiſed into ſome reſemblance of wine. They which dwell on the Sea-coaſts, do buy wine. The moſt part of the Gaules (as Diodorus & Strabo doe both write) vſed to ſitte on the ground and to eate their food, ſitting on the ſkinnes of Dogges or of volutes: being ſerued with earthen veſſelles, which were ſtrong and muſſue, and wrought about with branches of flowers; and they were alwayes attended and ſerued by their young children. In like manner Tacitus recordeth, That the Germans ſo ſoone as they were awake and riſen (which they vſed not to do till it was day) they laued and waſhed themſelues, with warme water, becauſe winter continued in their region for the moſt part of the yeare; and at coming forth of the bathe, they went vnto their fooode, each one haueing his table and ſeat alone by himſelfe. Thus then was their ancient and rude ſimplicity, which cauſed the Germanes to be ſo big membered and corpulent, wherewith Tacitus ſeemeth to maruell greatly. And thence likewiſe enſued the ſiſſe-fame greatneſſe of bodye which was among the Gaules, who for their huge corpulency, and regarding onely their owne bigneſſe of ſtature, held the ſmaller conſtitution of the Romanes in contempt, as may be ſcene in the 2. booke of the wars in Gaul.

But Plato reprehendeth the Gaules for their intemperance and drunkenneſſe with wine; and Diodorus writeth the very ſame. They affected vnto exceſſively, that when the Merchants brought it to them, they dranke it wholly new as it was; and then becomming drunk, by haueing taken ouermuch, they lay downe to ſleepe, or behaued themſelues like mad men. And this was the reaſon that many of the Italian

lian Merchants for the gaine which they got both by sea and land; brought wine in great plenty thither, and for a small vessel of wine, receiued (in exchange) foure times the value. And the same Authour not onely blameth their drunkenness, but also the quarrells which accompanied this excess. They obserued (saith he) as a custome, at their feeding, for the least debate of words, to rise presently from the Table, and defie one another to the combat, hazarding their liues without any discretion. Thus you see how the Greeks haue reprooued the ancient Gaules; and Tacitus calleth the Germanes their Brethren in the same vice, accusing them equally to bee drunkards and quarrellers. They vsed not (saith he) any such temperance against thirst. For they held it no dishonor, to spend the whole day and night in drinking, so they might bee suffered to drinke their fill. furnishing them with so much as they would haue: you shold find them no lesse easie to bee conquered by their vices, then by armes. The quarrells which rose very often among them, as among people subiect to Wine, was no sooner mingled with injuries of the mouth; but (for the most part) did end with blowes by the sword, to the expence of their blood, yea of their liues. Such was the blame which the Germanes receiued by making no more account of so bad a custome; euen as if this vice had bene no vice among them, or did any way shame them.

An Order amongst the Gaules against this badde cus-
tome.

But the Gaules vsed themselves in better manner: for by a publicke ordinance this vice behaviour (in particular persons) was verie greuously and rigorously punished. Let vs heare then from Caesar the cause of the magnanimity of the Gaules; which was, by knowing how to keep themselves from this disorderly kinde of life. The most magnanimous of all (saith he in his first Booke, speaking of the Belgians, Celts, and Aquitanes) are the Belgians, because they are furthest off in the country, which is carefully husbanded, and strangers doe but seldome trafficke with them, to bring them that which serueth to no other end but to effeminate their courages.

Most valiant & fierce people about 700
y.

In the same book speaking of the Neruians, as of the most courageous of all the Belgians, he saith; Caesar making enquiry of them, what might be their naturall disposition and manners, hee found, That Merchants did not trafficke with them, & that they would not suffer (by any means) that wine should be brought among them, or any thing that serueth for delicacy. For they held (as an infallible opinion) that such things were the cause of abasing their courage, & that their native vertue would thereby be much weakened. Whereby we may perceiue, that the intemperance of some particular men, was condemned by a generall and publicke decree; and that sobriety & temperate carriage was greatly respected and honored in those parts. Strabo sayeth, That by the perswasion of Cennus, a graue and wise man, the Getes rent and pluckt vp all the Vines in their country, yet vsed some wine in the time of their childrens nursing. But our Ancestors did much better, because they would neuer permit or suffer, that any Vine should be planted among them, or wine to be brought them from any other place. Wherefore Diodorus had good reason to say, that in his time there came no wine at all into Gaulle Comata.

Caesar in his fourth Booke, maketh the Suenes, a people of Germany, equal in temperance to the Neruians that were in Gaulle. For they would not suffer that any wine should be brought into their countrey, because they were perswaded, that it made men lazie, effeminate, and vnapt to endure any labor. Thus we may obserue then, what was their sobriety in eating and drinking, wherein their greater part of vertue is commended; for abstinence from lewd and wanton women. And albeit that Diodorus, Strabo, & Barde- sanes, according as Eusebius reporteth; being all of them Grecian Authors, haue reproued this vice as frequent and common among the Gaules, and which is as innated (if credite may be giuen to Aristotle) in warlike actions; whereby the fable was fained, of conioyning Venus with God Mars: yet notwithstanding, Caesar speaketh nothing thereof, but giueth great commendation to the Germanes for their temperance, contrary to them that haue written otherwise of them.

Such as haue continued in virgin estate the longest while among them, and without the knowledge of any other but their owne body, receiued the very greatest respect and praise. For they held it as a most villanous thing to haue knowledge of a woman, before the age of twenty yeeres. In all which time they did not hide themselves, but bathed daily together in the ri- uers. And this is the reason rendered by Herodotus, speaking of the nature of children, wherefore haire commeth much sooner to some then it doth to others: be- cause the use of Venus maketh the flesh more loose and flabby, and openeth the skinn, which affordeth the easier passage to the haire; contrarywise, such Children as are gelded, haue neuer any haire at all. Tacitus hath not omitted the selfesame at- tribution of praise to the Germanes. Young men are long time before they haue any knowledge of women: and that is an especial reason why they lose no part of their youthfull strength, and therefore make no hast at all of parting with their virgin condition. Young Laddes, and such (of like stature) as are gelded, do make triall of their agility together, and their children do (commonly) partake of their Parents strength.

Marriages do appertaine to the rule of the same vertue: but Caesar hath not written carefully how the Gaules obserued it. The husband (saith hee) laide downe the valew of so much goodes, as his wife brought with her, and a iust account being taken thereof, the whole stocke was put together. The party that furnished, enioyed the others portion, with the reuenues of all that had past. The husbands are masters and commanders of their wiues liues, and also of their Childrens. When any Father of a Family (of note) dyeth, the nearest of the kindred do assemble together, and if any suspicion be conceyued concerning his death: the Wife is committed to tortures, as they doe their slaues, and if she prouoe to be conuinc'd; after they haue tormented her with fire, and all other kinds of paines, they put her to death. This law may seeme hard, that giueth the husband such like power over the wife and children, as he hath over his slaues. For, according as the Philosophers haue taught vs: the father of the family giueth command to his wife & children, as vnto free persons. Yet this is not all as one kinde of command: for hee giueth command to his wife as to one of the same Commonwealth, & to his children as a King. The Law truly may appeare to be hard, and yet it is Roman, euen the like as Romans made, Ordayning; That the sonne should bee in his fathers power all his life; and that the father may chastise, beate, put him to any business in the field, sell, or kill him. The same King also appointed, That a man might punish his wife, if she had drunke any wine. Caesar speaketh all this in his first booke: and in his fit hee declareth diuers other fashions of behaviour in marriages, speaking of the Brittaines.

Ten or twelue together (saith he) do hold their wiues in common, and principally brethren with their brethren, and fathers with their daughters. Any such as are born of them, are auouched for children of them that haue espoused their mothers, being yet maids. So much also he relateth of the English. But Tacitus writing of the Germanes, giueth them most noble commendation in this point. The wife (saith hee) neuer offereth anie dowry to the husband, but the husband to the wife. The parents, cousins, & kindred are present therat, and allow of all presents passing between them. And they are no presents deuised for delicacie or delight of women, nor to repaire a new intended marriage: but they are a gift of Oxen yoked, a horse bridled and furnished, & a Buckler or Target, with a sword and Iaueline. For these presents the husband taketh his wife; who likewise (on her owne behalfe) presenteth him with some weapons of warre. This is the great marriage bond, these are accounted sacred mysteries, & these are the coniugall gods that they hold in reuerence.

And to the end that the wife may not thinke her selfe exempted from vtterous desseignes, nor the hazards of warre: from the very beginning of her marriage she is continually aduertised, that she is thus receiued and taken to be her husbands companion in all paines and dangers, and that (be it either peace or warre) she must of necessity runne the same fortune. And these are plainly signified vnto her by the coupled Oxen, the furnished horse, and warlike weapons. She receiueeth what she is to bestow on her children after that she hath worthily and holily nursed them vp: & such as are of most forward disposition the Father hath care of, that they may re-

husbands for adultery

There are very few adulteries committed in so great a Nation; for the punishment thereof is very speedy, and the husband may lawfully do it. After hee hath shaven and stript her naked, the husband bringeth her forth of his house, in the presence of all his and her neerest Kindred,
and beatech her with a bastinado thorow
all the streets; for there is no allowance of any pardon after that a wife hath blemished her honor; and neither her beauty, youth, or riches can afterward winne her another husband. Vices ferue not there to be laughed and jested at: & one may well say, That (there) is such a world,
as neither permiteth the doing or induring of any dissoluteness. Those Commonweales are the best ordered, wherein is such permission, that the Maides only finde themselves husbands, and marriage consisteth in mutuall accord (for a long while) in good hope, and that the Bride may have her hearts desire. For in this case the taked her husband as one &
the selfsame body, and one life is allowed by them both: because they can have no contrary thoughts; neither they desires any way wandering, but their affections doe so sympathize, as not in either to husband or wife, but to the sanctity of marriage. It is helde as a very great offence, to procure the death of any of their children, or of their kindred: And there good customes do beare more sway, then good Lawes and Ordinances doe elsewhere. Hitherto haue wee continued the Diodorus reprehendeth the Gaules for a certain kinde of disordered behaviour

in their speaking, saying: They vse a short kinde of speech, somewhat hard to be vn-derstood, and without any deliberation;
speaking great store of doubtfull things,
yet deliuering many bragging and van-taging words; much to commend themselves and in the contempt of others. They are threatners and bad speakers, and full of ouerweening. This vanity of theirs hath likewise beene reprooued by Strabo in lib.

5. And Cæsar speaketh thereof in his fourteenth Booke, and is also to be proued by diuers examples in his other bookes. Such is that whereof hee speaketh in his first booke, of Dumetius the Heluetian, who highly extolled and vaunted the vertue of the Heluetians, and reproached the dif-
comfiture of the Romanes, admonishing Cæsar by menaces to beware of any further attempting; for feare, least the place where the Romanes miscarried, by a further losse of their people, after the spoiling
of their whole Army, should take name thereby, and so remaine as a memorie of their disgrace.

Such also was Arminius, King of the Germanes, who answering little or nothing to matters which Cæsar demanded of him;
spake wonders of his owne valour,
and that he neuer buckled with any man,
but he was ruined. And Cæsar might comto fight whensoever he pleased, but he should learne of the Germanes, that they were a people neuer vanquished, and skilfull enough in actions of armes. Tertullian also wanted in his oration, that hee would make a League with all the Gaules, and then all the world durst not make head against them. This is sufficient concerning this matter; I come now to speake of the care which they had of their owne persons.

thicke and hard, that little difference ap-peareth betwene theirs and the haire of a horte. Tacitus speaketh (wel-neede) the fame of the Sæuæ, a people of Germany.
But the especiall note of that Nation is,
that they turne their haire crosse or ouerthwart, and then binde or tuffe it vp in a knot. In this manner are the Sæuæ known among all the other Germanes, and free-men of the Countrey from slaues.
Some of the Sæuæ do wear their hayre
long, and bristling backward with a bending downe, and so they go till they bee hoary or white; and then (oftentimes) they binde it together on the crowne of the head. The Lords are no more respectue of their own persons, and yet without any proud or bad intention: For it is not done in regard that they affect or couet to be affected, but they doe onely fodecke themselves, to appeare the more fierce and terrible vnto their enemies,
when occasion calleth them forth to warre.

Diodorus proceedeth on in this maner,
concerning the behaviour of the Gaules.
Some of them (saith he) doe vse to shau their beards, but others do wear them of some length. The Gentlemen do cutte short the haire on their cheekes, & suffer
their beards to grow to such length, as it will couer all their bodie. They wear also a kinde of garment, which is all hairie,
to seeme the more dreadful and terrible,
consisting of diuers colours, and teamed
by them Braccates. They haue long skirted iackets or Cassockes, rewed or streaked, beeing of the very courest Cloath, which they vse for winter, and the most simple or slenderest for summer. Diodorus
speaketh thus of the Braccates, as the reason whereby the Romanes called that part of Gaule Braccata, and by which garment
the same Authour affirmeth, That the Gaules were more terrible to beholde.

Strabo likewise writeth in his fourth book
concerning their haire, their Cassockes, their rude and hairy garments, their long
high breeches, & their short open cloaks which hardly couered halfe theyr Buttocks. As these Authours do agree together, touching the haire of the Gaules and Germanes, and to be of a redde colour, according as Titus Livius, and Dio-dorus haue written. Cæsar speaking of the of ancient Britany, writeth thus. They do all paint themselves with an herb, called by them Gastum, which causeth a blewish or azure colour: and this made them very dreadfull to looke on, when they went to any fight. Moreouer, they wore their locks of haire very long; shauing off all their other haire except that on the head,

and on the vpper lip.

Diodorus pursuing his purpose concerning the Gaules, figureth them forth (as it were with golde) in this manner. The whole Countrey of Gaule is without the mettall called Siluer: but nature hath gi-uen it gold, without any labor or cunning endeavour. For, in regard that the most part of the riuers haue their courses verie troublesome, vneacie in pasing, & wheeling or circling in wide compasse: the waters which descend from the hilles and mountaines, by dispersing themselves abroad in the valles, do scatter a sand on the fields, which is mingled with golde.

Afterwardes, kneading or tweaking the clods together, wherein they discerne the golde to shine, and permitting them to become hard: they then breake them in peeces, and when they haue washed it in water, and the earth is quite taken away,
they hurle the rest into a furnace, and so melt it in that manner. When they haue thus moulten and drawne out the golde
pure and cleane, the women and men do adorn themselves therewith: for they wear it in rings on their fingers, and in bracelets about their armes, and in Car-canets on their breasts, & in chaines about their neckes, and about their middles as golden girdles. Polybius also maketh mention in his second booke, of their Chaines and Bracelets. And Strabo in his 4. booke speaketh of their Mines of golde, whereof
the cheefest are in the Countrey of Tarbellors; and hee attributeth this Ornament
only vnto such as were in honor and dignities.

But Cæsar and Tacitus do speake of another manner of want or poeerty (of this magnificence) amongst the Germanes.
They vse (saith Cæsar) skinner in their garments, and short cloakes made of fur-red skins, hauing the greater part of their body naked. But Tacitus speaketh more amply, concerning the whole manner of the Germanes, writing thus. I doubt whether the gods were fauourable to them or quite contrary; because they denied them-

the mettals of gold and silver. Notwithstanding, I will not set it downe assuredly, but that there may bee some veine of gold or silver in Germany: yet who (at any time) hath made search for it? They have no such affection thereto, as to apply it to any seruise. Some vessels of silver have bene found amongst them (which have bene giuen to their Ambassadors, or to their Princes) and yet to be held in no more esteeme or reckoning, then those that are made of earth. Neuertheles, they that dwell much neerer to vs, in regard
that they haue trafficked with our people:
do make more esteeme of gold and siluer, allowing and commending some peeeces of our monies. They that liue further off in the Countrey, doe deale more simply, and (according to the most ancient manner) make their traffike by exchange. They receive the old money, and such as they haue had longest knowledge of, as the Serrati and Bigati. They loue
the coin of silver better then that of gold;
not that they beare therto any particular affection, but because the silver money is easier for them in buying things common, and of smallest price. The viall habit or garment to them all, is a long skirted iacket or Calfocke which they fasten together with a buckle, but (for want therof) with a great pin. The rest of the body is not covered with any thing, and they sit the most part of the day upon the hearth, somewhat neerer to the fire. Such as are of greatest wealth, doe differ from the other in their garments, which are not so ample or large as those of the Sarma-tes, or of the Parthians: but iustly fitted to the body, and such as maketh apparant shew of euery member. They wear the skins of wild beasts, and such as dwell neerer
to the riuers, are most curious of their habit: but they of more remote abiding, vse
no great curiosity, as being least carefull
what they weare, because they liue so far from strangers. When they haue made choise of their beasts skines, they do the like of fishes, taking such as are the great-test, or as the Ocean and most vnknowne Seas do yeeld, and fullest of spots, and so they fowe them together. The Women are no otherwise habited then the men:
but that the women are oftner covered with a garment of linnen, inter-woven with a scarlet colour. They care for no

sleeues on the height of their armes, but are naked downe from the very shoulders
and part of the breast (nereest adioyning) is as nakedly discovered. Thus you see the gayest brauery of the Gaules; & how simple the Germans are in their garments: it remaineth now that we say somewhat of their houses and dwellings.

CHAP. III.

Of the houses and dwellings of the Gaules;
their Townes and villages, and of what manner they were.

The habitations of the Gaules
(according as Strabo sayth)
are wide and spacious, made of earth and planchers of wood, & couered with strong reeds arched on the top together in form of a vault: for so Cæsar in the first booke of the Gaules warres saith. That the Lodgings of Q. Cicero in the fields, were cou-ered with straw and reeds, according to the manner of the Gaules. And in his sixth booke he sheweth, that the more part of the Manner houses appertaining to the gentlemen Gaules, were in the woods, or on the riuers. Speaking of the house of Ambiorix, which was altogether enight with woods, as were wel nere all (sayth he)
the houses of the Gaules are, who to sun the heate, do dwell in woods, and neere to riuers.
Cæsar deliuereth plainly, that the Aquitaines, Celts and first Belgians, had their Cities and Townes enclosed both with walles and ditches: but it may be doubted whether the like prouision was vsed among the Gaules further off, and such as were neerer to the North; as the Morini, Adumates, Menapians, and Belgones.

Cæsar declareth, That the most part of these Belgians, are descended of the Germans, and saith, that the Germans had not their Townes and Villages made after our manner: as may bee obserued by that which Tacitus hath written according to the custome which they had in his time. It is sufficiently known (sayth he) that the German people dwell nor in any Towne.

Townes, neither that they could endure
to haue their houses neere vnto one another. They dwell distant or apart, scatter-ingly, where either riuers, fieldes, or woods do best content them. Their Villages are not after our fashion: for their houses do not touch or ioyne neere each other. Euery one leaueth a great wide distance or compasse about his dwelling;
either to auoid the disastrous fortunes of fire, or else because they know not how to build better. They vse neither Morter nor Tiles: but the matter which doeth them seruise, is very rude, and is not prepared either for beauty or pleasure. They plaister some places much more respectiuely, with a kinde of earth so cleane & shining,
as it seemeth to contend with painting, & portraictures of colours. They were wont to make causes vnder the ground, and co-uered them with thicke clods of dung, to withdraw themselves thither in the winter time, and therein also to hide their Corne, because in such places, the colde weather had not so great power, & when the enemy came, hee could make pillage of nothing, but what hee found readily discovered. As for that which was thus hidden or buried, Theeues not knowing thereof, would bestow the lesse paines &
search, in further enquiry after it. Cæsar
speareth (almost) as much of the Britains.
They rearm'd it a Towne (saith he) when they had enclosed some tuffie wood with ditches and pales; whereinto they were wont to retire themselves, to shunne the courses of their enemies. And whereas Cæsar speareth sometimes of certaine Townes of the Suenes: in mine opinion,
hee is so to be vnderstood.

Returpe we now to the townes of the Belgians, which are vp higher in the co-stie, and heere my question is: Whether they had any such Townes as the Britains or no? We will first of all speake of the Morini, who (according as Cæsar writeth)
beganne to make war, but in a quite contrary manner then the other Gaules. For they hauing heard, that the very greatest Nations which had hazarded battel, were quite defeated and conquered: withdrew themselves & their goods into the strongest places, which were great and long forrests, encompassed with fenny or mar-thy grounds. Cæsar being come vnto the entrance of some such forrest, and hauing concluded there to tortoise his campe: as the Menapians were seriously employed about their busines; the enemy (of whom they had no doubt at all) sallied forth vp-on them vnprovided, at most places of the wood, and charged the Romans very sharply. Heereupon, they betooke them to their Armes, and repulsed them backe into the wood, and hauing slaine a great number of them, pursued them thorough many vnease places, yet with very little losse of their people. The next day following, Cæsar determined to fell down the Forrest, and suspecting least some harme might be done by the Flankers to Soldiers warned: he cauted all the trees which were heuue downe, to be made as rampiers against the enemy, and to serue as defences on either side.

Hauing made a great spacious coun-treij (in few dayes) by incredible diligence, after that the Romans had made themselves Maisters of the cattle & baggage which was in the reteward; they withdrew themselves into the thickest of the Forrest. Cæsar speareth this of the wood of the Morini, which serued them as a Towne or Village. And the yeare after, in regard of the drought which had dried vp all the Marishes (as it was to be seene in his fourth booke) they hauing no more refuges to flye vnto as they had the yeare
before, were (almost all of them) subdued
by Labienus. In these two warres, hee maketh no mention of any other Townes,
then of woods and marishes.

The like is affirmed of the Menapians,
in those Countreies where the Romaine Legions were brought, vnder the conduct of Fabius and Cotta, as it is set downe also in his fourth booke. They made spoyle in the fields, destroyed the Corne, set the houses on fire; and all this happened, because the Menapians had hid themselves in the thickest Forrests. Afterward Cæsar himselfe came to them with five legions.
But they (as Cæsar saith) not hauing gathered any forces together, trusting only in the security of the place, withdrew themselves into the woods and marishes,
and carried thither their goods also. Cæsar
hauing diuided his powers with C. Fabius, who was his Lieutenant, and M. Crassus Treasurer of his wars, and hauing also foadainely provided bridges for passage, gaue them assault three several wayes.

ways, and burning their houses and villages, made himself Master of a great number of men and cattle. The Menapians seeing themselves in this distress were constrained to send Ambassadors, humbly to entreat peace. In this place also there is no name of any village, or pregnant appearance that there were any, but such as we have already spoken of.

1st. Caesar in Com. Lib. 2.

By due observation of this discourse, perhaps the villages of the Neruians will appear to be even the like. The Neruians (this speaketh Caesar in his second booke) from all antiquity, not having any power of horsemen (for even to this day they do not add to their minds thereto, but all the strength which they have, consisteth only in footmen) to the end they may impeach and withstand the horsemen of their neighbours, if they make any inroad upon them, to rob and spoil them, cutting downe young trees that had shot forth strong branches, they twined them together, and interweaving briars and thorns among them, they wrought them so artificially, that these hedges or fences served them as a wall; wherein not only a man could not enter, but also he was unable to see or discern any thing.

The Neruians had no walled townes or villages of distance.

In the same warre of the Neruians, the women, & such as (in regard of their age) were not serviceable for bearing armes, had never any Village or Town for their safety, which was engirt with wals; but in such a place where there was no coming or entrance for an Army, because of the marshy grounds, which were the only hinderance.

1st. Caesar in Com. Lib. 6.

The 2. war of Caesar against the Neruians.

Now, in this first warre against the Neruians, we may plainly perceive that they had not any Towne enclosed with wals: and we may well credit it by that which is in the sixth booke. For Caesar having assembled foure Legions with all possible diligence, entered (in wares) into the Country of the Neruians, and before they could either draw their strength together, or tell how to save themselves: after hee had surprized a great number of men, and herds of Cattle, and dispersed the booty to his Soldiers; he layde waste their fields, and compelled them to yeeld and deliver him hostages. This passage likewise of the Neruians, yeeldeth great coniecture, that they had no other towns or villages in those times, but like them of the Britaines.

It may appear also, that the Adriatices (by that which Caesar writeth in his second booke) have had the like townes. Having forsaken (saith he) all their townes and Castles, they brought all their goods into a village, which was wonderfully strong by natural situation. For, having (on all sides about it) huge rocks & down-falles of exceeding height, it had but one onely comming to it, which was hanging or descending downward, yet in a swift and gentle manner, being in breadth no more than two hundred foote. This way or passage they had fortified with a double wall, of very great height, & the same was strengthened in many places with mighty huge stones, and sharpe-pointed beames or pyles. Heere Caesar describeth nothing but a wall onely, and on one side of the Towne. And the like may be easily proved in the Nation of the Eburones: who are also called Germanes by Caesar in his second booke. These men, under the conduct of King Ambiorix, had overcome Sabinus and Cotta, with fiftene Companies, neere to Alisquas, as it is set downe in the fifth booke. Caesar who had never received a greater iniurie, determined to be reuenged for this losse, and vnto to abolish and ruinate the nation of the Eburones, as we may reade in the 6. booke. Therefore he sent Basilius on before with the whole band of horse, and leaving a legion for guard of the baggage, he divided the other nine into three Regiments, to overtake and make spoile of the whole Country. He caused Labienus to march with three Legions along by the Ocean, toward that part which joyneth vnto the Menapians. He sent Trebianus with the same number of Legions, to sacke that Country which was neere to the Adriatices. Himselfe, accompanied with the three other Legions, stayed to go toward the river Sabis, and the vnto the parts of the Forrest of Ardene.

The Eburones not having any certaine Army, neither garrison, or any Towne wherein they might defend themselves by Armes, and the whole popularity being scattered every where abroad, retired themselves to such places as were obscure valleys, or wilde and savage, or where the moorish Fennes made a troublesome access to them; that presented them with some imaginary hope, that thus they might defend and save themselves. Caesar in this fiery heat of reuenge, perceiving the great danger which might ensue, by having thus separated his Legions; called all the neere-neighbouring Cities (in hope of booty) to come and make pillage of the Eburones, to the end, that the race and name of them might be utterly confounded. And because he could not (as yet) appease his thirsting soule by such spoile as he had made, which indeed was very great, he put himselfe once more on his way, to give further vexation to his enemies, assembling in faine troopes of people from all the Townes & neere adjoining parts, and so sent them outward by sundry wayes. They burned all the villages, and every house that they could finde standing. The selfe desire of vengeance (as is to be seen in his eighth booke) enflamed him the third time, and the less waste he made: neuertheless, he speaketh not of any rampier, or of any ditch belonging vnto Towne or Village. Whereby may justly be observed, that the Belgians as they were defended of the Germanes, so in like manner they had the same order of dwelling.

The Bellovaci, or Bellovaci in like sort, albeit that they were the very principal of the Belgians, as well in regard of their vertue and authority, as for the great number of men amongst them: yet it appeareth, that they were no strangers to this custom: for in the first warre, he speaketh not but of one Towne or Village, named * Bratupactum; in the other warres, he maketh no mention of any one. This may seeme to be spoken sufficiently enough, concerning the habitations of the Belgians.

CHAP. III.

Of the Humanity, Liberty, Hospitality & Courtesy of the Gaules to strangers, and care for benefiting each other equally.

Finde nothing written in Caesar of the plays, sports, & pastimes of the youth among the Gaules. As for the Germanes, Tacitus writeth thus. They had but one onely kind of spectacle in every assembly young boies that conceived delight in this sport, would run or leape forth violently (and stark naked) before swords & lances directed against them. This exercise grew to be an art, and Art made it vertue graceful in them: yet what they did, was not for any lucre, gaine, or wages, but the onely recompence of this their audacious gallantry, was, to be pleasing in their eyes that beheld them. They would play (being in very stayed and settled judgement) at such desperate games of hazard and dangerous adventure, as would make a man blith to stand and looke on, and they performed their intentions in such earnest manner, as if they were at strife for some matter of great moment: yea, such was their affection to the game or lisse, as after they had nothing els to contend for: they would strive about the very last hazard, laying downe their own liberty and person in payne. Whosoever lost himselfe, would yeelde to the others servitude, with his owne kinde consent: And albeit hee were neuer so young and strong, yet (in regard of his losse) he would suffer himselfe to be bound and sold. For such was their wilfull obstinacy, that they would lay down faith upon the very least occasion.

But whosoever would take note of the great humanity, liberality, and courtesy as well in the Gaules as in the Germanes, let him read what followeth. They would invite strangers (this speaketh Diodorus of the Gaules) to feast with them. And after nature was sufficed; they would enquire what people they were, and what occasion drew them thither. But Caesar and Tacitus giue this commendation vnto the Germanes, by writing much more amply. They make it a matter of great Conscience (saith Caesar) to offer any outrage to strangers, who, be it for what cause soever they come amongst them, yet they will defend them from all injuries, and thinke them to be sacred people, each one allowing them part of his house, & whatsoever he had to lie on. Tacitus writeth in this manner. There is not any Nation more addicted to make good cheer together, and feast strangers. They doe make great conscience in denying house-room to any commer; for each man will Feast him him according to his power : And when he hath no further means, he that is the Hoste, enstrueth him to another mans dwelling ; and thereinto (without any further bidding) they enter both together, euen the neerer houle they come vnto ; where their entertainment is voyde of all difficulty, and vſed with extraordinary courtesie. As concerning the rites of hospitality, they make no difference between him that is knowne, and another that is vnknown. At his departure, if he desireth any thing, it is their order and custome to grant it : as they will doe the like when it falleth to their turne. They take great delight in giuing gifts : but will receiue no recompence for whatsoever they giue, or thinke themselves indebted or beholding for any thing that they receiue. This is a testimony of their worthy hospitality, & I am of the minde, that so great an honor deferueth not to be forgotten, as Germany iustly deserueth in regard of this Vertue.

Desperate & dangerous games among the younger sort, & pastimes of the very earnest sort.

Phalaris the Chaldeonion, did first publish in the Commonwealth (as Arystotele affirmeth) that goods might bee equally diuided ; to the end, that the two principall plagues to mankind (which are riches and pouerty) might be banished from the City. And this is that which Plato (most of all other) wished for the grounded estate of a happy Commonwealth. But the Germanes neuer fixed their imaginations on ſuch a most fortunate Commonwealth, by disputes and discourses onely, but accomplished and brought it to effect by their owne good customs and honest examples. For some of them (as Cæſar auoucheth in his sixth booke, speaking of the Germanes) had not any certain measure of land, or any particular limitation : but the Princes and Magistrates assigned euery eye (both to kindreds and parentages, who were acknowledged and placed together) so much ground or land, and such a site or situation, as vnto them seemed best and conuenient ; & the yeare following, they were constrained to seeke elsewhere. In his fourth booke, hee faies as much of the Sarues, another people of Germany. They had no land which they held in particular, or diuided among themselves ; neither were they permitted to tarry longer then a yeare in a place, to Till or make it husbandable. This is the equality of goods, which then was among the Germanes.

And they rendered great store of reasons for this equality, as the same Author witnesseth in his sixth booke, viz. Fearing least being retained by an accustomed continuance in one quarter, they should forsake the profession of warre, & follow the other more beneficial kind of life. Fearing, least they should withdraw their minds from the enlarging and exteinding of their bounds or limits : and growing to be too potent in strength, they should ouerawe and expell the weaker from their goods : fearing also, least they should be over curious in building, to defend themselves against cold and heat, and to proue to be starke Cowards. Fearing besides, lest a wicked covetous desire should arise among them, of scraping and gathering goods together : whereon (customarily) inseth threatenings, diffentions, & blood. Also, to the end that the popular sort might bee contained within a reasonable contentment of mind, when the meanest perceived his goods to be equal with the most powerfull. This is (in effect) the words of Cæſar, touching the qualitie of goods vſed then among the Germanes : and when the Greekes come to compare with him, in commending this manner of behaviour either in the Cretanes or Lacedæmonians ; all that they could auouch or say, was ; to terme this worthy and extraordinary vertue, to be no more then neerer barbarousnesse.

Seruitude or bondage was in vſe aſwell among the Germanes and Gaules, as in other Nations. Many men (so speaketh Cæſar in his sixth booke, discoursing on the Gaules (finding themselves to be charged either with debts, or taxations, or iniuries of the mightier sort) did yield themselves into seruitude or slavery of Gentlemen, who had the selfsame right over them, as Masters had over their slaves. It should seeme, that this Masterie or command was cruell, as well as that whereof Titus Livius recounteth in his 2. booke, to be vſed in Rome, after that the Kings were expelled thence, when the commotion of the bondmen was on foot. For they were then controlled and handled by their Masters, as the bodies of debtors were by their creditors, who were parted (as Quintilian writeth in the sixth chapter

CHAP. V.

How the Gaules vſed to educate and bring up their children. Of their courage, manhood, and valour in Armes and martial exercises.

Here then were the manners and temperance of the ancient Gaules, which serued very sufficiently to maintain their disposition & strength of body, and (doubtlesse) was the cause of their admirable stature : whereat Cæſar was much amazed, when he beheld the Gaules which were slaine in the warres of Africa : you haue also heard some part of their liberality, in the administration of their goods, for the releefe of others necessities. But there remaineth much more to say, if we would enter into discourse, concerning all the parts of their manhood and valancy : were it in considering the exercise of their youth, or their earnest & violent desire in following armes, and the Nations which haue bene conquered by them, and the Colonies established throughout the world, onely in the name of the Gaules. The Gaules (thus saith Cæſar in his sixth booke) helde this as a difference from others, in their manner of behaviour, to wit ; That they would neuer permit their children to come openly before them, vntill they were of able yeares to beare Armes. And they held him to be a villain, whose sonne (being vnder limitted yeares) should be found in publike before his fathers face. Cæſar speaketh this neuertheless hee giueth not sufficiently to be vnderstood, at what time or season they were to beare Armes, neither in what exercise their infancy was imployed, vntill this date of expectation, therefore we must make search into other Authors.

Tacitus, speaking of the Germanes, would haue vs to know, at what time they came vnto the seruice of the Commonwealth. They obserued as a custome (saith he) that no one should vnder take the profession of Armes, vntill the Commonwealth had approued and allowed his suffi-

of his third booke) or diuided betwene the creditors, according to the law of the twelve Tables. And that Law (as himselfe saith) which naturally was not to be allowed, and yet (notwithstanding) permitted as in right, was reprehended by publike custome, and oftentimes (to remedy the same in mere pitty) the Commonwealth granted Letters of respite, abolishing extorting interrests, and making a new obligation for the principall.

But the Gaules vſed much greater humanity and liberality then the Romanes did ; because the Masters kept in honourable place, and about their persons, such as thus stood obliged to them, and they vſed their seruice also in their warres. Wherefore it appeareth, that that which Diodorus wrote, differed not from this purpose, where he saith ; They employed as guards and defenders of their bodies, such as (among freemen) were poore and needy, and they serued them as Esquires and Armor-bearers in the warre. Tacitus reporteth almost the very same custome as was vſed by the Gaules, when he speaketh of the slaves among the Germanes. They do not vſe their slaves (saith hee) as we do ours, appointing them certain offices in our houses : for euery one serueth himselfe, and governeth his household affaires. The Master chargeth his slave with certain measures of Corn, or with some Cattle, or with some kinde of clothe : euen as we do our Farmers or Husbandmen, and the seruant obeyeth him not but in such businesse. If he would haue any matter done in his house, his wife and Children performeth it. It seldome or neuer happneth, that a master doth beat his slave or binde him, or enforce him and constraineth him to any businesse. They had a custome to kill them, yet not by any manner of rigorous or severe chastisement ; but in choller, as an enemy, and done in the case of some reuenge. Freemen had no more advantages then seruants. Seldom or rarely were they advanced in the house, and neuer vnto the managing of Commonwealth affaires : except among such Nations, as were in obedience to a king, and there they mounted higher then Freemen, or then Gentlemen. Among other Nations, libertines, being not receiued into the like dignities as the free, made distinction of their liberty.

iciency. Then, in the martiall Confistorie, either some one of the Pri. ces, or his Father, or els his neereft Kinfinan, armed the yong man with a shield and a Laucin. This was the * Toga or Gown which they tooke, and this was the first degree of honor, wherunto their yong men mounted. Before, and till this dignity was done to them, they were but as a member of the house onely: but afterward, they appertained to the Commonwealt. Aristotle, who wrote long time before Cæsar, declarerth vnto vs this manner of education of children (for it seemeth in the 8. Booke of his Politicks) that hee learned this instruction of vs. It is necessary (saith he) to accustom and vie the yongest children to endure cold weather: for it profiteth marvellously, as well for the disposition of the body, as for manly cariage in war. And this was the reason, why some barbarous people (as the Celts) offered it as a custome, to plunge their yong Infants (so soon as they were borne) in the coldest water of the river, or els to cloath them in light garments. For, to whatsoever thing youth ought to apply it self, this is the best course, to accustom them thereto (by little and little) from their yongest houre, and when they are tender becaufe of the heate which is naturally in them, & therefore the first thing to be done, is to be careful in this one point.

Aristotle in this place calleth the Celts barbarous, and yet hee accounteth not their customes barbarous; in regard that hee appointeth the Greeks to fashion themselves after their manner. I know that Galen sharply reproverth this behaviour, when in the first booke of his Governement of health, and instructing how to order health, he saith, I am not of the minde, that Children should onely be nurshed among the Germanes. Also, that which we write of, is neither for the Germanes, or for any other such savage and barbarous men; no more then for Beares, wilde Boares, Lions, or such other beasts. I knowe (I say) that Galen reprehendeth this custome feuerly; but I know likewise, that the yong nice delicates of the Greekes, whom Galen striueth to please, in preferring them an order for their health: haue beene quite denoured by these Lyons (as he tearmeth them) and that the Gauls and Germanes, if they be compared with the Greeks, may in good right be called Lyons.

And truly, Lacedæmon, which was the most noble of all the Grecian Cities, was principally renowned for being studious in hardning it selfe to traualle, after the true manner of the Celts. For the youths of Sparta, did dayly inbolden themselves against all manner of paines and exercises: neuer entering into the especiall assembly, before the age of twenty yeares, as Plutarch recordeth in the life of Lycargus. Wherefore, not onely the power of this vertue, which was in the Gauls and Germanes, but (ouer and beside) the authority of Aristotle, as also of Lacedæmon (if any man be regardfull thereof) may well serue to answer the reasons of Galen. We may also inferre (to this purpose) that which Strabo hath written, when he saith, The Gauls held this as proper and peculiar to them, to refuse no taking of pains, as fearing to become fat and swoln belied by ease: therefore they punished and condemned vnto some pecuniary fine, such yong men as grew grosse through sloath and excess. Whereunto that ordinance of the Romanes was conformable; that deprived any fat or corpulent Knight, of the Horse graunted him by publique allowance.

Now it is further to be considered, that this exercise was not onely proper or peculiar vnto the Gauls; but it was in like common use with the Germanes they brethren, as Galen himselfe hath elsewhere declared. Let vs listen then to Cæsar, who herein giueth them sufficient commendation. From their infancy (this hee writeth in his sixth booke) they addicted themselves to paines taking, and employed (almost) their whole life time, either in hunting, or feate of warre. They had diuers kinds of wilde beasts, in the Forrest called * Hercynia: as wilde Bulles, * Aces, but especially Buffles, which they rooke with great labour in their dens or ditches, and there slew them. The yong men hardened themselves to this trauell, and euermore exercised this manner of hunting; & they which had slaine most of them, bringing their hornes to publique view, as a testimony of their diligence, receiued both reward and great praife. This yeeldeth sufficient demonstration, how the yong men prepared their spirits, to endure all paine and labour, and fell not off for any danger: as hauing learned, though not of great and skillfull Doctors, which were beft able to giue them instructions; yet (at least) of their owne selues, and so put it in effectfull execution.

Let vs now obserue what they were in actions of warre, and as the Poet sayeth; The braue workmanhippe of Mars becaufe the Gauls were personally in war. For, before Cæsar came thither (as hee hath written in his sixth booke) it happened euery yeare, that either they assailed others, or elle were glad to defend themselves; and it was easily knowne, that by a custome among the Gauls, age was no excuse to any man, as appeareth by diuers passages in the eighth booke. Vercingetorix, a chiefe Commander of the * belli, albeit he could very hardly keepe himselfe on horsebacke, because he was so farre gone in yeares: yet notwithstanding, according to the manner of the Gauls, hee would pleade no excuse, by his age, in vndergoing such charges as were imposed on him; and he was very vnwilling, that any fight should bee performed without him. Likewise, in the warre of the Parthians, the whole charge (as is to be seene in the seventh booke) was giuen vnto Cannibacenus, an especiall man of re * Auleris, who was well-neere wholly spent with age: and yet for all that, the great experience which he had in martiall affaires, aduanced him to the highest degree of Honor. Answerable to this, Strabo saith, The Gauls were rather men of warre, then any way addicted vnto Tillage or husbandry.

Aristotle writeth, that the Celts helde the vertue of warlike actions in most singular respect and commendation. And it was well noted, as Cæsar affirmeth, that the cause of valour (both in the Belgians and Heluetians) grew through their continuall exercise of armes, for he saith: The most valiant people of all the Gauls, were the Belgians.

Now, as Temperance was the first and formost in ranke, as being the Mother, or the Nurse (at least) of true valiancy: so the second cause which Cæsar rendereth, was; That they were neighbours to the Germanes, which dwelt on the further side of the Rheine, with whom they were continually at warre. This (I say) was another cause of their valor, that continually they exercised armes and by the same reason, the Heluetians surpassed (in this vertue) all the other Celts: As it might daily be discerned, in regard, that ordinarily they fought with the Germanes, either in repelling them from their frontiers, or making war on them in their owne country. In this place also might be alledged, their often and frequent skirmishes, to deliuer true faithfullnesse of their valour. Moreover, the Gauls for want of warre, to the end that they might still be in exercise of armes: gaue themselves to thefts and robberies, as Diodorus saith, purloyning the goods of others, without any prouision of their owne. What were the Germanes saith he. What participation had they in this vertue? All their life, as hath bene already declared, was no way employed, but in deeds of armes. And as he hath further written in his sixth Booke, the very greatest honour that any City could haue, was, to haue a great Desert spacious Country round about it. They esteemed it to be proper and natural to vertue, to compell their expelled neighbours, to forsake their Lands and Territories, to what so none durst dwell nere unto them. And by this means, they imagined themselves to be in the greatest security, in being deliuered from all dread of courses, which suddenly might bee made into their Country.

Tacitus speaketh of the same exercise of armes. You could not so readily put into their heads, any order for husbandry in their grounds, or carefulnes for gathering their fruites, and come, as to go assaile the enemy; and to returne back with wounds and maimes. Moreover it appeared to them, that it was meere sloth and carelesnesse, to winne that by sweat and labour, which a man might purchase with the price of his blood. Cæsar saith likewise of the Germanes, the same that Diodorus doth of the Gauls, that they were addicted to rapine and thefts. Robberies (thus speaketh Cæsar in his sixth booke) did not make men any io: the worse esteemed: so that they were done out of those limits, which appertained to each City. And it is said that they vsed these courses; onely to exercise their youthes, and for the auoyding of ydleness. And when some one of the Lords would deliuer his minde in an open assembly, that he would be their guide, and that such as would follow him, should shew instantly themselves. Such as gave consent to his opinion, and (allowing him for their Leader) presently arose, and promised him their uttermost assistance; the people present would both commend them and their enterprise. As for such among them, as neither followed, nor gave allowance to the attempt: they were reputed as traitours, and neuer afterward durst any man repeat any credite in them.

Tacitus addeth yet moreouer, that the Germanes made war among strange people. If the City (saith he) wherein they were borne, grew flossfull and vyle, thorough long peace and repose; the moir part of the yongest Gentlemen went (upon their owne motion and good will) to finde out such Nations as had any warre. For rest and ease was no way pleasing to this people; and the dangers which they essayed and made proofe of, made them also the more famous; and they could not maintaine any great matter of worth, but by power and warre, for thus they compassed meanes to be bountifull and liberal, onely by warre, thefts and pillages.

Thus we may perceiue, how the auncient Gaules made continual exercise of armes, and well deserved those commendations, wherewith the first and chiefeft of all the Romaine Poets shewed himselfe willing to honour Italy.

published an assembly in armes against the Romanes; as is to be seene in the fifth booke of the warres in Gaul. The Gaules began their warre in this manner, & followed one common Law among them. All their younger men vied to meete together in armes: but he that came latest, in the presence of the whole assembly (after hee had bene tormented with all the tortures could be deuised) hee was afterward put to death. The felix same custome is declared in the seventh booke, when Vercingetorix, being elected General for the warre of the Gaules; was besiedged in * Alesia. For he tooke counsell, to discharge all the troupes of horse which he had with him, and at parting, he gave the charge to returne each man to the City; whereof he was a member, and there to assemble or muster for the warre, all such as were of age to carry armes. Neuertheless, the Gaules hauing published the assembly of their Princes, did not thinke it meete to draw all the together, that were of age to beare armes, according as Vercingetorix had ordained; but rather appointed, that each City should be furnished with a certaine number of men; it could not otherwise chuse but breed confusion by being unable to command them, or knowing one from another, or any possible meanes of prouision for them. By this manner of ordering men for their warres, we may well perceiue, that the Gaules were studious in military affayres, considering, that all such as were aboute fourteene yeares of age, did carry armes.

The Gaules armed themselves quite contrary to the Romanes, as is to be obserued in the seventh booke, where hee speaketh of the * Hédus, that came to the seruice of Cæsar, who very greatly astonished the Romanes, by vying their armes after the Gaulish manner. And yet I cannot perceiue (throughout Cæsars discourses) what those kinde of armes were: therefore we will collect that which Polybius, Diodorus, Strabo, and Titus Livius haue noted to vs. The sword which they vied, was long, and the man wore it (hanging in a chaine of brasse) on his right side: and it serued not onely to smite or slashewithall, but also to thrust or foine, so saith Diodorus; notwithstanding, Polybius and Titus Livius doe deny their thrusting or foyning with the point.

Their Target or Shielde was large, and answerable vnto each mans stature or constitution: and, according to their funerall delight or pleasure, so was it enriched with Imagerie of brazen Beasts, mounted vp into bosses. Their Laurel had a head of yron or Steele, containing a cubite in length, and two fingers breadth. Cæsar in his third booke saith, that they likewise carried a staffe, which he termeth Gefer, & another, called by him Aleris, which was a certaine kind of small iaulin. Their heads were couered with a Sallice or head-peece of brasse, a little exalted or raised vp, whereon was figured Images of Birds, Beasts, and antique shapes. Their vsual Coriulet was of yron.

Many of the Gaules were wont to fight naked, so farre as the naul: as Titus Livius saith, in the battaile at Cannas, and Polybius speaketh as much of the same fight in this manner. It was a very dreadful fight, to obserue the behavior of naked men, who marched on stoutly, shewing an excellent beauty, and vndauntable strength. In like manner, Titus Livius saith, that in * Gallogræcia, the Gaules fought naked, and that was the reason, why they were overcome by the Romanes, who finote them atfarr off with their Piles, which were a kinde of small iaulins, and darted at them very strongly. The Gaules likewise vied Bowes and Slings, according as Strabo saith; for he writeth, that they hadde a kinde of Staffe, which being throwne by the hand onely, without any string or other holde, would smite further off then an Arrow, and with this they did (most commonly) shoote at Birds. It is also very certaine (as the same Author affirmeth) that they hadde a Tree in Gaul, somewhat resembling the Figge-Tree, which carried a fruite, that had some likeness to the chapter of a Corinthian pillar. This Tree being cutte, did yeeld a deadly iuyce or liquor, wherewith they vied to imploy on the heads of their Arrowes. That it was so, and that the Gaules were great Archers, Cæsar prooueth verie pregnantly in his seauenth booke, where hee speaketh of Vercingetorix. Hee commanded (saith he) that all the Archers (which were a very great number throughout Gaul) should be leuied, and sent vnto him, as it will appeare much more fully hereafter in better place.

This was the Armor and Munition of the Gaules, whereunto that of the Germanes, which Tacitus describeth, was not altogether agreeable. They seldom defended themselves with swords or long staves: for they carried Iavelines, or (to vse their owne proper word) Framées, the blades whereof were straight and short, but yet so keene, and so apt for their seruice, that they could vse them with or against a staffe, according as they had occasion to fight, either before they came neere to one another, or when they were at handy grips. The Horseman contented himselfe with his shield and Iaveline: but foot soldiers had many darts each man, which they hurled or darted infinitely, being naked, or lightly clothed with a simple Cassocke or Mandilion. They had no brauery on their accoutrements: onely, they would decke their shields with some curious choise colours. Very few of them did weare any shirts of Maile, or scaled coats: some one or two might haue (perhaps) a Caske or Morrion. These are the Armes which the ancient Gauls are credibly said to weare.

It remaineth now to speake, how they employed their men of warre, as well on foote as horsebacke. The horsemen were in most estimation among the Gauls, and had the principall managing of all affairs for warre, as Caesar hath saide in his sixte Booke. And in the League which all the Gauls made against Caesar, one while hee speaketh of the number of eight thousand horse, then againe in fiftene thousand, which was that part of the army, whereby the Gauls made themselves strongest, as plainly appeareth in the fauenth Booke. Neuertheless, no assurance can be collected hereby, concerning all the cities in their feuerall forces. The people of Truets, or the Treueri, were the very strongest of all the Gauls in horsemen, as is to be seene in the fift booke. The Santones, according as wee readen in the third booke, had likewise very great store of horsemen: but the Nervians (in the verie same place) are said to haue the most foot soldiers. Notwithstanding, if you regard them generally, you shall finde, that the Canallery had the cheefest honour of all the warres among the Gauls. And these were the horsemen, where with Caesar was most assisted in his ciuill warre. For to himselfe testifieth in the first booke of his Ciuiill Warre, that when Affricanus came with great forces to allie the Cariacians who were but a few in number: suddenly the horsemen of the Gauls were diligent in making head against them; and (so long as they could) they maintained fight, albeit they consisted of so few, and endured against a great multitude of the enemy. But so soone as the Ensignes of the Legions began to approach; with verie little losse of their men they retired vnto the neighbouring Mountaines. The time of the fights continuance serued sufficiently for the Cariacians safety: for, in that while, they had leysure to gaine the highest parts of the hills, & there sheltered themselves securely.

Likewise, in the warre of Africa, when the enemy (with powerful forces) came to deale with the host of Caesar, and to attache them in the reeresuddenly the Legionaries stayed them, and the horsemen (although they were but few in number) made very stout resistance, yea, and with vnconquerable hardiment, against that great troope of the enemy. And a matter almost incredible happened. That lesse than thirty horse of the Gauls, repelled two thousand horse of the Moores, and put them into rout. Such was the strength of the Gaulish horse. Hence ensued that exclamation of Cicero, in his 5. Philippick. Opinion was conceined (saith he) that some appointed, that there should be giue to Mark Anthony, the government of that latter part of Gaule, which Plancius holdeth at this instant: Is there any other wiselone in so doing, but to lend our owne weapons to an enemy, to make a ciuill warre upon vs? For first of all, the merues or sinewes of warre, which is countless summes of money, and whereof hee standeth now in neede, and next, the power of horse, which valeneth as much; what can be desired more then both these? Behold, in what account and estimation, the horsemen of the Gauls were.

Sometimes it was thought convenient, to entermingle amongst the horse some of the foot soldiers, which were worst armed, and the Archers. And this was (as appeareth in the fteenth Booke) when Vercingetorix went with the Horse, and certaine foote (least charged with Armes)

Armes) to prepare an ambuscado, where he imagined that the Romanes intended to come and forrage. At another time, (in the same booke) speaking of himselfe, when they were nere to Gergonia, Caesar saith: It was not fully breake of day, when in the skirmishes, the footemen being mingled among the horse, we were forced to approue how hardy and vertuous our owne men were. Sometimes, the Footemen, being lightly armed, accompanied with the Archers, fought amongst the Horsemen, as was obserued in the encounter nere to Alcxia. The Gauls (among some few of their horse) flanked their Archers and light armed foote; to the end that they should succour the horsemen, and sustaine the violent assault of the Romanes Canallery.

Ancient Gaule had * Effedariet, who were warriours that rode in Waggon, or Waggon, called Effedariet and Diodorus giueth vs assurance hereof in these words. Palsing thorow the Countrey in time of warre, they vied Carres or Waggon, which two Horses drew by a fit prepared furniture; the Waggoner, or he that had the charge thereof, being the only guide. If they met with the enemy in warre; first of all, and while they were vpon the waggon, they would let fly their darts at him. Afterward, alighting from the waggon, and being on foote, then they fought together with their swords. These two manners of fighting, are much more at large described by Caesar, when hee speaketh of the Germanes and the Brittaines. Of the Germanes in the first booke, where hee reckoneth vp the forces which Arianus had. They were (saith hee) fixe thousand Horsemen, and as many foot, of the very strongest and best disposed, which each man had made choise of particularly, as for his owne succour and safety. If they were to set on to the warre, they mingled one among another, and the Horsemen also retired when they did. If any great occasion happened, the foote soldiers fought with the horsemen. And if any one being wounded, hapned to fall from his horse, the other gaule present succour. If they were to march on further, or to recreate vpon expedition; exercise had constructed them in such celerity, that onely by fastning hold on their horses Maines, they would mount vp, and run as swiftly as they did. In another passage of the 4. Booke, speaking of the Sueues, hee saith. In those skirmishes which they made on horsebacke, they would oftentimes dismount and fight on foote: hauing taught and inured their horses in such manner, that they neuer stirred from the place where they left them, returning to their horses againe, when occasion required. According to their custome, they esteemed nothing more base and idle, then to ride on Saddles. And this was the reason, that although they were but few in number, yet they durst boldly assault any troopes whatsoever, if they were Horsemen, and rode on saddles.

This is that which Caesar hath written; whereby we may gather, that heerein the Gauls were contrary to the Germanes order: considering, that the Germanes placed their strength in their men on foot; which Tacitus relateth more apparently. Whosoever (saith he) wil consider them in general, shall finde, that their cheefest power consisteth in their footemen: and therefore (in fighting) they ranke them among the troopes of horse. For the footemen which they choose among all their youth, to put to the point of any danger, are men of wonderfull swiftnesse, apt and fit to fight among the horse. They are an hundred, chosen out of euery Towne or Village, and thereon were teamed Centeniers, or Centurions: for that which serued (before) but to signifye the number, was now giuen as an especiall name, and was honourable to them. Thus serued the Horsemen of the Germanes, and were mingled in this manner among the foote soldiers.

Now, as concerning the behaviour of the Brittaines, Caesar in his fourth booke, describeth it in this manner. They haue a manner of fighting on Chariots or waggon, which is thus. First, they skirmish on all sides, and hurle their Darts, and oftentimes chappent, that by the terror of their horses trampling, & by the noise of their Waggon wheels, they trouble the ranks extraordinarily. But after that they are mingled amongst the troopes of horsemen, they descend from their waggon, and fight on foote. During which while, the Waggoners withdraw themselves somewhat out of the fight, and arrange their waggon in such fort, that if their masters bee pressed with any great number of enemies they can make an ease and speedily returne to them. The adresse and direction of their horses, the order obteined among their footmen for fight, and their aptnesse thereto, by dayly use and exercise was such: that when they lifted, they could suddenly stay their horses, even in the midst of his swiftest course, although it were in defending downe a high hill. There could they readily mannage and turne them, running mainly by the bridle among the horse; & thence againe returne lightly vnto their Chariots. This manner then of fighting, whereof the Eshedaries made use, was somewhat also mingled among the horse and foote.

Moreover (as is to be seene in the seauenth booke) a great number of Waggons attended on the Gaules, especially such as were vnarmed. Next, of the Archers of the Atheni, and the horsemen of Gaule, which had followed Caesar; there came into Spaine, with a great number of waggons, all filled with baggage, according to the custome among the Gaules. Beside, there were of men and women, about six thousand, with their seruants and children: and because they took delight, in hauing beasts for portage and cariage, they were glad to pay deely for them, as Caesar hath recorded in his seauenth booke. Heereby we vnderstand, that not one y the men, but their children also, yea, the whole Families in Gaule, went to the war when occasion required. Tacitus writeth also, That the women followed the Germanes, and accompanied them to their warres. But this is sufficient, concerning such leuies and preparations for warre, as was used among the Gaules.

Now it would be knowne, with what ease they could endure the scarcity of victuals, by the temperature of their nouriture, hauing formerly aoided the delicacy of wine: and Caesar giueth vs to vnderstand (in many places) how they were provided of victuals. The Helueticans departing from their houses, caried meale (that was formerly ground with them) to serue for 3. months. And Pertinax, to take away from the Romans all means of recouering fooode, perswaded the Gaules to burne the Towns and Villages on all parts where the Romans might make any inua-

sion. Whereupon more then 20. Townes (belonging to the Bituriges) were burnt in one day: and the like they did vnto the Cities in the neighboring countries. But, at the instant intreaty of the Biturigeans, who required, that Auruncum (which was the very goodliest City in all Gaule) might not be burned: it was granted by Pertinax, who first had debated for the contrary, yet after yeelded, as well in regard of their earnest motion, as also in meere pitty and commiseration. But the pitty afforded to this one Towne, caused most cruel ruine of all the other cities and Townes in Gaule. For Caesar's army, that had bin very mightily tormented with famine, and had endured diuers daies with our power of recouering any thing to make bread of: after the surprizing of Auruncum, was now not onely stored with plenty of food, but being stethed as it wer with hope of like following successe, it made them to deuoure vp all Gaule.

At another time, Pertinax (by vertue of the same counsell and aduice) constrained Caesar to forsake Gergontia, and hauing taken all the victuals which the Romans had then in Nousadunum, brought him into such distresse, that had it not bin for thame, rediounes of the way and absence of the 4. Legions, Caesar was setting forward to go into Prouence, Pertinax being elected capitaine. General thorowhout Gaule, vied (at a third time) the selfsame aduice; when in a publike assembly of the Gaules he said, that he wold not tempt his fortune, & giue his enemy batrel, because he was strongly delenced with horsemen, whereby he could easily hinder the Romans from food and forraging. And it behooued every man (of his own good will) to destroy his Corne, and burne his houses, considering, that by this little losse, which each man might well endure in his own particular, he should perceiue, that their empire and liberty, would (for euer) be the furer maintained. And vnderstanding, Caesar being moued by these occasions, purposed to withdraw himselfe into Prouence, thorow the country of the Sequan, when Pertinax (too inconsiderately) condemned the good counsell giuen him, & wold not tempt fortune, by hazarding the batrel, & turned all his intentions til to the worthe whereby may be obserued, what care the ancient Gaules had for prouision of food.

Now if we desire to know, what order was used among them in the field, either for marching, lodging their armies, or obseruation of military discipline; it seems curious that they were not therein any iote curious. The Helueticans essaying to passe a river, some tied diuers boates together; others would leape into such places, where the Rhone was most easie for passage, oftentimes in the day, and more often in the night, but Caesar euer more gaue them the repulse. The Gaules not hauing (as yet) learned the manner of making bridges, could not (in the space of twenty daies) passe the third part of their army, by such boates as they had fastened together: and this was their want of knowledge, in the arte of making Bridges. If we look vpon the seating of their armies, and their fortifications in the field, they were as slenderly skilfull therein. They would make choise of a valley, that had no other Rampier or Ditch, but Heaven and Earth to succour and defend it. For the custome among the Gaules, was (as we may reade in the eight booke) to refuse and forsake high places, and to order their Campe neere vnto Rivers. So it appeareth in the first booke, that the Helueticans encamped at the foote of some hill, euen as the Germans did the like: but the Romanes euer more elected the highest places. In seating then of the Gaules Campe was in this manner, without any kinde of fortification. The Campe of the Belgians (as is to be seene in the second booke) according as might be iudged by their fires and smoke, consisted of more then eight miles in largenesse. And when they declared most care & warinesse; they would onely plant their Chariots and Waggons formeist, which serued them as their cheefest Rampier. In like manner, the Germans would engirt their whole army, with their Waggons and Chariots. At length the Gaules began to imitate the Romanes, in such matters as they perceived to be best behoouing for the, or whatsoever they did for the best advantage.

The Neruians (as we reade in the first booke) enclosed that place, where Cituro bestowed his winter abiding, with a rampier of eleuen foote in height, and a ditch of fifteene foote deepe. They had learned this, by their practise of warre against the Romanes, and by the helpe of such prisoners as they had taken. But wanting such tooles and instruments, as were necessarily required in this businesse: they were constrained to cut the greene turfs or sods with their Swords, and to carry both them & the earth, in the long skirts of their ladders. Afterward, they began to raise Towers on the tops of their rampiers, and to make mounted roofes and Tarrases, according as their prisoners had instructed them: in so much, that Caesar (at length) wondered, to see what Towers, Tarrases, and Fortifications they enterprised and performed. These passages of Caesar, do sufficiently declare, that the Gaules were not wanting, eyther in naturall disposition, or in care, to performe what was necessary, but only came short of orderly discipline.

In the seauenth yeare of the Gaules warre, after great store of losses had happened; Pertinax comforting the Gaules, declared vnto them, that it was reasonable & expedient (for common safety of each one) to begin to fortifie their campe: to the end that they might the more easily endure the sudden assaults of their enemies. For in those times (saith Caesar) was it, that the Gaules began first of all to fortifie their Campe. And therefore Caesar did especially make and nominate it in that place. And the first fortification which they used, was at Gorgontia, when they made a wal about their campe, which was sixe foote high, of great thick stones. Afterward, neere to Alexis, where they made a ditch and a wall, containing sixe foote in height. The Latine word Maceria, which significth a wall of stones, heaped together without mortar or lime, & whereof Caesar maketh use in the second place: declareth what manner of walles they had, which were rudely constructed, and without any cunning. The Gaules then (aunciently) had so little knowledge or discipline.

But what valour or manhood did they vfe in fight? Was there any such matter of worth in them? Vndoubtedly they reposed a very great assurance in their owne strength. The Gaules, as was noted in the warres of Africa, were naked or vncovered, and vsing no kinde of surprizing: had a custome to fight onely by vanity, and not by any sleight or cunning.

And this was the reason, why Dionotus the Heluetian, spake so to Cæsar, who had surprized the Tigurines at vnawares, saying. That they had learned of their Fathers and Auncesors, to fight more for manhood then arte, but he made him selfe strong, onely by surprizes. And for prooffe of this military vertue, there are very singular examples, in many places of Cæsar. In the battaile of the Heluetians, albeit that from the seventh hoire (as is to be seen in the first booke) they had fought till darke night; yet no man could euer see the enemy to turne his backe. The Belgians in like manner (as it is written in the first booke) neuer being daunted or terrified with the slaughter of so many of their owne fellows, cruelly slaine before their faces: in resolute assurance, essayed boldly to march vpon their dead bodies. The Neruians likewise (as appeareth in the same place) euē in the latest hope of their safety, declared an extraordinary signe of their vertue. For, albeit such as were the very chiefeest amongst them, lay butchered on the earth before them: yet they kept neere full to them, and fought standing vpon their bodies. Yea, and that in such manner as they which remained alive, making hilles of dead mens coarffes, threw their Darts against the Romanes, as from the top of a Butte, and cast also their lesser Lauchins at them, so long as they were able to reach them. This agreeeth with that which he speaketh of the Gaules, who were in Cæsar's seruice, when Ambin in paine, was round about engirt with the bodies of enemies, that had bene slaine, and lay there in their armes. In stead of turtles of earth (saith Plinius) they piled and layed dead bodies one vpon another, and for the seruice of a Palliade, they couered them with their Shields and lauchins, and their swords, with the heads of men, were all placed & turned towards the Towne of their enemy: To the ende, that they should apparently behold the true Ensignes of their valiancy, only to affright them, while thus they were circled in, as in a rampier. Thus the Gaules hauing made a round wall of their enemies bodies, and mounted thereon; they began to assaile the Towne with violent deliuey of their Arrowes and Darts.

They had learned this manner of making a rampier of dead mens bodies, fō a custome vsed in their owne Country, and heerehence (in mine opinion) grew the coniecture made of the Gaules, whereof Aristotle writeth in his Ethicks to Nicomachus: That they feared not any thing in the world, neither scorches, burnings or any torments whatsoeuer. And to this effect, was that which Strabo writeth of the Gaules, concerning their answer to Alexander, who demanded of them, what it was that they feared most? Nothing (saide they) if the Heauens tumble not downe vpon vs. I perceiue also, that they were euē as neglect and careless, in chusing the aduantage of place for fight, as they were in the leasing of their Campe, which may euidently bee discerned in all the Commentaries of the Gaules warres. When the Heluetians and Neruians assailed Cæsar, it was in a place very disadvantageous: but if they lighted on any other, that might declare them to bee any way better aduised; it was by some former pattern of the Romanes, and obseruation of their discipline. And the first time that they entred into any good order was, when the army which they had was rallied out of diuers Countries, and the Souldiours then were generally distributed, according to the Countries whereof they were, and so placed (separately) the forces of each City in his due ranke or degree. So in the battaile of the Neruians, the Strikerians were ordered on the left side, the Neruians on the right, & the Veromandians in the middle of the battaile. Likewise in the seventh booke, where hee maketh mention of the forces of Verugetoris. The Gaules after they had broken the bridges, kept themselves firmly on a little Hill, confiding in the situation of the place, and being generally diuided, according vnto the Cities whereof they were, and placing Guards at euery Ford & Thicket of the Marsh; they impeached them to their no meane disadvantage. In the same place againe, Verugetoris hauing planted his Campe on a Hill neere to the Towne, lodged separately also the forces of each City; yet leauing some wide and spacious roome about all their lodgings, and being possessed of all the smaller hilles that neighboured the greater, whence any aduantage might be had for looking downeward; he made made a thewverye dreadfull to behold. And euery day, euen from the point or breake of day, he caused the chiefe Commanders of such Cities (as he had chosen to be of his counsell) to come before him, whether it were to confesse about some matters to be done, or execute any thing that depended on their charge: so that no one day might escape him, but some effay or other was made of his courage, & of the vertue that liued in his followers; making out many fallies of horse, mingled with the best and choycest of his Archers.

In the first booke likewise, the people called Tigurines, which were vnder the city of the Heluetians, all the other three companies hauing passed the Ruer Araura, were surprized and enuironed aside by themselves. And they of the Burrough Verbigena, because they fled away with the other; being afterward brought before Cæsar, they were receiued as open enemies. The Germanes obserued the same order, as Tacitus deliuereth more plainly, where he saith. And that which principally did encourage them, was; that not hazard, or an assenbly made at aduerture, or a troupe, or a Squadron; but the families and alliances laboured together. One example hereof in the Germanes, is noted by the that followed Ariouistus, who in the end (as we reade in the first booke) were compelled to send their forces out of the field: and made a generall ordination (by equall interualles) of the Marcomani, Triboci, Vangiones, Nomentani, Segusians and Sueues. Wherefore I conclude, by the words of this passage, that in regard the Army of the Gaules consisted of many Cities; the Souldiours (generally) did diuide themselves, according to the number of the Cities.

The Gaules vsed the Phalanx in their battailes, as the Romanes did their Legions. The Phalanx, subtilly explicated by Aelianus, both in parts and parcels, to bee of an equall number, eight times diuided into equal parts; the summary whereof, I thus comprehend. The Phalanx, armed with weighty armours, consisted of foure thousand, ninety fixe men, each ranke whereof, contained in length fixteene Phalangearies, and was teamed Decuria in which bands, the formost man was named Decuria, and the last Verduclitor, that is to say, hee which conducteth the Rereguard or hinderpart. These formost men were also called Præsites of the seconds, by reason of their marching before, and so the third men of the fourth. Contrariwise, the second men were teamed Subsistes to the former: as being vnder them, like as the fourth vnder the third. Thus the Decuria was composed of Præsites & Subsistes, the one following the other. The second Decuria, was called Condecuria, that is to say, conioyned to the Decuria, in such manner, that they all answered both in place and number: Decuria to Decuria, Præsites to Præsites, Subsistes to Subsistes, and they which accompanied, or went along by, were teamed Assites. The ordinary space or distace of the Phalangearies, was foure cubites, but when they closed, two, & when they went in croud, one onely. This was the manner of the Phalanx, obserued by the ancient Gaules.

The battaile of the Heluetians (as is to be seen in the first booke) kept it selfe strongly locked against Cæsar's horsemen, and when the horsemen were repulsed, the Phalanx, which was prepared vnder the first battaillon, advanced it selfe, and set forward. But the Romanes (by the power of their Lauchins) brake the Phalanx of the Heluetians, by reason that they were too strongly locked together: And then, to defend themselves against their Lauchins, they began to disioyn their vniting, & to combine their Targets and Shields, the one with the other, which were in the forme and shape of the shelles of Tortuisses, to receiue and resist the Lauchins dashed at them. In the same booke also, the Germanes hauing suddenly (according to their custome) prepared a Phalanx; withstood the strength of all their Swords. And I perceiue, that this Phalanx was ordered in such manner, not to serue as a defence for their heads; but rather as a Rampier for their breasts. But on the Heluetians day, the Boii, or Boians, and the Tugi, or Tulingians, who came thither for their succour; enclosed the battaile round about with Chariots and baggage, and guarded the rereward. And as the Heluetians (who had the worst, & of whom the greater number were fore wounded) retired, and withdrew themselves into the nearest neighbouring

Thus wee haue heere set downe some forme of that fashion, which the Gaules obserued in preparing their battaile, and that which Heluctius hath spoken thereof, is not much differing from the purpose. That the Gaules, being in battaile, had a custome to sit downe vpon Faggots of Vine branches and small twigs, which they placed in the ground. Now, albeit the reporteth, that Cæsar hath declared the same in the first booke of his Commentaries, yet notwithstanding, I finde no such matter. But forasmuch, as the Gauls (in their battails) are said to sit downe on Faggots: it was a kinde of discipline obserued among the, like to that of the Romane * Triarii, who being ranked in the third battalion, which was the reerward, used to kneele down on their knees, which was termed by the Latines, Subsidere, whence ensued the word Subside as they named it. Songs and Rithmes.

A small matter obserued in Military discipline, & how it was among the Gaules.

I hath bin a vsuall obseruation in all Military discipline, when they prepared to the fight, and so soone as they began to draw their weapons; to make a cry in the loudest manner that they could, & to enflame the Souldiers mindes with the sounde of Trumpets. But the custome of the Gaules, was, not onely with cry of the voyce, and sound of Trumpets: but with a Song, a Dance, loud yelling, clattering of their armour, and brandishing their darts, to make a noise so terrible, as nothing could appeare to be more horrible. The Gaules (saith Diodorus) had loud, big, and rude voyces, & their Trumpets (according to custom) were barbarous, & made a rude harsh sound. But Polybius (in his second booke) sayeth moreouer. The brauadoes & noises of the Celts, were dreadfull to the Romanes: for they had an infinite number of Trumpets and Hobois, with the sound whereof, the whole Army cryed out aloud, making for great a clashing and noyse; that not onely the Clarions & Army echoed the sound, but all the places likewise that did round engirt them. And indeed, the noyse which customarily was made by the Gauls, hath oftentimes bene noted by Titus Livius: but yet hatefully and inuiously, as (for the most part) he was wont to speake of the Gaules. The Gaules (saith he, in his first booke) by singing saugely, and crying out confusedly; filled the ayre with an horrible found. And in the same place: Immediately there were heard songs and noyses disgreceing, as when the Gaules walked (by troopes) about their walles. And afterward in the foure and thirtieth Booke, he saith. The Gaules went marching forward, howling or yelling strangely, and singing according to their confused fashion, shaking their Targets ouer their heads, and brandishing their Darts in their hands. Then againe in the foure and fortieth Booke, speaking of the Gauls which were in Asia, he saith. Beyond all the rest, their singing, when they began the battaile, and their howling, yelling, and dances, couering themselves with their Shields, after the manner of their Country, with the horrible clattering of their armour: all these things were done on deliberate purpose, onely to procure affrightment and terror.

Cæsar toucheth this tumultuous behaviour more lightly, in his first booke, after the ouerthrow of Sabinus & Cottus, where the Gaules hauing the victory, hee speaketh thus of them. Then, according to their wonted custome; they cryed the victory together, and howled loudly. And at another time, in the seauenth Booke, speaking of the Gaules nere vnto Alexia. The Gaules (saith hee) perswading them-felues to be the stronger part, and perceiving the Romanes, that they were pressed with great numbers on all sides: they that were within the Fort, and they that came in their assistance, with a loude cry and yelling, assured the courage of their people. Moreouer, that which gaue greatest terror to the Romanes, was, the loud cry that they made at their backs, in the time of their fighting. It was likewise a custome among the Gaules, to require parlie or conference, by making a loud cry, as by a Trumpet: according as Cæsar in his first Booke, speaking of the Eburons, saith. Then after their vsuall manner, they made a loud cry together, to the end, that some one of the Romanes might come forth, to admit them parlie or conference.

It may appeare now as conuenient, to speake somewhat of those signes which the Gaules used, to signifie, when their hearts were appeased and quieted; when they desired peace; and when they were willing to yeelde themselves. The signe which they used to make, when their hearts were contented and quieted; was, to shew their right shoulders naked. Cæsar, speaking of the Heduns, in his seauenth Booke, saith thus. When euer their right shoulders were seene to be naked: it was their accustomed signe, thereby to declare, that they were contented. The signe of desiring peace, was, to extend or stretch out their hands: as hee speaketh in the second Booke, discoursing on the Bellouasians. The women and children (being on the walles) according to their wonted behauiour; would stretch forth their hands, thereby desiring peace of the Romanes. Which he farther relateth in the seauenth Booke, speaking of the women of Gergouiz: who baring their breasts, and stretching out their hands vpon the walles, required mercy of the Romanes. In the same place also, hee declareth what signe they used, when they were willing to submit themselves. The Heduns holding vp their hands; gaue notice thereby, that they would yeelde themselves. And holding downe their armes, they requested thereby, that their liues might be saued.

But perhaps these things may seeme to be of slender account: therefore I will conclude the noyses made by the Gaules, and search into the behauiour of the Germans, whether they were of like condition, or no. It should seeme, that it was the Barrit of the Germans, whereof Tacitus maketh such mention. They had certain pleasant Songs and Rithmes, at the sound whereof; that which they termed Barrit, enflamed their courages; and by the Song, they prefiged the end and fortune of the future battaile. For they were cheered or dismayed, according as the Army made the noyse; and this accord in singing, seemed not to consist so much in the voyce, as in vertue. They did principally respect the rudenes of found, and confused noise of the noyse; by holding their Targets before their mouths, to the end that the voyce (being made thereby the greater and fuller) might resound the louder and stronger. Such then was the noyse of the Gaules chiefly when they came to the shock or brunt, and when they would come their Souldiers courages: for they (when Gaules (alwaies) had some part) this encouragement. You will haue credit, that mens hearts would be more enflamed, by the exhortations and teares of their dearest wiues; the they could be by the sound of Trumpets and Cornets. The prooffe hereof, is to be seene in the 7. Book, when at Gorgouiz, the mothers of the Families began to pray with earnest affection, and to shew their haire disheueled, after the Gaulish manner, and to make presents of their young infants. Such was the exhortation at the siege of * Massyia, after that all the Ships on the Sea were readily prepared; at the instant entreaties & teares of the old men, of the mothers of the families and their daughters, who desired the to succour the City in extreme necessity: they had no lesse heart and resolution, to mount into those Ships, then they had before in fighting the battaile. Then might easily be discerned, both from the Camp of * C. Trebonius, and all the places of highest prospect in the City; how all the youth that remained within it, and all the oldest men, with their wiues and young children, stood as publike guardes, and (vpon the walles) helde vp their hands to heauen, or ran to the Temples of the immortal Gods, where prostrating themselves before their Images, they entreated victory of the Gods.

This hath some resemblance with that which

which is written of the Germanes, in the first booke. And the women, holding vp their hands to the Souldiers, which were going to the warre, with teares entreated them, that they would not suffer them to fall into the feruitude of the Romanes. Therefore, when the Germanes were ready to fight, such things as were in their deereſt eſteeme (as Tacitus reporteth) they would haue in ſome place neere vnto them: where the out-cries of their wives, and lamentings of their children, might eſtream be heard; theſe ſerued them as moſt ſacred witneſſes, and theſe were their cheefeſt commendations. They would bring the wounded perſons to their mothers and wiues, and they feared not to number and ſtucke their hurts; carrying good to them, and any thing that might partem them againe to the fight. Some ſay, that diuers battels, which began ſuddenly to quail and breake aſunder: were as ſuddenly re-enforced, and purſued by the women, once through the conſtancy of their praier, beating their hands on their naked breſts, & ſetting before their eies, the danger of their neere enſuing captiuitie, which they feared the more impatiently, in regard of their Wiues and Children. Wherefore the wiues of marriall minded men, did declare themſelues alſo no leſſe valiant and reſolute.

But Cesar, in attributing very great courage to the Gaules, doth yet (I know not how) reproch them, with a quite contrary negligence or cowardice. For, like as the hearts of the Gaules (ſaith he in his third Booke) are prompt and deliberate, for the attempting of warre: euen ſo is their courage dull, and weak in reſiſtance, to ſupport any miſchances. In briefe (as we may reade in the eighth Booke) a man cannot well iudge, whether the Gaules are more inſolent, when their affaires do go neuer ſo little ſucceſſfully with them; then they are eaſie to be affrighted, when neuer ſo little harme befalls them. This is that alſo, which Titus Livius reprehendeth with ſuch inſolence, as euery where he ceaſeth not to taxe them with ſomewhat fauouring of the ſame nature. As in the fifth Booke concerning the gowned Gaules. The Gauliſh nation are accuſtomed to colde and raine; but they cannot any way endure eyther duſt or heate. In the tenth Booke. The bodies of the Gaules, which cannot abide trauaile or heat, do yet melt themſelues with ſweating. They enter fight like more then men; but their illiſſe is leſſe then women. In the 37. Booke. Their big bones that can ſuffer no labor, will toile with weigthy Armour on their backs. In the 40. Booke. Heate and trauaile are yreſome to the Gaules quaggy bodies, becauſe they are not able to endure thiſt. In the 48. Booke, ſpeaking of the Gaules of Italia. If their firſt aſſault be endured, which they ruſh into with boyling courage, and blindfold fury; their lazie members will melt themſelues into ſweate, and the weapons will fall out of their hands. The Sun, duſt, and drought, without imployment of any weapon againſt them, doth dul their foggy bodies, and abate their ſteameſt courage, if they hot rage and fury be once ouer-paſſed.

Tacitus giueth theſe ſame dull diſpoſition to the Germanes. Their great bodies (ſaith he) that haue no other ſtrength, then (at the firſt on-let) to ſlew theſelues forward: are not accuſtomed to ſupport (with any patience) either paines, buſines, thiſt, heate, colde or hunger. How doth this hold together? According to the iudgement which Cesar hath giuen of the Gaules? Are they both moſt valiant, and yet foggy fellows alſo? Vndoubtedly, al the Gaules are reported to be (euen naturally,) martiall and valorous, and being exerciſed in military diſcipline, they are the more hardened againſt any trauel; but wanting exerciſe, they grow the more foggy & ydle. Cuſtome and viſe do teach mento ſupport any toyle, and to hold good defence againſt all danger; in the trauaile of warlike diſcipline, admitteth neyther ſincerie or ſoſtneſſe. If we meeete with ſome old Souldier, who, becauſe he is expert in warre, is feareleſſe of blowes: If likewiſe a new freſh Souldier be brought in, that hath his hart as ſtout and reſolute, & as yet vnexperienced; yet his beſt courage will appeare to be but womanliſh: ſo writeth Cicero in his ſecond Tufculan.

Tenderneſſe and ſoſtneſſe is reprehended in the Gauliſh Souldiers; as namely by Percingetorix, and Critognatus, one of the Aruerni, in the ſeventh Booke. For there he ſaith, that the Gaules deſired to fight, in regard of their ſoft and tender diſpoſition, becauſe they cannot long endure any toyle. The ſame man at the councell which was holden among them that were beſieged in Alexia, and ſtood in great ſtreſſe, through want of victualles: againſt ſuch as were of the minde, to hazard all at once ſally, he ſaid. This is indeed more cowardice, weakneſſe, and no ſigne of courage, or any ſort of vertue, to declare your ſelues vnable, to endure death & ſearſity for ſhort a while. Prooue may be produced, of more men that gladly offered themſelues to death, then could patiently ſuſtaine greeſe or annoyance. It is not then to be doubted, but prompt & ſtout courage, eſpecially in warlike enterpriſes, was hereditary (both by nature and race) to the Gaules nation, and that this ſoft or tender complexion, grew through lacke of exerciſe, in military diſcipline. For, if a Gaule had bene once well enſtructed, by a Maſter, ſkillfull in the arte of warre: where was any Souldier to bee found, that could more ably endure all labour? If thou doe inferre any doubt in this caſe, prooue thereof was made by Cesar himſelfe: For Cesar leuied fix Legions of the Gaules, becauſe he could raiſe no more then foure of his owne Common-wealth. Cafars horſe-men were knowne to be Gaules, and thereupon, after he came to the head of all his enterpriſes: hee naturalized all thoſe Legions, which not onely were Gaules by Nation, but they retained (beſide) the name of * Alauda. Wherefore, this ſoſtneſſe in the new or young experienced Souldiers, was as common to the Romanes as Gaules; and was no otherwiſe proper, eyther to the Gaule or Germane Nation.

But Titus Livius, with I know not how many Greekes, is too iniurious and ſuppartable againſt the name of a Gaul, and forgets wiſhall, the kindneſſe which hee ought to his Country, and to the law of hiftory. For, although hee much better affected, to make the Venetes or Venetians, to defend from the traitor Antenor, then from the Nobility of the venetian Gaules, as Strabo hath done, and the Romanes approve the ſame, placing the Venetes or Venetians in Gallia Togata; yet thereby hee maketh himſelfe to be a Gaule. And the law of hiftory doth command, that in the relating of a hiftory, he ſhould ſtand cleare from ſuſpition of being touched with fauour or hatred. But whereas he reprocieth the gowned Gaules and Affians, with the ydle matter of cold, becauſe they d velt in the hotteſt Countreies, and ſuch as were neerer to the Sunne, then the * Palatinus or Patavinus, among whom Titus Livius was borne; doth he not mocke himſelfe as fooliſhly as can be deuifed? As for the Gaule Souldier which Cesar had, and who was the very braueſt man of all other whatſoeuer: this man belveth him manifeſtly. And it appeareth very probably, that Cesar had to deale with thoſe men onely in that Gaule: but in the other partes of the world, hee fought againſt women, in regard of thoſe men hee found in this Nation.

Of the difference betweene the Souldiers of Cesar, and of Pompey, being the valiant Gaules, in comparing them with the Romanes: As alſo of the Spaniards and the Gaules, and what cunning they learned of the Romanes.

OW, to ſpeake of Cafars Souldier againſt the Souldier of Pompey, that is to ſay, the valiant Gaul, what was hee againſt the Romanes? In the third Booke of the ciuill warres, Cesar ſaith: The Army of Pompey was not accuſtomed to ſiues taking. Why then Titus Livius, by the purity of his eloquence, which Quintilian compared to the whitenneſſe of milke, hath drawne the Spaniards and Gaules from the corners of the world, onely to make himſelfe liſtened vnto, according as Saint Hierome writeth. Notwithſtanding, in this delicacy of ſoſtneſſe, of not enduring paine, heate, thiſt, nor duſt, which hee reprehendeth in the Souldiers of Gaules, himſelfe ſheweth the ſoſtneſſe and affection of his owne ſpirit, which cannot any way abide equity, the grauity of hiftory, ſoundneſſe of iudgement, and truerly. For, to be ſoſt, or hardened againſt toyle, is not any thing that proceedeth eyther from Nations or race, but by breeding and diſcipline.

Cæsar then did but right, in giving to the men of Gaul a great courage, & truly warlike: and yet neuer thelesse, he discouereth in this great minde or spirit, a certaine want of discipline, or much rather hereproueth a kinde of simpleness, and an ill aduised assurance of their strength, which was the fault that was most noted in their warres, according as Strabo writeth in his fourth Booke.

The Gaules very easily assembled together in great number, because they were simple of spirit, still followed iustice, right and truth, being moued and affected by the losses of their neighbours. Whereupon it happened, that the more easily they were chased out of their Country: because in assembling all their forces, or rather their whole families and friends, they were throwne out by them that proued the stronger. The Romans did much more easily subdue them, then they could do the Spaniards: for the wars in Spaine were begun long time before theirs, and yet notwithstanding, they were brought to end after theirs. And betweene both these times, they conquered all the Gauls, that were betweene the Rheine and the Pyrenean Mountaines: for in coming to the field so many together, they were ouerthrowne by multitudes together. But the Spaniards managed their battailes more sparingly, and, euen as if they had a desire to some affected kinde of monies: so did they preserve them from one time to another, and from Country to Country, making their warre still cautiouly, like unto cheques.

And that which Strabo hath written, may sufficiently bee perceived by the examples of Cæsar. The whole City of the Helvetians, there being all the people of twelue Townes, and of forty Villages: did fight all at one instant, and in one instant all were all ouerthrowne. Such was the league of fiftene people of the Belgians. Such was the reuolting of the Armonians in the warre of the Ventes, or Venicians. Such was the conspiracy of the Aquitains against Craffus. In briefe, did not all Gaul put it selfe in Armes, and was it not wholly conquered in one warre, neere vnto Alexia? The Gaules in the eight yeare of their warre, both well feild and knew this fault, as Hirtius saith, and that in regard of some great numbers, which still were afsembled in one place; it exceeded possibility to retit the Romans. But if diuers Cities (at one selfe same time) had made warre in diuers places: the Romane Army could neither haue had sufficient succour, leysure or forces, to vndertake all at once.

Neuerthelesse, the Gaules were not all-ways of so simple and open spirit: but at some-times they declared more cunning, and holpe themselves by some surprizes. Cæsar, (as Suetonius saith) neuer suffered any one occasion of warre to bee lost, were it neuer so vniuersal, setting as soone on the allied and leagued, as on enemies: and yet notwithstanding, all the warres which he made, hee still paliated with good & sufficient colours of reason. The Eburone-Gaules payed Cæsar with his owne vnfairfull dealing. For these Gaules aduertising the Romane with the conspiracy, which all the Gaules had agreed on together: made him beleue, that if hee would come, and leaue the field, they would giue him free passage. Through this deceit, a Legion, and fise Cohorts or Companies (with Cotta and Sabinus, which ledde them) were all vanquished. And albeit, that the Romane was then alike in number and strength to the Gaules (as Cæsar confesseth) yet was he foyled by the Gaules subtilty, who had learned this craft of Cæsar, and therewith repayed him.

Hirtius recounteth the like ambuscadoes of the Belouisi, or Belouianes, who hauing vnderstood the lodging of the Romane horsemen: tooke a number of light and nimble spirited footemen, and en-ambushed them in a place thickly couered with wood. On the morrow, they sent certaine horses thither, which might allure the Romans out, into the compasse of the ambuscament, and when they were once in it, they presently charged them. And the fortune of this mis-happe fell on the men of Rheimis, who were appointed as Guards there that day. For they hauing seene (too suddenly) the enemies horse-men, and knowing them-selves to exceede them greatly in number, making no account of so fewe as they seemed to bee: they rushed forth, and ouer-hotly pursued them, euen vntill they were (on all sides) enuironed by the Foote-men to their no little astonishment, which caused them to retire much sooner, then skirmishes of horsemen were wont to do; hauing lost Crassus, Prince of the Citie, and cheefe Commander of the horsemen. This shewed no simpleness in the Gaules, but mere cunning, learned of the Romans.

In the very same place, Hirtius declarereth the like cunning stratageme; as that which Hannibal vied, to deceyue Fabius. The Belouians (saith he) perceiving that the Romans were ready to pursue them, and that they could not (without danger) passe the night, or sojourn longer where they were: they deliuered (by Oath) from hand to hand, the Agons and small bushes whereon they rested to sit, and whereof they had great store in the fildes, all which they placed before their Army: and at the ending of day-light (upon a signe suddenly giuen) they set them all on fire. So the flames, which followed in selfe in great length, immediately burnede, that the enemy could not discover their Forces: and which being done, the Gaules very speedily withdrew themselves.

Cæsar, albeit he could not perceiue that the enemy was gone, in regard of the fire so made before them: yet notwithstanding suspecting that they had done this device, to the end that they might flye, caused his Legions to march on, and sent out troupes of horsemen to pursue them. And yet being mistrustful of some surprisall, doubting lest the enemy might still lurke there, with intent to allure the Romans to some disadvantage, hee marched on the more aduiscfully. The horsemen, fearing to enter the smoke, and if any one (by ouermuch forwardnes) did enter, hee could not see any thing before or behind him: grew all suspitions of some secret ambush, & so gaue leysure to the Belouians to retire thence. Thus the enemy, by means of a figne (full of feare & crast) hauing marched about ten miles of the country, without sustaining the least losse, fastned their campe in a very strong place.

Oftentimes thenceforward, & by many ambushes both of horse & foot, they did great damages to the Romans, in their wandering abroad, stealing and foraging: whereby it should appeare, that the attempts fauoured rather of a Punick spirit then of a Gaulish. And yet neuerthelesse, when all came to al (as we like to say) they were surprized by the hands of their mailers, & by the selfesame deceits & subtil-ties which they had learned of Cæsar. And to the end it might bee noted, that the Gauls had no more cunning or craft then what they learned of the Romans: the Helvetians (as Orosius writeth in his first Booke) surprized the Consul Cassius, with all his Army, by an ambuscado. But I haue concluded with my selfe, not to omit one manner of ambushing, which was the most marvellous of all those that euer I read of, or heard reported; whereby the Prætor Posthumus was ouerthrowne of the Boian Gaules, as Titus Livius reporteth in his 33. booke.

While matters went on in these doubts and vncertainties, tidings came of another losse; according as fortune (in this yeare) still re-charged one vpon another. And these were the Newes, that Lucius Posthumus, designed Consul, was ouercome in Gaul, both he and his Armie. There was a verie great Forrest, which the Gauls called Litana, thorough which Forrest, he was to passe his Army. The Gaules, on both sides of the passage, had cut and hewne the Trees of the Forrest in such sort; that (yet notwithstanding) they parted not from the trunk or bodie, but must endure hard thrusting and enforcement, before they could possibly get the fall.

Posthumus had two Romane Legions, and had leauied to many people, allyed vnto the Romans, that hee brought into the enemies Countrey, well neere the number of fise and twenty thousand men of Warre. The Gaules, who were ambushed in the Forrest, when the Armie was entered within the VVood; threw downe the afore said hewne vnder-growing branches, which were apted so for the present purpose; that falling still thickly one vpon another, without any possible meanes of restraining them, they ouer-turned (pell-mell) both Men and Horses, in such manner, that (very hardly, and with much paines taking) tenne men of them escaped. For the greater part were slaine, by the falling of the huge branches and annes of Trees on them; and the Armed Gaules, that held possession of all the VVood, put the rest vnto death, who were not a little affrighted at this so strange misadventure. Verie few (of so great a number) were taken; who in going to the bridge of the riuer, were impeached by the enemy, who formerly had gotten the mastery thereof. This is all that Titus Livius hath written, concerning this notable accident to the Gaules.

CHAP. IX.

In what manner the Gaules fortified their Cities and Townes; and what Engines they employed for their owne defence.

VT this is enough already spoken, concerning the manner of behaviour among the Gaules, as well in ranged battails, as in ambuscadoes: it remaineth now to speak, how they fortified their Cities and Townes, and contrarywise, how they were besieged. How was it then that the Gaules strengthened and fortified their Townes, and what Engines had they whereby to defend themselves? There need no wonderment be made, at the fortification of the Asterini, Nerviani, Comani, Aduaticae, and Eburones, because they had no Townes at all. And thence ensued it, that the Aduaticae marvelled so strangely, to behold the warlike Engines of the Romanes; whereof it is thus written in the second Booke. Being fortified with a rampier of twelue foote high, which had fifteene thousand Towers and strong Bastils nere to each other; the Romanes kept themselves within that Fort. Afterward, when the trailes and platformes were ready prepared, mounted aloft, and a Tower to be raised some long distance off, at the beginning of these vnwonted works, the Gaules beganne to laugh on their walles, and lowdly to mocke at them, maruelling what they did vnder take so farre off, and with so huge an Engine, or how it should be possible, that the hands and strength of men (especially of so meane stature) could promise any hope to themselves, of coming nere to their walles, with a Tower of so great a composition. But when they (soone after) perceyued, that this mighty frame moued from place to place, and approached nere vnto their walles: being astonished at a matter of such nouelty, and sight vnaccustomed; they sent their Ambassadors vnto Cæsar, to entreate peace; who answered them, That they must thinke, that the Romanes neuer made any warre, without the speciall fauour of the Goddess: seeing they could advance (and in so short a while) an Engine of such height, to fight both farre off, and nere at hand; and therefore they should submit themselves, and all their goods to his mercy. Thus spake Cæsar. It would require so much speech (saith Cicero in his second Tusculanes) concerning the new fouldier, & the old: that if wee make comparison of one that hath not bene exercised with him which is tried and skillfull; he will appeare no otherwise, then merely as a woman. All which notwithstanding, the very selfsame Gaule, being entrusted in the Discipline of Cæsar, seemed as a God to another Gaule, that neuer had knowledge in that Art.

But let vs leave these Belgians which dwell so farre off, and come vnto such as were more ciuillized, as the Suessones, and the Bellouasians. The Suessones (saith Cæsar in his second booke) when as the Treilles were prepared against Nouiodunum, one of their cheefe Townes, and that the platforme was mounted together vwith the Treilles: as men amazed at so great an enterprize, and such strange works, which the Gaules had neuer seene or heard of, yet so speedily performed by the Romanes; they sent their Ambassadors toward Cæsar, to entreate that they might yeeld themselves. The Bellouasians also, hauing not (as yet) seen such Engines, wherewith Townes were battered, but only hearing report made of them, surrendered the Towne of Bratupanium. Wherefore, if the Gaules (as Cæsar affirmeth) had neuer either seene or heard speech of such instruments, vntill that verie time: why then should we make any maruelling, That the Gaules, who had not yet learned such cunning, were conquered by other Gaules, that had knowledge in them? Now, whether this place in Cæsar, which treateth of the Belgians, was purposely written, or (at the least) may seeme not to bee vwritten according vnto truth, there the question remaineth. For, the Gaules made their their walles with strong beames of wood, which were not planted vp on one end: but couched downe, & ioyned together, with spaces of earth betweene each two beames, whereof Cæsar speaketh thus in his seventh booke. All the walles (saith he) of the Gaules, were (well nere) made after this manner. They laid beames of wood straite out along on the ground, and followed after stil in the same order, making equal distance betweene them, about the space of two foote in breadth. These beames or plaits, as some terme them, were reuersed and bound within, with strong forced earth, and the equal distances (whereof we haue spoken) were filled vp with great stones, which fronted the wall forward. After that this rowe was all along thus ranged and ordered; another like frame was laid thereon, after the same manner; yeto, that the beames betweene both, did guard and keepe the maiue Timber from touching each other. And being distanced also by the selfe-same spaces: they were knit and shut fast together, by great stones cast in betweene them. And so, consequently, all the whole work shapeth it selfe in this manner, even till the wall was perfected to a reasonable height.

Now, concerning this kinde of building, ouer and beside, that it was no way miſhapen, by the order kept in the leveling, and fitting both the beames & stones aptly to each other: euen so it was greatly commodious, in seruing for the defence of their Townes. For the stones were apt and proper, to impeach the force of fire, and the beames and other matter, brake and resisted the blowes of battery. Because, they being bound together inwardly, and knit to the Timber beames running all along, containing (for the most part) in thicknesse, the measure of forty foote; could (by no means) be forced to sinke, or be otherwise dismembred. Hereby then it may appeare, that the Gaules knew some-what for the fortification of their Cities and Townes; yea, and how to defend themselves also, by such means as were vſed in the warres.

In the third yeare of the warre in Gaul, the Santone-Aquitaines were besieged by Craſſus and his men, both with Treilles and Towers: but they resisted him valiantly, one while, by making faillies out vpon them, another while, by vndermining, till they came to the great planted platforme, which formerly had bene provided, by means of the treilles. To which vndermining (saith Cæsar) the Aquitaines were well inured because they had Mines of Copper and Brasse in many places. So much Cæsar wrote, approving, that the Aquitaines knew well enough how to defend a Towne or City; because they had Copper Mines, which made them there-in very skillfull. It is saide also, that the Celtes (for the same cause) knew well how to defend themselves at the siege of Auaricum: because they had very deep Mines of Iron in their Country. For Auaricum being courageously assailed by the Romanes, the Gaules found out all sorts of inuentions (as Cæsar saith in his seventh Booke) whereby to giue impeachment to the most singular enterprizes of the Romane Soldiers: as hauing (by naturall inclination) a very ingenious and subtil spirit, apt to follow and counterfeite all things, and whatsoever they sawe done by others.

First, for the Romane Falks, they could overthrow it by a snare or grinne, and when it was remounted, they would againe hurle it downe with their Engines. They couered all their walles with towers made of skinnes, and equalled the height of those towers made by the Romanes, with masts made in their owne turrets. In making their faillies abroad; eyther they would throw fires into the platforme; or suddenly surprize the amazed Romanes; or by vndermining, ouerthrow the maine fortification. Whereunto (indeede) they were the more apt and ready; because they had great yron Mines in their Country, and knew (beside) all kinds of deluding into the ground. By leauing their Mines open, they impeached and tardyed the Romanes preparations: mingling fire with pitch and other matter, made apt to burne whereſoeuer it fel, and tumbling downe great stones also, to keepe them from approaching nere to their walles. By these cited places it appeareth euidently, that the Gaules had attained vnto some indifferent knowledge, how and which way to defend a City: but to speak truly, it was more through their continual exerciſe in their Mines, then by any cunning they had learned in the arte Military.

And this is that whereof Vercingetorix complained, comforting the Gaules at the taking of Avaricum. That the Romans had not wonne the victory, either by vertue or battaile: but by a kinde of science and cunning, which they had in the battning downe of Townes, wherein the Gaules had no knowledge. By which words, that place of Caesar which concerned all the Gaules in general, seemeth to be true: That the Gaules had neuer seene, or heard any report, of Plattformes, Treilles, nor Towers. But bee it so, that the ancient Gaules neuer knew any such Art, as the Romans did; yet there was no want of courage in them. For, it is a matter very marvellous, which Caesar himselfe speaketh of them in his tenth Booke, in remembering their constancy, for guard and defence of their Cities and Townes.

The Gaules, in the warres of the *Cimbrians and *Teutones, being wholly constrained to retire themselves into such places as were strongest, and being there also oppressed with great famine & lacke of victuals: they did yet maintaine their liues by feeding on the bodies of such, as both appeared, and were not able indeed to do any further seruice in the warre, & would (by no means) yeeld to their enemies.

Crittognates, who was a man of great ranke among the Atrernians, held a verie strong opinion in counsell, that it was good to put the same in practise for the defence of Alexia; and although hee had made no vie thereof before, yet hee earnestly maintained the fitnessse and necessity thereof, onely for liberty, and that it was worthy to bee left (as a memorable custome) to posterity. This opinion helde such account amongst the other Gaules, that they were of the mind, to assay all other means whatsoever, then to doe according as Crittognates had aduised. And yet notwithstanding, if there wer such vrgent necessity, and ayde tardied too late in coming; that it was most behoouefull to credit his iudgement, rather then to yeeld, or listen to peace-making, vpon enforced or violent composition. Such was the courage of the ancient Gaules.

Now this kinde of defence, which they vied for safeguarding their townes, though it proceeded from no meane Vertue in them, yet it did not tellish of any great discipline. In what manner also they assailed Townes, was without any craft or subtle device. For they neuer help themselves, either by Plattformes, Rampiers, Treilles, or Towers, as it is described in the second booke. The Gaules and the Belgians, had both one manner of assaulting Cities, to saith Caesar. For after they had ringed (after the order of crowding together) a great number of men about the Town; they would hurle heaps of stones vp on the wall, vntill they had lett it naked of men. Then, winding and turning, according as occasion serued, they approached to the gates, and vndermined the walles. Thus then their whole manner of making war in places fortified with rampiers and ditches, doeth giue vs to vnderstand, that the heart and courage of the Gaules was very great; and yet very little or no discipline at all vied amongst them. Let this then suffice, to acquaint yew with the order of their land seruice.

CHAP. X.

Of the seruice on the Sea, or other waters, vsed by the Gaules: And what Ships and Vessels they had among them. Also, into what farre remote countries they extended their name.

Concerning that which they performed on the Sea, as it is described in the warres against the Brittaines and *Venetes, it appeareth to taste of vertue, although it was simple, and without any great cunning. Caesar describeth it in all parts, with the matter and manner of such ships or vessels, as the Gaules then vied, speaking thus. Their ships were made and armed in this manner. The keeles of them were much larger then those of the Romanes Ships: to the end, that they might the more easily sustaine the ebbing and flowing of the Sea. Their Prowes were highly raysed, and their Poppes also: because they were the more apt to binde the power of great Waves and Tempests. All their Shippes were made of Oake, to endure all injury and violence that could happen. The hankes were made of timber beames, about a foute in thicknesse: and they

they were toyed or fastened together with iron nales of great bignesse. Their Anchors (in stead of Cables) were made fast with chaines of iron: and for want of other sailes, they made vse of skinned and hides, which were soft and pliable with currying and paring. And either through the want of hempe, or knowledge how to vse it (which is the more likely) they imagined, that if they vied other sailes, they could not resist so manie tempests of the Ocean, and such impetuous windes as daily arose, neither so commodiously conuay such great burthens as they carried in their vessels.

In another passage of the fourth booke he sheweth, that the Gallies, whereof hee himselfe made seruice, both against the Brittaines and the Venetes, had not bene vied on the Ocean, vntill that instant time. For, the Romanes being somewhat hardly pressed by the Britains, on the shore of the Ocean; Caesar commanded, that the gallies (which these poor barbarous people were not wont to see, & which could be managed most readily in any business) should be set apart distant from the other ships, and that they should be moued by the strength of Oares: to the end, that they might be ranged against the flanke of the enemy, which was discouered; and whence they might repulse and recoil the enemy by the dint of their weapons, and Engines of warre, which auailed the Romanes very greatly. For the ignorant people, being amazed at the fashion of those vessels, and the moouing of their Oares, as also the manner of their vnaccustomed Engines, stayed their proceedings, and (soone after) retired.

Thus farre we haue heard the ancient fashions and behaviour which the Gaules vied in actions of warre, and which haue bene collected out of many places: declaring them to be much greater in naturall strength, then in the course of Martiall discipline. Whereby we may perceiue (in regard that their warres were managed by vertue, & not by any lights, cunning, or trumperys) they were the masters of all or most nations. For they pursued their purpose, euen as Geographers were wont to doe, to make all the Earth habitable, euen from the Suns setting, so farre as his rising. Britaine, Spaine, Italy, Germany, Illyria, Pannonia, Greece, Macedonia, yea, Asia it selfe, can declare the Empire of the Gaules. For Brittain, which was along the sea coast (as Caesar saith in his first booke) had bene conquered by them that passed from Belgia, going thither for pillage, and to make warre; and they named themselves according to all the Cities titles from whence they issued; and hauing made warre there, they they inhabited, and began to plough and husband the grounds. VVhat shall we say of *Celtiberia? Doth it not deliuer sufficient testimony, that Spaine was subdued by them? For, to what purpose else should Lucane say?

The Celts departing from the ancient Gaules, Renowned their name as farre as Iberus.

But it may be, that Italy came not vnder the government of the Gaules: Yes, that it did foundly, and at the same time when Tarquinius Priscus reigned. The Hittariges, Aruernians, Senones, Hedunns, Ambarrians, Carnates, and Aulentes, vnder conduct of the Salluinians, Boians, & *Lingones, preuailed so farre, that that Italy, which reacheth along from the Alps, confining still to the Apennines, and so farre on as the riuier Rubicon, became Gaule. And finally, after that they had ouerthrowne the Romanes neere to Alia, they tooke Rome and burned it; and hauing agreed for a thousand poundes of gold, they sold the Capitoll (which they kept besieged) to the rest of the Romanes which were enclosed therein. And hath not furious Germany borne the yoke of Gaule? In elder times (saith Caesar in his sixth Booke) the Gaules excelled the Germanes in vertue. For the Polce and Teutoages, vnder the conduct of Sigoufus, possessed themselves of the most fertile places in Germanie, euen those which were neerest to the Forrest Hercynia, as Titus Livius also relateth.

Tacitus maintaineth, that the Colonies of the Heluetians & Boians were brought into the same place. But those Gaules, the conquerors of Germany, being made bold and hardy, by such simplicity in diet as the Germanes vied, extended themselves much further, and the renowne of their name, went (with great honor) thorough Illyria, Pannonia, Greece, Macedonia, Thrace, and Asia, according as Iustine (following Trogu) declareth more at large. And the name of a people, which were Natives of the Countrey; but were chased and expelled from their dwellings by another people, in regard of their continuall warres, and thorow the inundations of the Sea, they landed on the hither Islands, and in the Countrey on this side the rheme. Some also holde, that after the destruction of Troy, a small number of people which fled from the Greekes, wandering all about: cam at last into this country, which till then was empty. But the inhabitants of this land (more then any thing els can) do assure this, which wee have also seene engraven in their Monuments, that Hercules, the son of Amphitruo, made all possible speede to rinate the cruell Tyrants Gerton and Tauriscus, one of which over-awed Spain, and the other Gallia. After he had conquered them both, he had private knowledge of some women of noble race; by whom, he had many Children, that styled (by their owne name) all those places where they commanded.

It is likewise further maintained, that the Phocenses which lived in Asia, flying from the cruelty of Harpagus, Lieutenant to King Cyrus, betooke themselves to sea, and came into Italy; one part whercof, founded the Towne of Phelis, and the other Massilia in Pennois. Within some while after, when their forces were increased, they fortified a great number of Cities and Townes. But we must breake off this variety, which gladly would keep company with pleasing satiety. Afterwards, when these places were (by little and little) civilized, and reclaimed from rudenesse by men: the study of learning (which is most commendable) began to appear in some splendour, by the Bards, Enbages, and Druides.

Marcellus reporteth this of Hercules, agreeing therein with Berosus. For Berosus saith, that Galates (by consent of her parents) was begotten with child by Hercules, at his returne out of Spain; and that of her was borne Galata, of whom the Gauls received their name Galates. Therefore, the antiquity of the Gaules Discipline and Learning, maketh it self known by these testimonies.

But in what Discipline and Learning (perhaps) thou wilt aske me? I answer, in Grammar, Rhetoricke, Logicke, Mathematicke, Physick, Theology. Grammar instructed to reade, and frame Letters; and this Art was such from those times, when as the tongues were in their entire condition: and that the neighbouring strangers had not (as yet) corrupted them. For so Plato in his Philebus grounded the Greeke Grammar. Here (me thinks) I vnderstand in this place, that which many good and learned spirits have questioned, to wit, what were the Letters of the Ancient Gaules? Casfar, in his sixt book confirmeth, that they were Greeke Letters. They thought (saith he) that it was the duty, to set down their disciplines in writing; howbeit, that almost in all their other affairs, as well common, as particular, they used the Greeke letters. In this place, Casfar speaketh not obscurely, but directly and plainly; that the Gaules made use of the Grecian Letters, that is to say, these Characters α, β, γ, &c. He deliviereth some proof hereof in the first Book, that in the camp of the Heluetians, there were found little Table bookes, written with Greeke Letters. Most true it is, Casfar calleth those Greeke Letters, which the Gaules then used; but I call them Gaul Letters, & will maintaine, that they neuer came out of Greece into Gaul; but on the contrary, that they went out of Gaul into Greece.

As concerning the man, who is sayde to be the first inuenter of Letters, verie great question had beene made thereof: and Plinio hath debated the matter by diversity of opinions. So that the inuention of Letters, is not proper or peculiar vnto any one Nation, according as hee thinketh; but (from all antiquity) they had bin vied. Cadmus (if the booke be true which is allowed to one named Xenophon) as is affirmed by som, was the first that brought Letters (to the number of sixteen) from Phoenicia into Greece, the which were verie like to the Characters of the Gallates and Mæns. Hereby may be coniectured, that Letters came from the Gallates vnto the Greekes. Now, finding not only a verie likely coniecture, but a certaine proof also, by the report and account of Times; maintaining, that the discipline of the Semnotheans, or Samotheans, Sarronides, Druides, and Bardes, did flourish in Gaul for so many yeares before Cadmus went into Greece: there neede no doubt to be made, but that the Gauls characters were in use in Gaul, for so many yeares before

Whether the Gaules spake Greeke or no.

And this is that, which Varro (in his seauenth booke of the Latine tongue) maketh openly knowne. For Crates a Greeke, had formerly made a Grammarian question in Greece, demanding what was the reason why Alpha might not be called Alphator? The other grammarians Greekes answered: These wordes are none of ours, but are wholly barbarian. In this place then the Greekes do plainly confesse, that these Letters were none of theirs. And, consenting heere to, Aristotle conuileth to his Magitian (according as I haue already sayde) That Philosophy received originally from the Semnotheans, or Samotheans of the Celts. And last of all, that Gaul had bin the Mistress of all Greece.

I know verie well, that Strabo speaketh of the Gaules, that they affected the Greekes: in so much, that whatsoever bargaines or conuention was made amongst them, they wrote thereof into Greece, & that they adding themselves to the study of eloquence, & of Philosophy, as the Greekes did, kept in pay or wages, professors of the liberrall Artes, as also they did the like by Physitians. But Strabo wrote this of the Massilians, and of their neighbours, at such time as Tiberius held the Empire, and when the great Lords of Rome (as himselfe writeth) caused their children to bee sent no more to Athens, then they did to Marfles, there to follow their studious exercise. It must needs then be verie certaine, that we learned the Gauls doctrine of Dis, Samothes, Sarron, Druid, Bardus, and those other ancient masters, when Greece did not so much as onely thinke on Letters.

Some may conceit, that we speak of Paradoxes, against all reason: but I cannot comprehend, why such men as haue heard so many Authors speake, that carry credite and authority (among all) in other things, should reproach theyr praises of their owne Countrey, by a peruerse opinion of iudgement. But it may bee, that al these things do serue vs to no purpose, in regard that (concerning this matter) wee may bee pressed with nouell Arguments: because the Gaules (as some will say) did speake Greeke, therefore did they make use also of Greeke Letters. But let me much rather tel them, that in, & from the time of Casfar, the Gaules did not vnderstand the Greeke tongue, that they could speak it in any mean measure. Herin I haue Casfar for my warrant; for thus he writeth in his fifth Booke. We presumed so farre (saith hee) with one of the Gaules horsemen, only by powerfull promises: that he undertooke to carry a Letter to Cicero, which he had written in Greeke Characters, to the end, that if it happened into the enemies hand, they might not know our secrets. Casfar speaking this, I conclude thereby, that the enemies of Casfar and the Gaules, vnderstood not a letter written in Greeke, nor the language thereof.

And hee that will looke a little neerer, cannot probably proue to himselfe (though some others hold it for most certain) that the popular Gaules vnderstood any thing in that language: but that the cheefe and principall Heads of each Commonweale knew the Greeke tongue, as now . . . they they do the Latine. I say moreover, that whosoever maketh heedfull obseruation, will finde, that this cannot any way bee proued for truth. Because it is most certaine, that in so great an army of enemies, there must needs be some men of marke, of Townes good store. Nay, that which is more, I haue learned of Casfar himselfe, that the worthy Druides, who were the masters and Doctors of the Gauls youth, did not know the Greeke tongue. For Dimitrius, one of the Hebæans, according to the testimony of Cicero, was the most learned man amongst the Gauls Druides. The great affection in this Dimitrius, towards the Romane people, the extraordinary good will which they bare vnto him, the singular fealty, iustice, temperance (as appeareth in the first booke) in this man, was verie well knowne vnto Casfar. To Casfar I say, who vnderstood the Greeke tongue sufficiently, and had a desire to communicate secretly (for feare lest any thing should be discovered) with Dimitrius, concerning his brother Damnors, who was supposed that hee would betray Casfar to his enemies.

Well then, if Dimitrius had vnderstood the Greeke tongue, as well as Casfar did: could not the one haue holpen the other with private instructions, in whatsoever they would haue had imparted? But considering to serue his turne by ordinary Interpreters (as it appeareth in the verie same first Booke) Casfar spake with Dimitrius, by the meanes of Valerius, Prince of a Country in Gaule. Then there is no appearance, that Dimitius (although hee was one of the principall Druides) did vnderstand the Greeke tongue, or that it was any way knowne to the Gaules.

What the language of the ancient Gaules was in regard it was not Greeke.

Here I may be demanded, what was the speech of the Ancient Gaules, seeing it was not Greeke? I may, and must answer, that it was Gaulish: but to render a certaine reply, where the Language of the Gaules hath bene preserved, it requireth the Diuination of a Pythian Apollon. Because it is sufficiently knowne, that the Gaules haue had time long enough, whereby to vlearne and loofe their owne Native tongue. For not onely Lawes, but the Romane Legions established in Gaule; constrained the Gaules to speake the Romane tongue. And, according as Plato sayth: Ordinarily aliother Citizens do follow the manners of them that command them. Therefore, the Romane Lawier, and the Romane Warriour, did quite abolish and extinguish the Gaules Language.

The Gaules compelled to speak the Romane tongue. Plato in Lib. 4

Teaching the Latine tongue so likely, rewarded.

Moreover, the Emperours of Rome, appointed wages vnto such men, as made publike profession of teaching the Latine tongue. So that, to this very day, the bookes written in this corrupted tongue, forme whereof wee haue yet to fiew, are vulgarly called Romaine, and not Gaulish.

That the Swisses speak the ancient Language of Gaule.

Some in debating this matter, are of opinion, that the Language of the Swisses, that hold (at this day) the dwelling of the Heluetsians, are they that speak the ancient Gaulish tongue. But we know well enough, that these Swisses were not the true Gaules of the Country, neither are: considering, that the ancient Heluetsians (but vppe by Cesar within their owne mountaines) were afterward expelled thence (according to Entropius) by the Quades; and finally, the Quades themselves, thrust out by the Allemaignes. At length the Viter, a people amongst the Saxons, possessed themselves of the Heluetsians Country; whereupon the Sutois (that is to say) Swisses, were called, according to the opinion of Beatus Rhenanus, by a Name somewhat nere vnto the Viter.

That the Germanes Language was the old Gauleish tongue.

Others are of the minde, that the language which the Germanes now adays speake, is that of the ancient Gaules, and take S. Hieron for their Authour, who giueth assurance, that in his time the Gauls or Galatians of Asia, spake the same language which the Treuirians (dwelling on the Rheine) now doe. But Cesar seemeth to auouch the contrary, writing in his first Booke, that Arminius King of the Germanes, by long vie (as some haue conceived by this place) of fourtune years, did speake the Gaulish tongue. And in the time of Saint Hierame, there were other Treuirians in Gaule, that were subiects to the Romane Empire: and now in our time also, there are other that speake the same speech, as the other Germanes doe.

There remaineth yet another opinion amongst learned men; who do iudge, that the language of the ancient Gaules, is that which was vied in Gaule Armoric, that is Britaine at this day. But they do not hold the French History to be true, that makes the Britains to come out of the Isle of Britaine, into Gaule Armoric: considering, that Cesar (as I haue already saide) maketh great Britaine it selfe to be a Colonie of the Gauls, and that Strabo maketh mention of a Towne or Citie, called Britaine, which is in Amorica; and Plin (though verie confidently) numbereth the Britains in Gaule: and Cornelius Tacitus in the life of Agricola writeth, That the nextest shores of the Ile were impeached by the Gauls, & that their language was but little different. Finally, the learned men of this Ile, imagined (for this reason) that the Welshmen of England, had some conuiniene in speech with our Britains. Therefore this is the only opinion, which (as yet) I know, to holde any good reason, or deseruing to be approoued. And this is the Grammar of the Gauls, both in writing and speech.

But what was that of the Britains, and that of the Germanes? The Discipline of the Gauls (saith Cesar) was first invented in great Britaine, as hath bene effected: and from thence transported into Gaule. And at this day, such as would know it most diligently, they go thither oftentimes to learne it. This passage sheweth sufficiently, that the discipline between the Britains and Gauls, was al one. If we vnderstand also, that Cesar maketh great Britaine as descended of the Gauls, & that they of the Britains were most human which were Gauls, it is verily to be credited, that Discipline parted from Gaule, to come thither. This place may suffice generally, for al the doctrine of the Britains.

Concerning the Germanes, there is scarcely any one word. The men and Women (saith Tacitus) were equally ignorant in the secrets of Letters. The Germanes then wholly, had not any Letters or Disciplines. Enas Syluius giueth assurance, that in the time of Adrian, ciuility and Letters came into Germany. The Germanes themselves do hold, that it is not yet eight hundred yeares, since their language began to be written; and that (with Christian Religion) the Muses came into Germany; where both in publike Schooles, and by learned professors, they haue so prospered, that the nation (which all Nations else had formerly in detestation for sauage barbarousnes:) hath since then, in all ciuility, in all gentleness and humanity of all disciplines, conferred with the most learned and best lettered Nations whatsoever, and for the priority in this commendation.

But what were the studies of the Rhetoricke Gauls? Assuredly, they were very highly and honourably esteemed: yet more for a fedled speech, consisting of measure, then in prose. The Gauls had (saith Thodorus in his sixt Booke) Poets of melodie, which they called Bards. These men, with a Muscicall instrument, as vvith the Lyre or Harpe, sang some mens praises, and others imperfections. He further shiarmeth in the same place, that Poets were in such reuerend respect amongst them, that vvhen Armies were in ranged battaile, hauing their Swords and Bowes ready drawne, and approaching to finite one another: not onely friends, but meere enemies (if these men once did steppe betweene them) were faine to make an end of all fighting. In like manner, amongst the most sauage Barbarians, anger was compelled to yeelde to vvildome, and Mars gladly reuerenced the Muses. Likewise, Strabo in his fourth Booke, speaketh of the *Bard*s, as being Poets, and singers of praises. The Poet Lucane also, in the first of his Pharsalia, speaketh thus in commendation of the Gaulish Poets.

You Poets, Bards, that of those valiant souls,
Lying in warres, do Caroll their renowne,
Know how I eternize to perpetall worlds
Their endlesse praise: Many sweet songs you sing.

Lucane in lib. 1

Moreover, Marcellinus in his fift Booke, speaking of the Gauls, hath these words: The Bards sung to the Harp, which they touched very pleasingly: declaring the famous actes of illustrious men, their Songs being composed in heroicall verses. The Romaines followed this example of the *Bard*s, and they (according as Cato hath written in his Booke of Originals) had a custome to sing at banquets, the vertues of famous and renowned men, euermore conforming their voices with such as did play on Instruments.

Marcel. in lib. 4

Hereby therefore, we may wel perceyue, how highly Poetic was honoured and authorized by the Ancient Gauls. This argument putteth mee in minde of Greece, and of her Homer and Hesiodus, these vaunting of them, that they were in as great honour and estimation amongst the Greekes. This then was their Rhetoricke, and (as Pomponius Mela sayeth) This was the eloquence which the ancient Gauls had.

The Romaines imitated the Bard in singing at banquets

Greece renowned theyr Bard and Poets.

Pomp. Mela, in lib. 1. cap. 5.

But what was that of the Germanes? Although they were ignorant (as hath bene formerly declared) in the mysteries and secrets of Letters; yet notwithstanding, as Tacitus auoucheth, they celebrated in ancient Canticles and Songes, the memory of their Gods and Kings. And this was the only manner of their Annals, & of the Antiquity which they had: for I finde nothing more, concerning the Discipline of the ancient Germanes.

The Rhetoricke vied among the Germanes. Corn. Tacit. in lib. 5. c. 9.

Now, what was the Logick of the ancient Gauls? I finde in Cesar one only question, concerning the meanes & manner which ought to be followed in the instruction of youth. All the noble and liberal Arts, were to be learned in written bookes; the maisters of those Arts, interpreting the to their schollers, & the schollers practising to vnderstand them. Many times some great difficulty would arise, about the entertaining of mens authority; whose Bookes were propounded to youth: because those men, although they were more excellent then other men, yet notwithstanding being no more but men, they would sometimes dreame, and quite forget themselves. Whereby ensued, that their writings passing as vniuersall, they proued many times vnease to be explained. Contrarywise, without any writing, burby the voice onely, an infinite number of Arts and Sciences (belonging to Mechanical men (as Laborers, Malons, Marriners, and such like) were foone apprehended: and there arose no repugnance or doubt of their words, neyther any difficulty of their intention when as they were vnderstoode. There was no other maxime of these Arts, but what vse and profit had approoued. Then those Doctors and professors were not wont to write of any discipline: but at that they deliuered to youth, they taught onely by word of mouth. Yet notwithstanding, being guided by other reasons, they made Confidence (as Iulius Caesar sayeth in the first Booke) to set downe their disciplines in writing.

Well then, if we vrg a question (in this case) to Caesar, thus will he shape vs an answer. It appeareth to me, that for two reasons, they established this decree amongst them. First, because they would not haue their disciplines imparted vnto popularitie. Next, least such as learned them, trusting to writing only, would make the lesse account of retaining them in their memory. For many times it happened, that the more part, by vsing continuall recourse to books, became slothfull in Learning truly, or kept retention of any thing shewn vnto them. And these two reasons were likewise alledged by the Druides, for not committing their Disciplines to writings; & these causes haue beene approoued by the very cheefest Philosophers of Greece. For, in ancient time, this was the aduice of Pythagoras; and (after him) of Socrates, both which left not one Letter in writing. The opinion of Socrates, to this purpose, is amply declared by Plato to Phædrus, in this Conference which Socrates had with Phædrus.

CHAP. XII.

A Dialogue or Communication between Socrates and Phædrus, concerning what great difference there is between the excellent Art of Memory, and matters registered downe by writing.

Socrates. It remaineth now to speake of the fittest or vnfitnes of writing. VVhere the doing thereof be well or ill, is not that the question?

Phædrus. Yes, that is our argument. Socrates. Knowest thou, that in dooing or ordaining it, as concerning present speech, thou mayest thereby be acceptable to the Gods?

Phædrus. Not I, but thou doest. Socrates. I haue heard of our Elders, that they knew the truth, and if wee our selues could finde it, ought we not henceforward, to bee verie carefull of mens opinions?

Phædrus. This is to laugh at thine owne demands: but telvs that, which thou sayest thou hast heard.

Socrates. I haue heeretofore heard, that neere vnto Naucratis which is in Egypt, there was sometimes one of the ancient Gods, who was named Theuthates, and to him, the Bird rearned Bis or Ibis, was sacred. Moreover, that hee was the first inuenter of numbers, and of Iear, as also of Dice and Letters, and of Astronomy and Geometry. At that time, Theuthates was king of all Egypt, making his abiding in a great City of the higher Countrey, which the Greeks called the Egyptian Thebes, and that Ammon or Hammon was then their God. Theuthates beeing come to this King, he shewed and declared to him, that hee must instruct the Egyptians in disciplines. VVhereon the King demanded of him, concerning the profite that would ensue thereby to any one; and according as Theuthates should seeme to speake ill or vwell, so would hee blame, or else giue commendation. It is sayde, that betwene Theuthates and Theuthates that many things were debated, which would require too long time to discourse, but when they came to dispute about Letters. Sir (said Theuthates) this discipline will make the Egyptians very wise, and prompt of memory: for this is the only Medicine found out for memory and knowledge. Whereto the other replied; O most ingenious and subtle Theuthates, the one is most apt to performe the workes of Art, and the other knowes best how to iudge, what harme or benefite their vse may bring. But thou, the Father of letters, being carried by thine own affection, maintainest the contrary of their effect. For letters causeth forgetfulness in the mindes of such as learne them, because they make no reckoning of studying by memory; for they trusting to the marks of exterior writing, doe forsake inward recoordation, which is the very soule of memory. Thou hast not then found out a medicine for memory, but for forgetfulness, and thou canst not teach thy Schollers the truth of knowledge and vnderstanding, but of Opinion. For, they hauing comprehended great store of things, and without a Master, they will perfwade themselves to know enough; and yet notwithstanding (commonly) they are exceeding ignorant in the greater part, prouoing to bee offensive and troublesome in mens company and frequentation, as beeing more full of opinion of knowledge, then of true knowledge indeede.

Phædrus. Thou canst easily (O Socrates) imagine the humor of the Egyptians, or of any such nation, as seemeth good to thy selfe.

Socrates. My friend, it is held by some; that in ancient times, Oakes did speake those prophesies which were in the Temple of Iupiter * Dodona. For, through the rudenesse and ignorance of old men in those times, who had not then attained to the knowledge which now your younger dayes haue done: it was sufficient for them, to heare an Oake, or a Stone speake, so long as they spake truth. It may bee thou conceivest, that some peculiar Idols (should bee placed in iudgement, how, or of what country he was, that hath spoken any thing of this nature, without consideration, whether it were so, or no.

Phædrus. Truly, thou hast very iustly reproued me: but for the order of disciplines, I am of the same minde as Theuthates was.

Socrates. Then whosoever thinketh, that Arte can so well sette downe it selfe, or comprehend by writing, as if there could bee something certaine, or assured by writing; that man should ill learne, and bee ignorant in the Oracle of Ammon, making more esteeme of reasons sette downe in writing; then of knowing and retaying that which is written.

Phædrus. Thou sayest very well. Socrates. O Phædrus, writing hath a great matter in it, and (in very truth) carrieth some resemblance with painted creatures, for such works seeme as if they had life: but if thou demand any question of them, they hold their peace with great modesty. Thou imaginest also, that a discourse set downe in writing, should speake of it selfe. But, if hauing a desire to learne, thou come and demand something of it, concerning that which it should say; it continueth silent, yet signifying one and the same thing. For, after that a discourse is set downe in writing, it carrieth it selfe alike equally to all men: both for the learned which vnderstand it, and for such as vnderstand it not; and no one can say to whom it is most conuenient; and to whom not. And if it happen to be injuriously dealt withall, it will alwayes stand in need of his fathers help: because it is not able to reuenge any wrongs receiued, nor yet to right it selfe.

Phædrus. Hitherto thou hast spoken most truly.

Socrates. Doe wee not then perceiue, how another discourse maketh it selfe, which is Biocher to this world of; and much more it excelleth both in power & dignity?

Phædrus. What is thy meaning? And what is that which (thou sayest) maketh it selfe?

Socrates. It is that, which (with knowledge) writeth it selfe in the spirit of him that apprehendeth: for it can act reuenge vpon it selfe, knoweth it selfe; and when and how to speake, or to bee silent.

Phædrus. Thou speakest the truly and soule-like discourse of him that knowes & vndervnderstandeth; and (by good right) that which is written, may tearme it selfe (in some respect) to be his image.

Socrates. Tell mee then, in good sadnesse, if a wife husbandman take delight to beholde his feedes, whereof he is carefull, and desireth to gather fruite; will he fowe them at Spring time, in the Gardens of Adonis, where hee shall see them budde forth at eight dayes following; or, when hee goeth about such businesse, shall he scatter them iestingly, as after the manner of a holy day sport? When hee hath taken paines to fowe his feedes, according as hee ought to do, and answerable to the Art of Husbandry: he supposeth it sufficient for him, if in the space of eight moneths after the seed time is past, they doe thrine, and come to their maturity.

Phadrus. The wise Husbandman, (O Socrates) will doe as thou hast sayde; but the idle and negligent foole hath no such care.

Socrates. Shall we then say, that a man who hath knowledge and experience in that which is iust, honest, and good, will be lesse careful of his feedes seasons, than an Husbandman?

Phadrus. No.

Socrates. He will not then write down the feedes of his penne with Inke, solving them there amongst his Discourses; as if he did a matter of great importance: because hee cannot then helpe them with his wordes, neither can hee demonstrate the truth so exquisitely as it should bee.

Phadrus. Nor can they make any proof of themselves.

Socrates. No truly: but he shall fowe and vwrite (as it is in reason) in meeke sportfull manner, and vhole Gardens of Letters. But, when he maketh memories, as certaine Treasures, to the end that they may not fall into Oblivion, as well for himselfe, as also for the first that will followe the same example: hee raketh delight in beholding their tender byrthes; and, while others doe addicte themselves vnto other Recreations, as to Feasts, sports, and the like pleasures, leaving all these heedfull matters behinde them; hee shall passe on all his leysures, taking great delight in his owne discoursing.

Phadrus. O Socrates, thou speakest of a most true pastime indeede, in steade of that which is of small v alue, and worth nothing: when a man delighteth in serious Discourse, he shall ruminate on Iustice, and all those other especiall matters by these remembered.

This was the opinion of Socrates, which was much more sweete and humane, then that of our Druides. Socrates was alwayes preferred knowledge, consisting in memorie and liuing wordes, before that of the dead Letter: neuertheless, hee allowed vriting to bee but as y help to forgetfulness. I could wish that this Opinion had bene as pleasing vnto the Druides; for then, wee should haue had no neede of straungers gooces, as to borrow any thing of the Greekes, but continued satisfied with our owne countryes abundance. Neyther by meanes of the Latines and Greeke, should we haue learned disciplines by paine and study, after the nature of other straunge Languages: but with great pleasure and contentment of minde, wee should haue sucked them as milke from our nuses breasts. All the youth of a man, albeit study were sharpe there-to, should not so hardly haue spent it selfe in learning Greeke and Latine Letters; yet seeming but as an entrance into the common roade way of liberal studies, where we rather should haue runne out our full course to the end. A long and laborious time of studye was required in apprehending the Greeke and Latine tongues, to vnderstand Homer, Demosthenes, Virgil, Cicero and others: whereas contrary-wise, without trauaile, and with exceeding delight, we might haue sung the Hymnes & Poems of our Bards, hauing (naturally) the true vnderstanding both of their wordes and sense.

The loue which they bare vnto their cuntrye, and to vertue it selfe, was overabounding in severity. For, our Druides sought all meanes, wherby to make Gaule surpass all other Nations, not only in actions of Armes; but in the honor of Disciples, and in couering to banish idleness from the Gaules mindes; they disinherited their posterity, of their most rich and vnualeuable patrimony of ancient disciplines. In the doing whereof, they buried in perpetuall oblivion, the Gaules rare Arts and Doctrines, which they had

But in vaine doe we now make our complaints: neuertheless, sorrow remaineth still with vs, to with (how vainely soeuer) that it had bene so. CHAP. XIII.

*A further addition to the Artes and Sciences, taught among the Gaules, by their Druides, Bards, and learned men, according to the iustification of diuers good Authors: and what religious Ceremonious orders they obserue.*

BUT lets come to the Mathematical Artes, whereof Cesar speaketh, when he saith. They made very many disputes of the starres, and of their motion; of the greatness of the world, and of the earth, and concerning the nature of things. Questionlesse, these were their ancient disciplines, left from the father to the sonne by Dis, Sarron, and Druides: which they themselves preserved carefully, hauing received them (from hand to hand) of their graue Auncelstors. For Iosephus, in the first booke of the Iewes Antiquities, testifieth, concerning the ancient Fathers before the flood, that they had obserued those Mathematicall considerations. And because they would hinder the losse of so noble inuentions, or perishing by the inundations of the waters: they engraue them vpon two Collobmes or Pillars, the one whereof was of moulded earth, and the other of stone. And this was thus done, that if that of earth should chance to be defaced by the flood: yet the other of stone might remaine intire, and yeeld men means to apprehend what was engraue thereon. The same Author witnesseth, that the same Pillar of stone was to bee seene in Syria, in the time of Essefius. Essefius likewise reporteth, how the Egyptians learned them of Abraham; and that the Greekes afterward, did set downe those Artes in writing, & then published them. But our Druides (as I haue formerly saide) gaue them to posterity, according as they had receiued them from the hands of their fathers; disputing many matters, touching the Starres, and their continuall motions.

Mela also writeth, that the Druides made profession, concerning the motion of Heauen, and of the Starres. Astrology was such a thing, as it could not any way be taught or learned, except (before hand) a man had studied Arithmetick & Geometry. For the calculation of the motions, they stood in neede of the accounts of Arithmetick; and the distances and interualls of the Starres, must needs passe themselves by the figures of Geometry. Therefore the Druides, making profession of instructing Astrology; taught (first of all) Arithmetick and Geometry, which are Arts that make Astrology to be vnderstood.

Berosus sheweth, that there was some musike in the Hymnes and Poems of the Bards. Among the Celts (saith he) a Barde was much renowned, for the inuention of Songs and Ainsique. The Druides disputed many things, concerning the greatnes of the world and the earth: This was the greatnesse and forme of the world and earth, which Mela sayeth, the Druides taught: This was thei Cosmography & Geography, and the Druides disputed diuers things of that nature. As, what was the length of the world, from the Sunnes setting in the West, to his rising in the East: what was his largenesse, from the Equator or Equinoctiall circle, to both the one and other Pole: how great were the distances of the five Zones, from the Pole, so farre as the smallest circle thereof, euen to the Tropicke, and then from the Tropicke, so farre as the Equator, which is in the midst: what were the Zones of the earth, which are assigned and subiect to the Celestiall Zones: which of the were inhabited, and desert, by reason of cold or heate, and which were temperate: And how Europe, Asia, and Africa were diuided, and separate one from another.

cerning Principles, that is to say, the matter and forme of things: as Fire, Ayre, Water, Earth. Whence all things were decreased, altered and moulded. The professours (among the Gaules) of these so severall doctrines; are called by Strabo, Poets, or Prophets, who, ouer and beside other things, concerning Physicke, principally taught this Oracle, proper to the Country: That the world must sometime noble disciplines then, were wont to be taught of the Gaules, and in the Gaules language only.

Here we may not omit, to remember two most excellent Philosophers among them: that were commended, yea, and consecrated to immortality, by the words of Cicero. The one was Demetrius, (of who we have spoken already) Prince
of the Hedians: the other was Deiotarus, King of the Gaules in Asia. Speake then noble Cicero, and remember vs of our famous Druides. In Gaul there were of the Druides, among whom, my selfe know Demetrius:
the Hedians as the man that received
me into his house, and made account of mee.
This man made his vaunt, that hee knew the reason of Nature, which the Greekes named * Physiologia; and could speake of things to come partly by Augurie, and partly by conjectures.
This Demetrius (as it is very likely) was the Hoste to Cicero, by reason of the Druides knowledge which was in him.
But what doth he say of * Deiotarus? How is it that this Orator commendeth him?
But wherein (saith he) shall I make mention of King Deiotarus, that most famous & right worthy personage our Hoste, that neuer did any thing, but with preface? For, when hee was returned from a voyage, which hee had formerly purposed and resolved to make: the Chamber wherein hee should have lodged (if he had continued his journey) fell downe the night ensuing. And therefore, as I have oftentimes heard from himselfe, hee made many pauses and returns from that one voyage;
albeit he proceeded in many other beside. Cicero
speaking further of the same man, saith
eth. Hee performed one very notable action, when he came backe from the kingdome of the Tetrarches, whereof he was dispossessed by Caesar, and condemned to pay a great summe of money. He saide, hee did not repent himselfe for not crediting such Auguries, as happened to him when he went towards Pompey, having maintained with his forces, the authority of the Senate, and liberty of the Ro-mane people, with the dignity of the Empire.

And that the Birds (to whose Augurie hee gaue faith) had well counselled and advised him: yet notwithstanding, hee made much more precious and deere estimate of his honour, then hee did of all his goods and possessions. These are the words of learned Cicero, to whom both Gaul and Galatia are for ever beholding: because, by so worthy a testimony, he preferred the memory of such famous Philosophers of theirs.

But what shall I most preferre in this place, if not our sighes and teares, as true
witnesses of our misery? Heerebefore, Gaul commanded ouer the Italians and Grecians, and insisted of the goods of Fortune, which are but of small worth, and giue to men as stipendiary wages: the Gaul
then the goods of the minde in recom-
pence, which were (indeede) much more precious. Greece and Italy vaunted very proudly, because they had Mathematicians
and Philosophers: but that glory was (formerly) ours; those praises distilled from our Fountains: which did meere-

tles*, and others beside, farre more excellent men then all they were. But let vs ceasse our bootlesse complaints, & come now to the Theology or Diuinity of the Gaules.

The Druides (about all things else)
would haue men to beleue, that their soules could not die: but that (after death)
they departed out of one body, & entered into another. The reason of this their opinion was that it was the only encouragement to vertue, because feare of death was thereby held in high contempt. I set downe this their persuasion of immortality, as the principall foundation of the Gaules Religion and Theologie, which the Greekes and Latines did enuiously celebrate. The Gaules (sayeth Diodorus)
after their repastes and feedings, had a cus-tome, to disse one another into the Com-

bate, without making any reckoning of their lives, for the opinion of Pythagoras preuiled with them: That the soules of men were immortal, and that after the death of the body, within a certaine while, they came againe into other bodies. And for this cause, some would cast written Letters into heapes of wood, prepared as bon-fires to burne mens bodies in, as if the dead were there to reade them. Strabo affirmeth as much. They were persuaded (saith he) that mens soules
were not subiect to corruption or mortality.
Pomponius Mela writeth thus. There was one thing which the Druides helde and maintained, to entice men (thereby) with the better will to warre: That mens soules were eternall, and that the dead lived another life.
Whereupon, when they burned dead bodies, or buried them, the whole account of their former lives negotiations was interred with the,
especially if any thing had bene borrowed, it was to be redemanded of them. Some were found, that voluntarily, and with their owne
good will, would throw themselves into flaming fires, and burned such things as were deereft appertained to them, euen as if they were to live with them. Mela reporteth thus of them, wherein we may note
the same reason of this perswasion, which

Cesar also held, to wit: that by the contemplation of death, the Gaules might make themselves the more courageous, and valiantly disposed to warre: and it is very likely, that the contempt of death, whereof we haue formerly spoken, proceeded from hence.

Valerius Maximus, in his second booke, maketh this relation. I bebinke me (saith he) of the ancient manner of the Gaules, who are saide to haue a custome, to lend out monies, to be repaid them againe when they were in the lower regions. For they held it as a matter most infallible, that the soules of men were immortal: and I should haue reputed these men foolish, but that the Brachates likewise held the same opinion, which *Pythagoras Pallium aid. Such a number of Authors then, doe consent with Cesar, concerning the opinion which the Gaules had, of immortality. And heere I may not negligently let passe, that these Authors (about all things else) do refuse to confesse, that the Gaules were the first fathers of Philosophy. Pythagoras maintained, that the soules of men were immor-tall, and Plato (following him) saith the same. It is also the opinion of the Philosopher, which Quintus remembereth.

Mens soules are exempt from death,
And leaving their first lodgings;

Where they haue fresh entertainment.

This (I say) was the iudgement of Pythagoras, from whence ensued, that the Gauls
(by report of the Greekes and Latines) were made Pythagorians, and so meerely borrowed this opinion of immortality. But to shew of what great ambition this error is, the silliest iudgement may easilie apprehend: in that, for a long time before Pythagoras was borne, this opinion of the Druides liued among the Gaules. Wherefore, I may very well assure that which hath formerly bene proposed: that Greece was not Schoole-mistresse to Gaul, but rather her scholler. Neuertheless the Gauls did not allow of that * Metempsychosis, that is to say, the changing of soules, which Pythagoras maintained, as passing out of humane bodies, into other of brute beastes: For they did not beleue, that of men they became beastes, but that they were made men again, in other bodies. The Poet Lucan affirmeth the same.

Proceede we now to other points of the Gauls religion. They disputed very much, concerning the power and might of the immortal Gods, and made profession (as

They adored the Gods, Mercury, Apollo, Minerva, Jupiter and Mars, holding almost the very same opinion, which other nations did, to wit: That Mercury was the inuenter of Artes, and a guide to men on their wayes and voyages: That he could helpe much in the gayning of mo-nie, and in the affaires of Merchandize, being such as the Poet feigneth him.

For this Rod of his, was taken to be the power of Artes, the guide to trauellers on the way, and the rich gaine of Merchants. Julius Caesar made his prayers to Mercurie, (and as Marcellinus saith) he was reputed to bee the most sudden sense in this worlde, that moueth our thoughts, according to the doctrine of those Diuines. This was the power which the Druides gaue to Mercurie. As for that of Apollo, he was said to cure & helpe diseases and sicknesse; as the God testifieth of himselfe in Ouid.

Minerva the

The might of Minerva, they held to be thus: That shee gaue the determination of all workes and cunning deuises. Whereupon the Poets feigned, that she was bred and borne in the braine of her father Jupiter. They were perswaded also, that Jupiter had command ouer all the other Gods, and that Mars gouerned in warres: to whom oftentimes they made vowes (when they had determined to giue the enemy battaile) of all such things as they should take in fight. And if they won the day, they would sacrifice all such Beasts as were taken, and bring away all the rest as booty. Diodorus relating almost the very same, saith farther; that they sacrificed their prisoners and captiues to the Gods. But you will say, that this example was too cruell. I confesse as much, but must answer ye withall: that it was borrowed from the ancient Romanes, who would put to death in their prisons, the very brauest & most valiant Captaines of their enemies. And many times for a publike spectacle, and before the common people, they were giuen as a prey to wilde Beasts, to be de-uoured by them in cruell manner. Some of the Gauls did burne in their sacrifices, such Beasts as were taken for booty, and (with them) did put the enemy to death, or else torment him with other paines.

The Celts had an admirable and particular obseruation in their Temples, to cast or spread abroad a great deale of their gold and siluer. Now albeit this was a nation very greedy and couetous: yet notwithstanding, there was neuer found any man, among the rudest inhabitants of the country, that durst so much as touch one peece thereof, such was their respect and reuerence to Religion. Neuerthelesse, such offerings may (perhaps) seeme more proper and conuenient for Mars: beeing called (in ancient times) by the Greeke Poets, The plague of men or the Murderer. And yet such ceremonies also were common, and vsed in the sacrifices of other Gods. The whole nation of the Gaules, (as Caesar affirmeth) were greatly addicted to Religion, and by this occasion, such as were vexed with any greivous diseases, or they that were in warre, or in any other perill of life: did sacrifice men as their oblations & offerings, or else made vowes of such sacrifices. For they held a seuerer opinion, that if for the life of one man, the life of another was not iustly rendered: it was impossible to appeale the anger, or satisfie the will of the immortall Gods. And such manner of sacrifices were publicly intended, as truly declaring admirable Religion, and meruailous perswasion of the Gods might and power; whereof the Greeke Authors made not a iote lesse account and estimation.

Diodorus further sayeth, that some other Philosophers & Diuines, were held in great honour & reuerence among them, whom they termed Sarronides, that vsed diuination: and because they fore-told things that were to come, as well by auguries, as sacrifices; they were highly esteemed of them, but especially of the common people, who performed great reuerence to them. And when they held any councill, concerning matters of import and consequence: they obserued a very admirable custome, and almost incredible. For they would cut the throte of a man, and when he fell downe; eyther by the manner of his fall, or separation of his members, or fluxion of his blood (by a long and ancient obseruation) they attained to the knowledge of future things. Their custome also was, neuer to make any sacrifice, without the presence of some Philosophers: as holding opinion, that sacrifices ought to be performed by such men, as participated in the diuine nature, and came nearest to the Gods. For by the prayers of such men, they were perswaded, that good fortune and successe should be desired of the Gods, and their councill also to be especially vsed, both in the times of peace and warre. Heere to may be referred, that which Caesar saith, in the fifth Book of his warres in Gaule. Who soeuer came latest to the assembly made in Armes; beeing first afflicted with diuers torments, was afterward put to death before the whole multitude. Moreover, Strabo saith, that they would fasten a man vnto a Crosse in their Temple, and there shoote him to death with Arrows.

The same Author, agreeing with Pofidonius and Artemidorus saith, there were certaine Bacchanalles, which dwelt in an Island, neighbouring to the Riuer of Loyre, and of certaine Auguries done by them, according as two white Crows moued their right wings, which neuertheless is reputed to be fabulous. Therefore that which Artemidorus saith, I hold more agreeable to reason, that in an Island nere to Brittain, such and the like sacrifices were performed, as the Samothracians obserued in the honour of Ceres and Proserpina. Caesar pursuing the selfe-same occasion, saith; that there were others, who had Idols of immeasurable height, the members of whose bodies were framed of Twigs and Osiers, which beeing filled with liuing men, & set on fire; there they dyed most miserably. Beside, they imagined, that the punishments of such as were apprehended for robberies and thefts, or any such like offences, were most pleasing to the immortall Gods, & these they made most vse of in those Idols. Neuerthelesse, for want of such offenders, they made no difficulty, in putting honest and innocent persons to the same affliction, whensoever neede and occasion required.

Strabo writeth the same of their Statues, saying, They builded a Colopis of wood, many parts whereof, were enterlaced with Sparrow: and therein they burned all kindes of beasts, and men also among them. But Diodorus saith, that in making their sacrifices to their Gods, they vsed an impiety answerable to their bestiall nature. For, after they had kept (for the space of five whole yeares) such as were attainted and conuicted of notorious crimes: they would spit them on stakes, from the fundament to the mouth; and so sacrifice them vnto their Gods. Then plucking them vpon high piles of wood, and putting fire to them; this was the manner of their im-

molation. Pomponius Mela speaketh thus of the Gaules. They are a proud Nation, superstitious and cruell sometimes: for they verily beleue, that men are the best and most acceptable sacrifices to the Gods.

Neuertheless, wee shall not thinke strangely, that the Statues of the Gaules Gods were of such excessive height: if we but remember only what Pliny saith, in 34. Booke, and seventh chapter. We be- held (saith hee) huge masse Statues of new inuention, which they called Colloies, & were no lower then Towers, but of equal height. In the same place hee speaketh of a number, among which he nameth Apollo Capitulinus, being of thirty cubites in height: Jupiter Tarentinus, which was forty cubites high: The Rhodian Sunne, seuentie; the thumbe whereof, few men were able to embrace. Apollo of Tuscane, which was in the Lybrary of the Temple of Augustus, contained fifty foote in height, from the feet vpward. That of Nero, was an hundred foote high. But ouer and beside, Zenodorus saith, that in his time there was one made in the space of ten years, surpassing all other Statues in height & big- nesse: being the Statue of Minerva, of inestimable value; and made in Aurgene, a Common-weale belonging vnto the Gaules, and it contained four hundred foote in height. Those Statues then of the Gaules Gods, were of wonderfull and extraordinary greatnesse, according as Caesar saith, which they filled full with liuing men, and so made offerings and sacrifices of them.

But you will obiekt vnto me, that this manner of religion was cruell and abominable: whereto I must answer, that such cruelty was common vnto all other Nations, or rather proper and peculiar to the demons, & familiar spirits of each country. Titus Linius writeth, that such sacrifices were made at Rome, after the ouerthrow at Cannas. He saith more ouer, that in the interim while, certaine extraordinary & vnaccustomed sacrifices were performed, by consultation had with diuers fatall Bookes, wherein a Gaule-man and a Gaule woman, a Grecian man and Grecian woman, in the market appointed for Oxen at Rome, were laide along vpon the ground aloue, in a place round engirt with stones, which had neuer before bene filled with humane offerings or sacrifices, and there they were sacrificed after the Romane ceremoniall manner. This is the affirmation of Titus Linius, and therefore I shall neede to make no further mention cyther of the Arabians, Thracians, Scythians, Egyptians, or Grecians: considering, that Dionysius Halycarnassensis sheweth in the first Booke of Romane Antiquities, that Jupiter and Apollo, (because the tenth borne of euery male childe was not sacrificed to them) sent great and greuous calamities throughout all Italy. Diodorus in the twentieth Booke of his history, declareth, that (in his time) there was at Carthage, a Statue of Saturne, and such like sacrifices. And it was thought (saith hee) that Saturne was offended with the people, because that in (former times) they were wont to sacrifice to him, the most worthy and best borne of their children. Furthermore, that by the successe of times, instead of their owne children, they bought and entertained others, secretly nourishing the, and afterward sacrificed them vnto their Gods. This being closely and diligently discovered, & an infinite number of theire supposed found out, which in that manner had bene sacrificed, they were easily perswaded to beleue, that for this occasion only, the Gods being displeased, sent enemies to take and sacke their Cities, because they had not continued those honours, which from all antiquity had bin done to the Gods. Wherfore, the better to appease them againe, they sacrificed publicly 200. young men, such as were the choyest & best borne among all their Nobility, and found out three hundred more, which (with their owne good liking, because they perceived themselves to be suspected) gaue their liues freely to be sacrificed.

They had a Statue of Saturne, made of Brasse, which was of wonderfull greatnesse, the hands whereof were extended in round circling manner on the ground, and children, being followed with eager pursuite, were enforced to enter into the roundure, and then fell into a very deepe pit, full of fire. If any man be desirous to haue more ample and certaine testimony heereof: Eusebius, in the fourth Booke & seventh Chapter of his Ecclesiasticall history, recounteth many examples of this Religion, obserued then in diuers Nations. Affirming further, that in the time of Adrian, and when the Evangelicall doctrine began to appeare in some bright splendour: those abominable cruelties were commonly abolished, albeit they remained still among the Celts. Neuertheless, Arela writeth, that theyooke ending in his time. Moreouer he saith, some markes of this brutish cruelty, formerly abolished, yet notwithstanding, whē they brought their offerings to their Altars, which were consecrated and dedicated to be sacrificed, they would make an essay or prooue of them, and with much deliberation. These then were the finisier & wicked sacrifices of the Gaules, whereof Lucan speaketh thus.

You Druides, after you forsake your Arms,
You sell to savage and barbarous customes
Of wicked sacrifices. Only to you was giuen,
To know the Gods, and holynesse of Heauen,
Or not to know them.

This shall suffice, for the manner of sacrifices obserued among the Gaules. What shall we now say, concerning the ceremonies of the Brittaines and Germanes? Already we haue related, what was the manner of behaviour, as also the disciplines of the Brittaines. The Germanes (saith Caesar) were farre differing from these customs and orders: For they had not their Druides to command in diuine matters, and to take care of their sacrifices. They held opinion of such as they beheld, and by whose aide they conceived themselves to be succored manifestly; that they were worthy to be ranked in number among the Gods: As the Sunne, Vulcan, and the Moone, of others they neuer heard any speech. These are the words of Caesar. But Tacitus, ouer and beside these, speaking of the Germanes Gods, nameth Tuiston, or Teuton, a God borne of the earth, and of his Sonne * Mannus, who were the originall and beginners of their Nation. Then of the Sonnes of Mannus, by whose names, the neere neighbours to the Ocean, called themselves Ingenuos; and they that dwelt neerer to the middle region, Hermiones; and the other Ikenones. Among other Gods, they worshipped Mercury, in the honour of whom, it was permitted them (on certaine dayes) to offer humane sacrifices. They also appeased Hercules and Mars, by the sacrifices of beasts, which likewise was permitted vnto them. A part of certaine number of the S. uenes, performed their sacrifices, & /fir; and yet, the cause and originall of such sacrificing, is not certainly knowne.

Caesar, in his first Booke, attributerh charmes, spells, & incantations to the Germanes, which were performed by women. For when Caesar questioned with a prisoner, wherfore Arminius would not bid him battaile: he found it to be a custome among the Germanes, that the mothers in their feuerall families, did declare by spells and vaticinations, whether it were profitable to offer battaile, or not, and they would say that it was not possible for the Germanes to be Conquerors, if they gaue the battaile before the new Moone. Tacitus speaketh much more of these diuinations, & among the rest, relateth the prefaces and incantations which they most oblietued. The very simplest and most vulgar manner of their diuining: (saith he) was, by taking a branch cut off from a fruit tree, which they would cut into diuers peeces, with certaine very knowledgable markes made vpon them, and afterward throw or scatter the (casually, and without any regard at all) vpon some white garment. If the matter were to be consulted publicly, then it was done by the Priest of the City. But if it were in private, or particularly, the father of the family, huius made his prayers to the Gods, and elevating his eyes vnto heauen, taketh the peeces of the branch by three and three, and when he hath lifted them aloft, he maketh his interpretation, according as he findeth the marks that were formerly engrauen. If he finde the case to be prohibited, he maketh no other consultation (concerning that matter) that day: but if he finde it to be permitted, then he seeketh further for the truth thereof, by other kindes of predictions, which giueth perfect knowledge in that place both by questioned voices, and also by the flight of Birds.

Moreover, it was proper and particular to this Nation, to make experience of prefaces and aduertisements by horses, which publicly had beene bred in their Woods and Forrests, and were all wholly white, without any spotte vpon them, and had neuer bene labored or employed, or vsed in any seruice of man. And there was not any other preface, whereto the people (but especially the very principall persons in the City, yea, and the Priests themselves) did give more credite, then to this: as perswading themselves that they were the Ministers of the Gods, and came nearest in counsell to the. They had another obseruation of presaging, whereby they could foretell the issue of their warres, how cruell or dangerous foucer they were, and how they should succeed. They would take a prisoner of that Nation, with who they intended to make warre, and he should combat with one of the brauest and mozt gallant spirits of all their owne people, & with those weapons belonging to the Country. Afterward, the victory of the one or other, turned to the preiudice and disadvantage of the vanquished, and of his Nation.

CHAP. XV.

What Ceremonies were obserued among the Gaules at the times of their Burials, or Funerals, &c.

THE manner and Ceremonies of their Funerals, are set downe in Caesar. Their Funerals (saith he) are (after the Gaulish manner) magnificent and sumptuous, with throwing all those things (whatsoever) into the fire, which they imagined that the dead person (during his life time) most esteemed and affected, specially his beasts. And some short while before this memory, such servants and domesticke attendants, as were imagined to be dearely loved of their Masters (to make the Funerall Ceremony the more intire and complete) were burned together with the other things. Caesar having affirmed this, methinks Pausanias as deferueth to be laughed at, when he saith in the tenth Booke of the warres of Brennus: That the Gaules contemned, and held the buriall of their dead in disdaine, because, that by the opinion of such cruelty, they might affright their enemies, not having any more pity on the dead, then on other living persons. In this point Caesar refuteth Pausanias and Titus Livius also, where he speaketh of the Gaules beliedging Rome, his words, in the first Booke of his third Decade, are these. They heaped and piled men one upon another, and so burned them indifferently together: because they would not bury them each after other, whereby they enjoyed the place more sufficiently in imitation, and answerable to the name of the Gaules sepulchers.

As for that which Caesar saith, That all that which was pleasing to the dead person, was cast into the fire with him: At Rome, into the fire made for Julius Caesar himselfe, the Trumpeters threw their torme garments, the Legionaries, their Armes; the Matrones their Chaines and Jewels, yea, and the precious purple deckings of their children. Caesar doth not declare apparently, whether the servants & domesticke were throwne into the fire, living or dead; but that he meant the living, may easily be coniectured by that which Mela saith. They wer such (saith he) as voluntarily wold cast themselves into the fires made for their parents, kindred, and masters, holding opinion, that so they were sure to live with them.

We have such another example, in the 5. of Ciceroes Tusculanes, where it is said; That the women of India, when their husbands died, had a custome of comate and iudgement, to make proofe thereby, which of them was best beloved of her husband, for one man had many wives. She that carried the honour of the comate, being followed and attended by her other companions, was (with great joy) placed in the fire, and there burned with him: the other that had fought, and lost the day, returned home mourning, and disconsolate to her house. This cruell manner of behavior, may well keepe company with the other ceremony, of immolating or sacrificing humane oblations.

Tacitus speaketh in this manner, concerning the Funeralls of the Germanes. They bring the bodies of their companions into doubtful battels, and that there may be found no ambition of glory among them, for interring of their dead: they only observe, that the bodies of the most noble, or of greatest apparance, may be burned with certaine wood. They do not heape up the pile of wood, neither their garments, or any adornings; but only allow to each man his proper Armes, & in to the fire of some, they make addition of their horses. One only sad or turffe of earth as building sufficient for the sepulcher, they contemne pompous workmanship and honourable labor about Monuments, as being offensive to the dead. Complaints and Teares are soone overpast with them; but griefe & sadness is of longer continuance: for women to weep is honest, only men are to remember.

But Pliny in his thirteenth book & first chapter, speaking of the Sacrifices, & the whole discipline of the ancient Gaules, frets himselfe against the Magick Arts, as fraudulent and deceitfull, seeming to reprove and accuse the discipline of our Druides with the same crime. Let no man misuail (saith he of the Art-Magick) if great authority be giuen to such discipline. Because it onely will comprehend and redigeth the three Sciences all into one, which have most command ouer humane will.

First of all, no one doubteth, but that it receiveth birth & beginning from Physick, and that vnder pretence of yielding helpe by little and little: it hath vsurped the place, as feigning it selfe to be more high and healthfull, then Physicke, and with such enticing and desirous promises, makes addition of some strength and power of Religion, whereby men (yet to this day) do abuse themselves. And yet to satisfie them better, they have intermingled the Mathematicks, because there is not any one, but he is very couetous, and desirous to vnderstand future things concerning himselfe, and of his fortune, as beleeuing vndoubtedly, that such knowledge cometh from Heaven. Thus the reason and vnderstanding of men being surprized, and seriously buied in this manner: the discipline is fortified with a triple bond, and growne to such an increasing greatnes; as euen in these dayes (in most parts of the world) it beares away the reputation from all other, commanding ouer the Kings and Princes of the East. From whence issued the Magick-faction, Persian, Mosaicall, & Cyprian. Finally, the six hundred, sixty & seuenth yeere from the building of Rome, Cornelius Lentulus, and Publius Licinius Crassus being the Consuls, an Edict was made, that no man was to be offered in sacrifice, and assuredly, the celebration of such prodigious sacrifices vanished away. But contrariwise, the Gaules kept them, euen till our memory: For Tyberius Caesar wholly abolished the Druides, & such kind of Prophets & Physitions. What mention shall I make of this discipline, which hath out-stept the bounds of the Ocean, entering into Britanny, where (at this day) it is celebrated with all reuerence, & such ceremonies, as it seemes that they have taught it to the Persians? It hath attained to such consent with the whole vniuersite, (although it can grow to no agreement, or can well know it selfe:) as we do little conceiue, how highly we are beholding to the Romans, who vterly abandoned all such monstrous behavior: being formerly fauoured (as a charitable work) to kill and sacrifice men, yea, and a very wholesome thing to eat them.

So far extend the words of Pliny, whereby ouer and beside the Arts formerly remembered, he attributeth Physicke also to the Gaulish Druides. But he greatly blameth the frauds therein concealed, & desperately commendeth the Romanes, for excluding such monstrous qualities out of their Empire. But would to God, that they had onely abolished the frauds and deceits in such Arts, and not the true Arts themselves, nor the Schooles and profession of them: For then vndoubtedly, wee should in duty thanke them, and crowne them with honour. But Pliny saith, that Tyberius wholly ouerthrew the Druides. Notwithstanding, the same man discovered Magicke, by some example of the Druides, as in the last Chapter of his seauenth Booke, speaking of Glew, or a certaine Gumme, hee hath these words.

We may not omit (saith he) in this case, one admirable matter of the Gaules. The Druides (by such name they terme their Magicians) esteeme nothing more precious then Glew and Gum, and that the Tree where it groweth, during the time it hath vigour: they themselves do then make choice in their Woods and Forests, which haue such power to nourish those Gummes, that they will not offer any sacrifice, without the leanes of such a Tree. And it may be very likely, that from the Greeke interpretation, upon this occasion, they were called Druides. In briefe, they hold opinion, that that which taketh birth or originall with those Trees, is sent from heauen, in figure that such a Tree is chosen of the Gods. Such a Tree is very rare to finde, but being found, they take it with great ceremony and religion, & aboue all other, at the time of the Moons sextile, or first Moon, which is the beginning of their

Months and yeares, and of the world after thirty yeares. Because that then she is in her strength, not being in diminution of her moiety, and they terme it by a word in their language, signifying; To be helping in all things. They prepare the sacrifice in a banquet under those Trees, bringing thither two Bulles wholly white, the harnes whereof are as yet scarce able to be bound. The Priest, clothed in a white Robe, mounteth up the Tree, and cutteth the branches with a Sickle of Gold, and such as fall are receiued in a white cloth. Then they offer their sacrifices, making their prayers, that God will make their gift prosperous and happy, for them to whom they intend the giving. They are of opinion, that such things being giuen in drinke to any sterile or barren body, either of women or beasts, will make them fruitful, in like sort that it is a soveraigne remedy against all poysons. Thus sometimes a Religion is made among men in matters merely frivolous, and not of any importance.

Thus you see what Pliny saith, concerning the mysteries of the Gaules Magick, wherein he findes the greekie etymology of the name of the Druides (although that it is a Gaulish name, to wit, of Druidon, as already hath beene said) as in all languages you may finde infinite words, which (by some coniunctiue) seeme to be deduced from another tongue: as in like manner the Mathematicians, in their moneths and yeares, and the Chronology of their ages, do declare sufficiently, that the Mathematicall disciplines, albeit after the Greekes descriptions, do not alwaies fall out to be one and the same. But let vs pursue some other examples of Pliny.

In his one and twentieth Booke, and the eleuenth Chapter, hee speaketh thus. There is a certaine herbe, like unto Sabine, called * Selago, which is gathered without any iron weapon, by the right hand, thrust into some left-handed glove or sleeve, in manner of a theefe. And the party must be clothed with a white garment, having his feet naked and cleanly washed: and sacrifice must be performed with Bread and Wine, before any offer of gathering, and modestly brought thither in a new Napkin. The Druides of the Gaules have written, that this herbe is very soveraigne against any perill or dreaded danger, also that the smoke thereof is profitable for the diseases in the eyes. They have also another herbe, which they call Samela, which groweth in moist and waterish places, and they use to gather it alwaies with the left hand: it serueth against all diseases in Swine and Kine, and whosoever gathereth it, must not (by any meanes) be seene, neither must he bring it into any other place, then a gutter or brooke, and there breake or bruise it in the water, that the Beasts may swallow it in their drinking.

In the same place is recited another Magick of the Gaulish Druides, whereunto (in the third Chapter of the twentieth Booke, written by the said Author) there is another very like euery way. Moreover (saith hee) there are a certaine kinde of Egges, whereof great account is made in Gaul, and where the Crackes haue not made any mention. Summer causeth an infinite number of Serpents to heape themselves together, writhing and embracing in a kinde of artificiall hugging: when either by the moisture issuing from their mouthes, or slimy scumme of their owne bodies, or such which they call the Serpentine Egge is engendered. The Druides say, that (by their hissing or whistling) it is exalted up into the Ayre, and in the meane while it must be recited downe in some robe or garment, because it may not touch the earth. But he that receiues it, must make great speed away upon a horse, because the Serpents will pursue him justly, until they find hinderance by some River or Water. The proofe and experience thereof is, when it floateth against the water, especially when it is enchaufed in gold. But in the cunning of Magicians is well continued, for the more ingenious covering of their fraud: so they say, that it must be taken in a certaine Moone, as if it were lawfull in humane iudgement, to accord such an operation of Serpents. Verily, I haue seene this kinde of Egge, of the bignesse of an indifferent round Apple, bearing a crust or shell like a gristle, fanned with little mouthes or opening, like to them which are in the armes of the Polyus or Punicontrol, and the Druides holde it for a most notable thing. It is highly esteemed, as for gaining victory in fights and combates, and to haue access to Kings & Princes: by such an abuse, and no other reason that I know, a Romanie knight of the Pocontians, was put to death by the Emperor Claudius, only in regard of fighting, for he alwaies carried such an Egge in his bosome. Nevertheless, the embracing and colligation of Serpents, and the alliance of the most cruell creatures, seemeth to haue beene been the cause, whereby strange Nations (as an argument of peace) made a Caduceus of Serpents writhed round about, and it hath bene a custome also, that they should be crested on the Caduceus.

Thus hath Pliny noted the Serpentine Egge, to proceede from the Gaules Magick, and that for this cause onely, the Knight was slaine by the Emperour, who stood in feare of this Magick. Finally, the Romanes, to abolish utterly the discipline of the Druides, tooke occasion by this Magicall superstition: but though impiety, superstition, magick and vices may be rooted out, yet vertue will continue still found and intire. Would to God that the Romanes had maintained it in like place, and in like number, the Gaules as the Greeks. The Empire hath bene snatched from the Greeks, but Learning and Artes was left with them still. Greeke hath bene constrained to make way for the Latine tongue: but yet continually Grammer, Rhetoric and Philosophy hath bene, and yet is taught in greek. What greeke then was it to the Romanes, to expulpe not onely the Gaulish Iudges from their seates: but the professors also, yea, the very sciences & disciplines of the Gaules out of their Schooles?

CHAP. XVI.

Of the Justice exercised in Ancient Gaule, compared with that of the Romanes, by dividing the chiefe men into two degrees, of Druides and Knights, and two kindes of Magistrates, with the punishment of disobedience to superior Officers.

Thereto wee have gone thorough three parts of the proposed labour, to wit; The prudence of discipline. The entire knowledge of truth; and likewise of providence. There yet remaineth the fourth part, namely of Iustice, which is Princeesse and Mistress of all other manners. It behooveth vs then, to seeke for the principality of ancient Gaule, and what it was; what power the people had, and what policy was maintained among them: that which we terme the Platonick good and benefit of Temperance, Fortitude, & of Providence, whereby each man hath that belonging to him, without vspurning on any thing appertaining to another.

The Common-wealth, at least that of Gaule, whose lockes of hayre beeing long enough in Casars time; was merely Timocraticall, and in many parts very like unto the Roman liberty, as by that which followeth, wee which will examine things particularly, may easily perceiue. Let vs then obserue what Casus hath said, and especially concerning customes and behaviour. In all Gaule, or Gallia (saith he in his first Booke) all men that are of any name, or made any account of, are divided into two sorts; to wit, into Druides, and into Cheualiers: for the common people is of no other reckoning, but as carlets and slutes, not daring (of themselves) to do any thing, neither are they admitted to conuence in any matter. Behold what partition Julius Casus hath instituted of himselfe, albeit it is not altogether true which he speaketh of the people, as shall at large be deliuered hereafter, in place more conuenient for the purpose.

In this partition of Casus, There is one (saith he) that Presideth, or is as Primate among all the other Druides, that hath cheefe command and authority of the rest. He being dead, if there be any one among the other, that hath the advantage in worthinesse or desert: he is to succeed. If there be many of equal parity and condition, he is to be chosen (by voices of the Druides) from among the rest. Diuiners times they contend for the sovereignty or Mastership by weapons, and so striue who shall haue the prime place.

Here Casus propoeth two distinct kindes of Magistrates, one to rule or gouern in diuine things, other in such as are humane and ciuill. Among the Druides, he instituteth one, to be as the high or cheef Prieſt, and he defineth his election, to bee eyther by Dignity, or by Suffrages, or by Arms. And there is no great difference, between the inſtitution of the Roman high Prieſt, and this other man: but onely, that at Rome he is annuall or yeerely, & in Gaul it ſeemeth he hath bene perpetuall. That the Druides haue bene ſpread ouer all Gaul, euen in Cities, Townes and Burroughs, their eſtates haue ſhewne ſufficient manifeſtation: for the Druides did euer command ouer the three principall parts of the Common-wealth: as in profeſſion of Artes, in judgments, pleading, and ceremonies belonging to their ſacrifices. All the younger ſort (ſaith Cæſar) haue their reſourſe to them, to be enſtructed by them, and to learne ſciences, as alſo a great number of verſes, ſo that ſome continue there twenty yeares, onely to learne knowledge. And ſurely, an honeſt ſtipend or recompence, can neuer want Maſters to giue enſtruction.

The Druides (ſaith Cæſar) are not wont to goe to warre, but ſtand exempted from it, and immunity of all other taxation & charges. So that in regard of ſuch faire acknowledgements and freedoms, there are many that come to bee ranked among them, and to follow the ſtudy of their diſciplines, they are ſent thither by their parents & kindred. Let me now entreate yee, and (euen in honeſt charity) but to obſerue well this place alledged by Cæſar. Can there be any thing more excellent, or more magnificent, then when the Primates of a Country, or the Gouernors and very greateſt Princes in a Common-wealth, do make profeſſion of diſciplines? Perhaps, ſome will conſider ſweatily on this point, as though wee would haue the cheefeſt men, and thoſe that are the greateſt in our Cities, to keep Schooles, and apply their paines to enſtruct other. Notwithſtanding, let me tell yee, Plato would haue ſuch men (and no other) to take the charge of enſtructing, & deliuering the knowledge of Sciences: becauſe ſuch a place ſhould be as a Seminary or ſeed-plot, of great, iudicious, and learned men, meete to adminiſter and beare authority in a Common-wealth: wherein the grafts and plants muſt needs be the more rare and excellent; by how much the grafters and planters are moſt vertuous and honourable.

I wonder at the opinion of Pliny, in many paſſages alledged by him, and eſpecially in this, where he writes: That with the ancient manners and ſiſtions of Rome, the Land abounded, & did daily bring forth double encreaſe. What was the cauſe (ſaith he) of ſuch abundance? The earth was then huſbanded by the hands euen of the cheefeſt warriors, and, as it is credible, that the earth toyed and reioyced, to be honoured with a ſhare or culture crowned with Laurell, and by the labour of a Julius triumphing conqueror: euen ſo did it traualle and endeavour it ſelfe the more induſtriouſly, to produce the ſeed ſowne in that nature, as to proſper their other warlike proceedings. And the like diligence, for well huſbanding the ground, is alſo to order and direct a potent Army, or elſe in all other things, which are performed by noble and beſt hands: do encreaſe the more abundantly, and become ſo much the more fertile by how much they are the more carefully executed. But now aduaies, this ſure and honourable myſtery, is exerciſed by ſoule, infamous, and condemned hands, by men that are either theues, or baniſht, or haue loſt their eares, or branded with ſome ſuch other wicked imputation. Nor withſtanding, the good earth is not deſſeigne, who being called Mother, and bids herſelfe to labour and fructifie, by a Latine word, called Coli, which ſignifieth alſo to do honour, as being thence derived: whereby it plainly appeareth, that what ſo euer ſhe now doth or produceth, ſhe doth it but in meere diſſimulation, in ſtead of her owne liking. And therefore we muſt needs merrilie, that no ſuch profits ariſe in the times of theſe labourers, as in the famous daies of thoſe flouriſhing Captaines. So farre extend the words of Pliny.

But by your fauour, do not we conceiue, that it is as conuenable for vs, to ſpeake of the exerciſe of diſciplines, as of thoſe which concerne the earth? Euen ſuch was the fertility and abundance of the Gaules diſciplines, when in the times of our Druides, the Schooles of the Muſes, became the Pallaces of Kings, the chaires of Maſters, were the ſeates of Princes; the number of Students, was the company & following of honorable Lords. Then Pliny is delighted to be in a royall Colledge, viſing one & the ſame Rector & gournor in the common-wealths affaires, & to declare the Sciences and diſciplines, explicating thoſe enſtructions in one ſelf ſame manner, manner, for governing their Common-wealthes. And by the ſame diſcretion and providence, they inſtituted the rules of Arts, Lawes, and Ordinances: wherein all things increaſed the more proſperouſly, and more abundantly (by honeſt labours) as they were the more diligently and reſpectively followed. There were many in thoſe dayes, who being ſpurred on by ſuch recompences, and the expectation of thoſe propoſed honours; addiſhed themſelves (gladly) to apprehend thoſe diſciplines, being ſent to the ſame end & purpoſe (from the remotest parts) by their parents and kindred.

Hereupon, and for the ſame occaſion, Lucian was the more willing to haue the Gauliſh and Ogmian Hercules depicted; not onely couered with the deſpoyle of a Lyon, and a maſſy Club: but alſo decrepitate, bald, aged, wrinkled, and meager; drawing a great number of Conquered men after him, in chaines of gold faſtned to their eares. Their tongues alſo were pierced thorow, and at them hung little Chaines of gold, in ſuch ſort, that thoſe valiant diſpoſed and conquered gallants, followed the Hercules that drew them, he turning eſtſoons his face and looks to behold them, with very milde & affable behauiour. And what elſe was all this, but the eloquence of the Bardes, a alſo the wiſedome of the Sarronides and Druides; which euen at the firſt ſight (with-out any more regarding) cauſed ſuch admirable affection to the ſame. Then did al diſciplines flouriſh, in regard that the profeſſors of them were rare and excellent. But ſo ſoon as by the Romane Empire, the ſalary and honour of Learning was taken away and aboliſhed; euen as ſo ſoonly was the profeſſion of thoſe Diſciplines eſteemed and held to bee but a ſeruite and mechanical thing. Which was the onely occaſion, that (neceſſarily as it were) thoſe honeſt and liberal ſtudies languished for a long time; and by an ouer-redious experience,

Thus the loſſe and burying of the Gaules diſciplines, are due to none but vnto the Romaines, by whoſe tyranny the honour of their profeſſion, and their liberty together, was violently taken from the Druides. Priest onely haue the preheminence to inflict punishment.

Punishment inflicted according to the quality of the offence.

But proceede we with the rest of Caesar. If there be any man, either a private, or publique person among the common people, that wil not obey their ordinances & decrees: he is interdicted from comming to the sacrifices, which is the most greivous punishment in all their Nation. They that stand for interdicted from the sacrifices are reputed among the number of lewd and wicked people: All men flye from them, and every man stands in feare to speake to them, or to keepe company with them, as dreading some Contagion or Plague should happen to them by such frequentation. And if they demand Law or Justice, it is denyed, and may not be granted them, neither may they enjoy any preferment or honor, or the least reverence done unto them by any. But what manner of sentences or iudgements do the Germanes obferue? What penalties and punishments are amongst them? It apperaineth to none but Priests, who haue the full power of commanding (saith Tacitus) to impose silence in publicke consultation. Moreover, it is not permitted but to Priests onely, to chastise, beate, or bind them, not as the paine or punishment of the offence, nor by the command of the Prince: but euen as by diuine permission, & as a commandement given by God, whom they make account to be then in presence, and to be assisting in their fights. In warre also they carry certaine Pictures and Images, which they bring away from their hallowed places. The difference of punishment is answerable vnto the delict. Traytors, and such as forsake their Captaiues of their Nation, to doe any seruice vnto a Stranger-enemy, are hanged vpon the Trees. Vagabondes, Rogues, idle livers, and all such as are noted of foule infame, are drowned in mudd, or in some Marish place, & covered alow with fish. The variety of punishment is much respected there, to the end, that the enormity of the offence, may be knowen by the qualitie of the infliction, and that vice may by no means be covered. But in crimes of lesser nature, the parties which are conuicted, are condemned in Fines, of a certaine number of Horfes, or other Beasts, whereof one part of the forfeiture is giuen vnto the King, or to the Citty: and the other part is giuen to him, for whom the penaltie is done, or to his nearest Kindred.

Returne we now again vnto the Druides of the Gaules: for, Caesar detreibeth the times and the places, where they did vse to keepe their Sessions. The Druides (saith hee) vpon certaine dayes in the yeare, and vpon the Borders of the Carantes (the which Countrey is reputed to bee the verie middest of all Gaule or Gallia) do vse to keepe their great dayes meeting, in a certaine consecrated place, where all sortes of men, that haue suites or Controuersies, make their Assembly, being obedient vnto the sentences & iudgements of the Druides. Caesar doeth not distinguish the times of the year, but onely the place, which was on the Limites and Confines of the Carantes, as being the Center and middle of Gaule, where the Druides of all the Countreies of Gaule (euen as of all the world) were wont to meete together. Neuertheless, the Citty of the Carantes, named Chartres, was (in those ancient times) of much larger extendure, then now it is; and it is very likely, that it contained not onely the Charrtain Dioecesse, but that also of Orleans. For before that Caesar arrived there, it was a Realm, which afterward was put by Caesar into the power of Tullius the Carant, as himselfe hath written in his 5. booke.

In breefe; it seemeth that the Realme of Orleans, which afterward was a long time maintained to bee a Realme by the Franconians, was the very same of Chartres: Considering withall, that Genabum or Genaba, was one of the Townes in the Carantes Kingdome, and seated vpon the Riuer of Loire, beeing in the time of Caesar beyond Orleans, a farr off by a great many Miles, and which hindered him in his way, when hee went from Agendicum to Gergobin. But those Druides assembled themselves together in that place from all partes, as in the Center of Gaule, according as Caesar hath spoken. I say then, that in all Gaule, and in the Citty, Townes, and Villages of Gaule, there were Druides, who gouerned in suites and Controuersies, and likewise in the Ceremonies of Religion: In breefe, the care of all things was committed to them. The Druides were then distributed thoroughout Gaule, as now adayes are the

the men of the Church: notwithstanding the Princes were wont to refer to a common Councell (at certaine times of the year) all the suites of their Citizens and subiects, wherein the chiefe Priest of the Druides gouerned onely.

Such (in elder times) was the Councell of the Amphictiones, which during the liberty of Greece was kept in Delphos (as Pausanias reporteth in his Phociques) & in the middest of Greece. Whereby appeareth, that the Druides of the Gaules, were like to the Amphictiones of Greece, & their place as sacred in the Charrtaine Countrey, answerable to the Temple of Delphos, made so famous by the Oracles of Apollo. The matter would haue bene a little the more noble, if Caesar had called the place Delphos, which was consecrated within the limites of the Countrey of Chartres. Heerein is shewen the authority, and (almost) royall power, which the Druides not onely held in private and particular, but intirely ouer all the people. The profession of Disciplines was in great reputation; the estate of iudgment a most famous authority; the power to performe sacrifices, and to speake of Divination, appertained vnto royall Maiestie.

The first degree of the Gaulish Commonwealth, was that of the supreme Magistrate; next, the Princes; then, the Chancellers; the people made election according to his aduice, and for his benefite and the commodity in generall, the Princes gaue him order how to make his warres; and such as did not well by their instruction, they would expulse and banish them. But you may demand of me, how this is to be proued? I will answer from Caesar, who speaketh thus in his sixth Booke. In Gaule (saith hee) there are certaine factions, not onely in all Cities, Burroughes, and quarters, but also in every particular Honbold, & the Princes or Heads of such Factions, are they whom they conuene (in their iudgment) to be the worthiest persons for authority: by whose aduice and determination, the verie greatest matters of weight or importance, either for publique affaires or Councell, are wholly disposed. Vpon which occasion it seemeth, that this matter hath bin thus ordered from reuerend Antiquity, that none of the meanest should be capable, against a rich or potent superior. For there is no man, that will endure or suffer, that such as appertaine or depend vpon him, shall any way be oppressed or circumvented: for if he offered to do otherwise, hee shall not beare any injury among the people.

Thus you heare what Caesar saith, whereby may be vnderstood, the Timocraticall gouernment of a Commonwealth, which Plato and Aristotle so much commended, and which Greece (being in her libertie, and Italy also) did keepe so carefully: wherein, all the kinds of a iust and equitable policy are comprehended. Note the selfsame reason, in the whole charge of the affaires of Gaule; for there was royaltie in the annuall Magistrature, whereas Aristocratie was discerned in the Senate, and briefly, Timocratie in the plaine power & authority of the people, by whom the Senators and Magistrates were created. And therefore let vs goe somewhat neerer, and examine the testimonie of Caesar a little more narrowly, speaking of the Common-wealth of our Ancestors.

Such was the freedom and liberty of Gaule (saith Caesar) that in every City, Towne, and Burrough, and almost in every house, there were certaine factions, and it was in such sort, that every one was permitted to deale closely and vnderhand, by voices and suffrages: so that the very meanest and simplest, had power to giue their sentence, and deliuer their voices. I reere then we are to vnderstand, that the Electors of the Magistrates amongst the Gaules, were such kinde of men. And heereby wee plainly perceiue, that the authority of the people was not small in their Commonwealth: in regard that by voices and suffrages of the people, the Magistrates were then created. But what was hee that had the power to make election of these men? He that was reputed to be in the greatest authority: beside, all the affaires of consequence, and the whole deliberation of the Councell came onely to him. But why wast requisite, that so much authority should be in one Magistrate? Caesar himselfe makes answer vnto this Obiection. Because (vpon this occasion) it seemed that Antiquity (venerably) had so instituted it: to the end, that no man among the people (how meane or poore soeuer) should stand in neede of aide against the richest oppressor. For he might not endure that any of his faction should be oppressed or circumvented. This then was the end of the the Magistrate, and the reason why the people said; We will not have this man, except by his vertue, and by his authority, he do defend that no man offer vs injury. We will not have this man, because he is both bad and ignorant.

But if a good Prince, who (at the beginning) hath made proofe of his vertue, happened afterwards to change his manners; and as one that hath no longer care of the weale-publique, proposeth his owne particular profit before the publike, and carry himselfe otherwise then the Ordinances of the people haue commanded: he is excluded and banished, and (as Cæsar saith) Deprived of all power and authority among his owne people. And to the end that this might not be imagined to be observed in some one City only, The selfesame course (saith Cæsar) is kept thoroughout all Gaule. Herein then may be noted, the political authority of the people, when Magistrates are not onely chosen by the people, but also depofed & expulſed. But Cæsar saith nothing, whether this principality was conſtituted in the authority of many, or of one onely, neither for how long time it continued. Neuertheleſſe, Strabo (in his fourth booke) defineth both the one and the other, ſaying: There were many kinds of Aristocratical policy, in ancient times they elected every yeare a Prince, as the people elected a Chiefe or Commander for the warre. Thus wee ſee, what Strabo saith: but a matter to goodly and commendable, ſhould bee enriched with ſome examples.

Cicero hath ſo highly extolled the commonwealth of the Maſſilians, that before the people of Rome, in the defence of Fontenus, hee ſayde: That the Discipline and gravity of the City of * Maſſiles, deſerved not onely to bee preferred equall to Greece, but almoſt with all other Nations of the world. In that City (ſaith Strabo) there were fixe hundred Senators, whome they tearmed Timouches, as men honourable, and who (all theyr lifetime) enjoyed that honour: from fourth of which number, were elected and choſen ſixteene Princes, to iudge ſuch ſuits & cauſes, as happened day by day amongst them. And queſtionleſſe, theſe were the fixe hundred Maſſilians, and the ſixteene cheefeſt men among them, whereof Cæſar ſpeaketh in his firſt booke. But let vs go on with the words of Strabo. Out of theſe ſixteene (ſaith hee) they elected three, which had the moſt authority and power. In this manner Strabo deſcribeth the Common-wealth of the Maſſilians, which nevertheless I ſalledge not as a name of Gaule onely, becauſe it was better beloued and eſteemed to be Greekiſh, rather the Gauliſh: but alſo, becauſe none of thoſe Timouches was to bee elected, that had not bin a childe borne there, and had not bene a Citizen, euen to the third race or deſcent, as the ſame Strabo ſaith. Vpon this occaſion, Ariſtole (and very deſertfully) calleth the Common-wealth of the Maſſilians Oligarchie, and not Ariſtocratie: for this declareth her Oligarchie, that Princes were not elected by their vertue, but in regard of their race.

I doe not alledge (I ſay) this Common-wealth, as an example of the Gaules Common-wealth: I deſire to deliuer their owne true eſtates indeed, and thoſe that truly were of Gaule, and firſt of all in general of all Gaule; next, of the Nations, and then particularly of every Citie. The ſeauenth Booke of Julius Cæſar, ſhall ſerue as a ſufficient Teſtimonie in my common example, wherein Gaulie is intirely deſcribed, both in orders, and all reuenewes: albeit in the ſeauenth yeare of the warres in Gaule, great ſtore of the afflicted Townes and Citties, had diminiſhed much of their reuenewes. Firſt (by a Common Councell) Vercingetorix was elected for cheefe Commander, as Cæſar himſelfe ſaith, when the Hedunians fought, that the Empire might bee given to them, as the matter came then in controuerſie. The whole Councell of Gaul (ſaith hee) was called as * Bibracte or Beaulne, where arrived a great number of men, and the Election was appointed to the moſt voyces: but by general conſent it was concluded that Vercingetorix ſhould be Emperor, & the cheefe Leader of their Armies. Onely Cæſar ſaith, that the men of Rhems, the * Lingones, and the * Treuirians were not preſent at this Councell: but hee maketh no mention at all of the Aquitaines.

Afterward, when Vercingetorix was beſieged neere to * Alesia, the Gauls then called another Councell; wherein was ordained, that a certaine number of martial men ſhould command ouer every towne. And it was concluded, that ſix & thirtie

The like number was appointed to the men of Anurne, together with the Cadurcians, Heluetians, Gaballes, and Vellannians, who were vnder the dominion of the Auerricains. To the Sequanians, Senones, Riturigians, Santorigians, Kuthenes and Carantes, were appointed twelve thouſand men. To the Bellocacanes ten thouſand, and as many to the Limofines. To the Poitouines, Tourangeans, Parifians, and Heluetians, eight thouſand to each. To the Sueſſiones, Amiangeans, Mediomatricians, Petrocorians, Neruians, Mormes, and the Nitobrigians, ſixe thouſand to each. To the Aulerians and Cenomanians as many. To all the Citties that border vpon the Ocean, and (according to their manner) are called * Armorica, ſix thouſand.

Heere we haue a view of the publike Councell, vniuſually obſerued throughout Gaule, and one ſelfesame manner of behauiour, and anſwerable to the Amphyctiones, of aſſigning by a Councell publike, the eſtate and reuenewes of every City. Notwithſtanding, one onely man did not command ouer all theſe Companies: but there were foure captains, with whom were ioyned ſome Councillors of theſe Citties. Cæſar in the ſame place ſaith; That the whole charge of theſe affaires of the Empire, was given to Comius the * Atrebatian, to Viridomarus, to Eporodorus the Hedunian, and to Vergasillus of Anurne, Cofius Germane to Vercingetorix by the mothers ſide: and vnto them were aſſigned certaine other choſen perſons of the Citties, as Councillors for the warre. Neuertheleſſe, we may obſcure, if in all the Gauliſh Nations, the ſame eſtate of commonwealth was kept, as among the Celts, Belges, and Aquitaines.

In the time of the warre in Gaul, it neuer happened, that the Celts kept the like ceremony of Councell: for the greater part of them were allied with the Romanes, either by amity or alliance, or by what kind of dutie elle, I know not. Notwithſtanding, in the war of the * Ventes, a conſpiration was made of the Armorican Citties, the * Ventes, the * Offſines, the * Lexobians, the * Nannets or Nannetians; the * Drubinters, the * Curioſolites, the * Puellians, the Ambatians, and the Eburones. Suddenly were Ambſſadors ſent (ſaith Julius Cæſar in his third booke) and by aduice of their Princes & Noblemen, they conferred together, to do nothing without Councell, and to abide ſuch diſaſters as Fortune ſhould ſend vnto them. Solliciting the reſt of the Citties, to chooſe rather to continue in the liberty which they had receyued from their Anceſtors, then to endure the ſeruitude of the Romanes. Neuertheleſſe, the cheefe Head or Commander of all the Army, is not named by Cæſar in any part whatſoouer. And yet in the publike councell of the Belgians (whereby was plainly and openly determined againſt Cæſar, the intire liberty of all Gallia): the maine and eminent charge of the affaires (by the wil and conſent of all men) was put on Galba King of the * Sueſſiones, as well in regard of his owne good deſerving, as for his wiſedom and prouidence.

In this warre at that time, the Bellocacanes contributed to the number of three ſcore thouſand armed men; the Sueſſions fifty thouſand; as many the Neruians, the Atrebatians ſixteene; the Ambians ten; the Mormes ſixe and twenty; the * Mencapians ſeuene; the Caletians ten; the Velocastians & Veromandunians as many; the Adunaticians nineteene; the Condrufians, Eburones, Celeſians, Pemmanians (which al by one name are called Germanes) forty thouſand. Here is to be ſeene a Common Councell indeede, and thereby likewiſe, the intire power and authority of every Citie. Such a conſpiration alſo was amongst the Aquitaines, of whom Cæſar writeth thus, Then the Aquitaines began to ſend forth Ambſſadors, and to interchange ſoſtages, to muſter men of warre, and to craue ayde of the Cantabrians their Neighbors: as alſo to elect for their Captaines, cert. men that had ſerued (all their time) with Q. Sertorius: & therefore were reputed to be moſt expert in the actions of Armes. It is then plaine and apparant by the places before alleadged; that the policy propoſed by Cæſar, was not onely common to all Gaule: but likewiſe generally in recommendation to all the Nations.

CHAP. XVII.

Of the forme of Government obserued in the Common-wealths of the severall Cities and Nations: and what their Rulers and Magistrates were: as also how they attained to their authority.

ET vs now particularly illustrate the Governements in the Common-wealths of the Nations and Cities of the people. And first of all, let vs speake of the Celts, among whom the Heluetians have bene reputed to be the most braue and valiant Nation. What administration & government of Common-wealth hath bene obserued in their cheefest City? The City of the Heluetians was situated betwene Rhein & Rhone, as also the Mountain Jura, in a triangular forme or shape, hauing twelve towns, and foure hundred Villages, & the whole diuided into foure Regions: yet not for warre onely, but likewise for Iustice, and for doing right to all men. There were two, named by Caesar himselfe, Tigurine and Verbigena. These Regions were as one Parliament, that had the whol charge of the affairs of the Realme, and for matters of consequence, were wont to come into a publike Councell; where for the Election of a Prince, hapned a coniuration amongst them of the Citie, to burne all their Townes, Burroughes, and Villages, to forsake their own limites, and by force to seize and surprize the kingdome of the Gaules.

For the better execution of this enterprize, Orgetorix, one of the most apparant and Noblemen was made choise of; and this act declared at the first, even a meere and certaine Timocraticall affiction. Orgetorix overcome with a couetous affection of Soueraignty and reigning, imbraced this Conspiracy; but the issue requieth obseruation, after the matter came to be discovered. This happening to the knowledge of the Heluetians, by some presumptions and conceitures; Orgetorix was taken prisoner, and they would haue compelled him (according to their manner) to confesse the truth: which if it fell out to be approued, their Law condemned him to be burned with fire. Orgetorix summoned to this Sessions all his friends, kindred, and alliance, who were in number ten thousand men, together with his seruants and cōbers, who were a great company, that they might assist in the case of iudgement. Hee praynailed so well by this multitude of men, that hee freed himselfe from answering to his enditement, or disclosing vpon what occasion hee was incited to this matter of conspiracy.

In the meane space, while the Citie (being offended) fought to maintain the execution of their Lawes by the sword, & the Magistrates muttered men from all parts: Orgetorix dyed in prison, not without suspicion (as the Heluetians imagined) of murdering himselfe. Kingdames (saith Caesar) were bought in Gaul, by such as were most potent and abounding in riches, and such as had the meanes to command most men at their pay. But what these kingdoms were, is easily to be coniectured, by the example of Orgetorix, and by others beside, whereof we are to speake hereafter. The Commonwealth then of the Heluetians, was parted in this manner by Regions, as at this day that of the Switzers is, who vsurp and make vse of the borders of the Heluetians. Next, there were three great Cities of the Heduanes and Aneruans; let vs now survey these Common-wealths, and first that of the Heduanes, who were the very brauest and most valiant people, when Caesar made his warre in Gaule. Let vs make a good obseruation of this Common-wealth, and how (in three Kindes of a iust and commendable government) it was iudicially ordered & maintained.

By a yearly election of Priests, in a certaine place, at a certaine time, & of diuers deicents, amongst the Heduanes was chosen one called a Verobret, who had full power as a King, and absolute authoritie of life and death; but he was not permitted to go forth of their iurisdiccions. Caesar in his first booke, making mention of the Heduanes, speaketh in this manner. After he had summoned together the cheefe Noblemen and Princes in his Campe; amongst whom were Druitiacus and Litacius, who at that time was the cheefe Magistrate, and by the Heduanes called a Verobret, created yearly by yeare, & having power of life and death.

The rest is reported in the seauenth Booke, where is declared how the Senate and people of the Heduanes, were in a great sedition about their Magistrate, for the appealing whereof, Caesar was called: these are his own words. The Princes Ambassadors of the Heduanes, came to Caesar & intreated him, that he would come to succour their Citie, especially in a time of such necessity, when their Common-wealth was in great danger. For whereas (in former time) they were wont to haue but one Magistrate yearly, who had authority Royall: now there were two that bare that Office, yet both making their vniuit, to be created by order of Law. One of them was called Conuictolitane, a man in the floure of his youth, of great power, and well aduised: the other named himselfe Cottus, of a most ancient race, and one that was able to doe much: whose brother, named Valeriacus, had borne the same Office the yeare before. Moreover they sayd, that all the City was vsed in Armes, that the Senate and the people were diuided, each holding a part vnder severall factions: And if this mutinie should be suffered for any long time among them, and no other means of help were afforded, they would make prize and bootie of one another, and all must goe to generall ruine.

Caesar, though he knew it to be a dangerous matter, to forbear his wars, and depart from his enemy: yet, in regard he was not ignorant what great inconueniences do grow out of such dissensions; and fearing whichall, that such a Citie, so well allyed to the Roman people, which he had alwayes maintained, and furnished with all things he could deuise; least also the part that was most distrustfull of him, should send for ayde to King Vercingetorix, he resolved to go thither, & prevent the perill betimes. And because, by the Lawes of the Heduanes, the cheefe Magistrate might not absent himselfe out of the countrey, as doubting thereby, that hee should diminish in any part of their right & Lawes; hee went himselfe in person vnto them, and called before him all the Senat, and they also among whom the strife had happened. When the whole Citie was (well-nere) assembled together, and hee was fully informed, that by the consent of a few, priuily congregated together in an vnseene place, and at an vnlawfull time; vnderstanding whichall, that one brother had subrogated the other in his place, contrary to the lawes, which plainly did prohibite, that two of one Linage and family (being both liuing) should not onely be disabled from creation in the Magistracie, but also not admitted into the Senat: Cottus was compelled to giue ouer his Office, and Conuictolitane (who according to the custome of the City, vpon the ceasing of the former Magistrate, had bene created by the Priestes) had the full authority appointed to him. Caesar wrote all this himselfe, about the commotion of the Heduanes, whereby most clearly appeareth: that the royall dignitie was in the Verobret, and the authority of the Seigneurie in the Senat; and finally, the Democraticall power in all the people.

But to know what, and how noble this City was, we need not more then to look vpon so many Towns, as were in the protection of the Heduanes, whereof Caesar speaketh in his Commentaries. Among them of greatest note in this Common-wealth, is Bibracte named, whereunto Caesar (as he writeth in his first booke) meant to go (as to the principal place of the Heduanes Nation) to haue Corne of the Heduanes. And to this place (as it is recorded in his seauenth booke) Litacius had withdrawn himselfe, because this was a Citie highly authorized among the Heduanes; and there the Magistrate Conuictolitane, with a great part of the Senat came vnto him. Thither also were all the hostages of Gaule brought, when Caesar's Guards were slaine at Normodunum. And there likewise was assigned the Councell of all Gaule, against Caesar: and thither also (finally) Caesar, after that he had recovered the Heduanes, betooke himselfe to winter for that season. This City (I say) was the very principal of the Heduanes, & (as the ambassador said in the Panegyricke of Constantine) it was after called Julia, Pollia, Florentia, Flavia. Moreover (in his 7. booke) Cabilone, & Matifcon on Arar, are named among the Heduanes, and Normodunum on Lezere. These that I haue named were their Tributaries, but their honours were the greatest in all Gaul. For the Bibractians, where in elder times were the ancient Kings of the Gaules; the Senones, and and (by the same meanes) the Parisians (who were in the protection of the Senones) and the Bellouacians, are called by Cesar their Clients, as being vnder their protection. So then, the City and Common-wealth of the Hedunians, had the most absolute authority in all Gaul: anciently according as hee hath written in his first Booke, but as wee may sooner see in his first booke; at all times it had the principality throughout Gaul, especially before it had alpired to the friendship of the Romane people. But after that the Hedunians were called Cousins and Brothers to the Romans: what decrees of the Senate, how many times, and in what honourable manner were they pronounced on their behalfe? We see then, that such and so great a City of Celtic Gaul, hath had this Democratically Common-wealth, and Pliny numbers it not among the Tributaries, but among the Cities allied together.

Now, concerning the commonwealth of the Aruernians, it was sometime the cheefe of Gaul; for (anciently) there were two leagues throughout Gaul, as we read in the first booke: the Hedunians were the ring-leaders of the one, and the Aruernians of the other. And Strabo hath related in his 4. booke, that that of the Aruernians, was more potent than the other; extending their Seignery so farre as the confines of the Narbonians and Masilians to the Pyrenean Mountaines, to the Ocean, and to the Rhine. In like manner he speaketh faithfully, concerning two cruell battailes of the Gaules, giuen vnder the conduct of Brennus the Aruernian: and Strabo reporteth them in the same place, & Titus Livius in his 61. booke. The one was against Domitius, at the confluent of Sulgo and of Rhone; and the other against Fabius at Tijars & the same Rhone; where by we may plainly perceiue, that there was the same forme of Common-wealth, as formerly we haue spoken of.

For the Romane Senate, as it is in the first booke, being willing that the vanquished Gaules, or repulged (at least) from the confines of the Roman Province, should continue in their franchises and liberties: nay, which is more, to the end that Gaul might remaine in the greater libertie; ordained, that Brennus himselfe (King of the Aruernians, according as Titus Livius tells meth him in his 61. booke) who was gone to Rome to purge himselfe, should be kept in guard within Alba: but Consentius his son was taken and brought to Rome. Afterward, Celtius the Father of Vercingetorix, although he had held the principall place of all Gaul in a warre, yet notwithstanding, because hee pretended to make himselfe King, as it is the 7. booke, the City put him to death. Vercingetorix, by the meanes of his own people, was fa- loured as King of the Aruernians, and likewise it is said in the same booke, that all the Gaules called him King: neuertheles, vpon the same occasion hee was charged with treason, and hee came in iudgement before them as ioueraigne Iudges, and in the end, courteous in desire of rule, pro- ued alike to the father and son.

Thus the Kings were excluded out of the Common-wealth of the Aruernians, & they remained at liberty, euen to the time of Cesar. And Pliny (in his time) remem- breth it amongst the Cities of the Celts, which were at freedom: and then it had no lesse protection, then they of the Hedunians as is already made manifest by the num- bering of military forces formerly declar- ed. The city then of the Aruernians hath anciently bin the Lady over that of the Hedunians, and after that, the Hedunians af- fected rather to bee brethren and cosines of the Romans, then of the Aruernians: they became like vnto them in habits and manners. And when at the last coming of Cesar, the Hedunians were overcome & spoiled by the Germanes, yet were they then far greater in forces. Finally, when (by the courtesie and fauor of Cesar) the Hedunians were not only replanted in their former condition, but it plainly appeared that they had more countenance and au- thority, then euer before: yet the other were equal to them, and alike in wealth, the possessions. But in fauour and esteem throughout all Gaul, they were much greater, as the election of Vercingetorix hath sufficiently shewne. Wherefore we may perceiue, that the liberty of a Common- wealth remained in these two cities of Celtic Gaul. For the remainder of the other that were of meaner ranke, hee speaketh not so much as of any one King, or of a Prince: but only we heare no other name, then of the people, and of the City.

The city of the Senons, was accounted among Brennus & Lo-ic in Congre-gatus sent to

among the principals, and of great autho- rity among the Celts. Of some store of Towns that were vnder it. Cesar hath nam- ed two, Agenecum & * Velluna Lunum. Cesar wrought by certaine meanes, that Cauarius was their King; because Mori- tisius, brother to Cauarius and his ances- tors, had held the same authority in that realme, for Cesar had vnderaken this co- lour, only to establish a kingdom there. Neuertheles, the Senons, although Cesar was present, effayed by a councill peb- like, to put Cauarius to death. And as he (hauing intelligence thereof) fled away, they pursued him so far as the Frontiers, expelling him from his house & kingdom. The commonwealth of the Parisians was the like, by that which we read in his 7. Booke. For the Parisians, by a Common Councell of diuers Cities, vnderooke warre for the liberty of their country, sele- cting Camulogenus to bee their commander, by reason of the experience he had in actions of Armes, and the good will they bare vnto him.

Carnutum also was a great City, as al- ready hath bin shewn, & Cesar wrought the like meanes to establish a kingdom there. Among the Carnutes there was one Tafetius, a man descended of a great place and whose Ancestors had held dominion in that City. Cesar (as he saith himselfe) in regard of his vertue, and for the good wil he had found in him, because he had bene a great helpe to him in all the wars, plan- ted him in the same place which his An- cestors had held. He had reigned but 4. yeeres, when his enemies being authori- zed by many men of the city, openly slew him. These Cities then had their Bruti, as well as Rome. So Cesar named the Se- nate of the Eburones, Lexobians, and Ven- etes. At the same time, Teutomatus was king of the Mittobrigians, but by a publike Councell of Gaul, hee yielded obedience against Cesar. This may serue as suffi- cient, concerning the government of the Celts Cities.

What then is to be said of the Cities of the Belgians? By what manner of Em- pire were they particularly gouerned? The extendure of the men of Rhemes was very great: because it ioyned with the Seguans, Mediomatrics, Treuirians, Veromandians, and the Suessones. Notwithstanding, in all these parts, he nameth but two towns or Cities, * Durocortorum and Borax. In the first Booke, the councell of Gaul was assigned at Durocortorum; and in the se- cond booke Borax was beliedged. Con- cerning the men of Rhemes, in the time of Cesar, they hadde the managing of the Gaules, and held the second place in dig- nity, next to the Hedunians. Cesar nameth their Senate, and the Prince and Prouost of the city, as that Vercingetius, whereof wee haue already spoken.

In the time of Cesar, the Suessones had Duntius as their king, who was the most powerfull man in all Gaul, and who opened a great part on this side of the coun- try which he helde, holding also the Em- pire of Great Brittain. After Gallia (of whom he hath spoken) he succeeded. But wee may well perceiue hereby, what man- ner of kingdom this was: in regard that the Suessones (who were brothers & cou- sines to the men of Rhemes) vsed the same course of authority, and the same lawes, hauing one and the same Gouernement, and one Magistrate, as they had. For such are the wordes of Cesar himselfe, by whom one only Magistrate was allowed in their cities. But yet notwithstanding, the Suessones, although they were brethren, yet they had a field (apart) of great largeness, and very fertile, and twelve towns, vnder of Cesar nameth onely one, which is Nauio Lunum, and which Cesar (after the Belgians were retired to him) pausing thro- ugh the country, essayed to surprize. But hee could not compass it, by reason of the deepnesse of the ditch, and height of the wall: and yet there were but verie few people to defend it.

We come now to the Bellouacians, what kind of commonwealth was kept among them? These men were highly esteemed with the Belgians, for their vertue, autho- rity & number of people. For their exten- dure was from the limits of the Suessones, & also fro the Normans so termed at this day (euen there where the riuer of Seine, throwes it selfe into the sea) so far as Cal- lete, known by the name of Calice. Cesar nameth Bratupantium, a city of the Bello- nacians. But by what forme of common- wealth did they gouern their city? They chose their Princes, as (among other) Cor- bus, who though his Army had bin defea- ted, yet would he neuer for any discom- fort hapning, or possible to befall him; nei- ther ther forsake the fight, nor retire into the woods, but fought valiantly, & in wounding many, compelled his conquerors to runne in vpon him, and so to kill him in their rage and fury. Caesar also maketh mention of the Senate of the Belouacanes, and authority of the Communitie whēce ensued the excuse, which the Senate of the Belouacanes made to Caesar: That during the life of Corbus the Senate had neuer the like power in the City, as the common ignorants had.

But now concerning the most potent Citie of the * Neruians, after what manner of order wer they gouerned? The body of the Neruians, is diuided into members of diuers names, as of Hannonia, Flanders, and Brabant, and the name of the Neruians signifieth no more then a Citie or Towne, including (as now adayes our words are) of Hannoyers, Flemings, & Brabanters. And why you may aske mee? Wherefo I can make no other answer, then as already I haue done, when as the Neruians had neither Towne or City: but I will discourse the bounds and limites of that sometime most noble Citie, according as Caesar himselfe hath described it; obserue then what I shall say vnto you.

When the Ambians had submitted themselves, Caesar went thither, to goe to the Neruians which were theyr Neighbors. And hauing made three daies journey into the Country of the Neruians, he found by report of some that hee had taken: that there was no more then tenne miles distance from his Campe to the riuer * Scaldus. This Scaldus, which passed thorough the middle of the Neruians Country, runneth now through the middle of Hennult: wherefore the Country of the Hannoyers, is comprehended within y of the Neruians. Of Caesar himselfe we may learne the limites of the country of Flanders, which is in firme land, and also of Brabant, for there is a passage in the fift booke, which maketh well to this purpose. VVhen Ambiorix (after that Sabinus and Cottus, Lieutenants Generals, were ouercome with a Legion and fife Companies neere to Patuca, which is in the Eburores land) exhorted the Neruians to doe the like to the Legion that passed the winter season to their country, vnder the charge of Quintus Cicero. Hee perswaded easily (saith Caesar) the Neruians, and thereupon dispatched messengers immediately to the Centrones, Grudians, Leuakes, Pleumofians and Gordunes, who were all vnder their obedience, and ioyned together the greatest forces that they were able to make. These are the very words of Caesar. But the Grudians & Leuakes were enskirted with Louane, in the Countrey of Brabant; and the Gordunes (as much to say as the men of Gaunt) were in the Mediterrane countrey of Flanders. Likewise the Pleumofians, whom some doe hold to be them of Corroy: And they that are of this opinion, do plant the Centrones in the Diocesse of Lege.

This so great Commonwealthe of the Neruians, and which was of fuch large extendure, elected a Prince, such as Boduog-natus was in the first warre of the Neruians. It had also a very great Senat, for Caesar reckoneth vp fixe hundred Senators of the Neruians. After that the Atrebatians were vanquished, Caesar gaue them Comius (who was of the same countrey) to bee their King: that is to say, that of a Prince, which was but for a time, he created one that should continue. Hee maintained the franchises of the City, & gaue to them their laws and rigths, and annexed the * Morines to his Empire. Neuerthelesse, this King enioyed his authoritie no long while, for after that the Atrebatians had put themselves vnder Caesars obedience: his sway ceased, & Comius bare Armes against Caesar again. The Eburores then also had two Kings, Ambiorix & Catualenus, but their authority was such, that the commons had no lesse command ouer them, then they had to contradict it.

The commonwealthe of the Morines was answerable to that of the Heluerians, although it was diuided by diuers villages, & had extendure farre off from them: as to Callis, and all along the coast of Picardie and Flanders, in the Forreits & marishes; euen so far as the * Menapians, who dwell vpon the confluent of hennē, as also of the Menze or Maze, and who were their neighbors, as is to be seene in the Teutibers war, in the 4. booke. But the Treuirians, as well for a kinde of gouernement, (wherein they were very skilfull) as also for the occasion of tumult and sedition, very frequent among them; resembled in quality the Heduns. Cingetorix & Indicciomarus quarrelled for the principallitie, euen euen as did y other two, Conuictolitane & Cottus, but Caesar seated again Cingetorix as he had done Conuictolitane. Thus the gouernment of the Belgian Cities, were mingled with three formes of estates.

The * Santone Aquitaines seemed to bee gouerned by such a kinde of commonwealthe. For that City, when she made prooffe of her own vertue, by fighting both on foot and horseback, and well to sustaine all assaults in her own defence: she rendred hir necke to such authority. But Adcantianus their Prince (of his owne power) stept in to do his duty, and fallied forth with 200 * Soldures, or Soldurij. Wherefore I think that the gouernment of the Gaules Commonweales, hath bin already sufficiently explicated, and by so many examples, as we may well conclude, that the principalities of the Gaules (according to Caesar) were such, as would not suffer that the subiects should be oppressed or circumuented; but if any Prince did otherwise, hee helde no authority amongst his subiects. VV e haue spoken then enough of the gouernment and authority obserued among the ancient Gaules.

Let vs now listen vnto the Commonwealthe of Great Britaine, and that likewise of the Germanis. There is mention made in the fourth Booke, concerning the Princes of the Britains, with their conferences and consultations held among themselves, for the common good of Great Britaine. And in the fift booke, the common counsell is obserued by Caesar; and that the whole charge and command of warre against Caesar, was put into the power of Casibelune, and the diuersity of Kingdomes which were subiect vnto that common Counsell, doe sufficiently declare, that Great Britaine vied the same kinde of gouernment that Gaule did. Caesar also deliuereth (almost) the very same gouernment of the Germanis. When a Commonwealthe (sayth he) either endured war made vpon it, or attempted any, Magistrates were elected to undertake the charge of the war, and they might also take or saue life. In times of peace, there was no common Magistrate, but the Lords of the Countreys, and of the Burroughes, who exercised law to their vassals, and appeased all their contentions.

In the time of Tacitus, German had some Kings; but they were such as had more honor then power; in other matters they were like to the Gaules manners. They made Kings (saith he) for their Nobility, and Captaines for their vertue. Nor had those Kings any vnderfed or free power, for the Captaines were obeyed more by example, then by command: either, whether they were deliberated, in fight, or doing their deuoye vpon the point, making wonderfull prooffe of their prowesse. As concerning the Captaines or Princes (as the same Author relateth) & likewise for them, termed companions of the Princes, thus it followeth.

The Princes also they elect in the publicke Councells, which doe hold the iurisdiction of Burroughes and villages. Every man hath an hundred Companions, who are of the popularity, and doe giue assistance vnto them in Councell together, and also in their Authority. A Noble or generous stock of fame, whose high deserts of theyr Fore-fathers, doe challenge to haue the dignity of a Prince, amongst the younger sort of people: They are accompanied with other of more robust complexion; and such as haue had (long time) good prooffe made of them: and yet they blush not a little, to bee seene amongst such Companions, albeit there are some degrees in this companie, according to his iudgment whom they follow. VVhy then I may safely say of the Germanis (according to Tacitus) that their Magistrates haue bin answerable to their Kings, Captaines, or Princes, and likewise to them called the Companions of Princes.

I come againe vnto the Knights of the Gaules, which (in the times of warre) haue the managing of the affaires. And these Knights (thus saith Caesar in his fift booke) when there is neede, and any warre happeneth: they are all employed, and according as each man hath authority and meanes, so hath hee most seruants and clyents about him, for this is the only fauour and power that they doe know. Herein is continued the ancient Gaules manner, for election of Magistrates, and we may learne by a new argument: that the Gaules Princes were chosen for their Vertues, and for their deserts towards the Commonwealthe, and that this eminencie came from Vertue onely. For every Prince would not suffer his subiects to bee oppressed, nor deceived (so hath Julius Caesar formerly said) but if hee should do otherwise, he must beare no authority among his people. And hereto doth this justly make answer: That this is the only favour and power which the Knights knowe, if according as they have most meanes and authoritie, so they shall have the more servants, and the more Clients about them.

The difference between servants and clients.

By servants or vassals, are meant such as stand obliged or indebted (of whom I have formerly spoken) and who, ypon that occasion are dedicated to the service of those Knights: for, these vassals serve as Waggoners to their Masters, and carry their shields. And the Clients (as it is in the seventeenth Booke) never dare, even in the extremity of all misfortune, forsake or leave their Lords. Thus then the vassals or servants, do accompany their Knights and Masters in warre, and the Clients doe attend on their Lords, and these are the companions of the Germans, whereof Tacitus speaketh, as already hath bene saide.

Strife for popularity, and concency in the Princes favour.

There is great jealousie amongst these companions, who shall have the chiefe place about his Prince: and amongst the Princes, who shall be followed by the most and best companions or attendants. It is held a high dignity, to be dayly rounded with a great troope of young and choyse men: it is an honour in time of peace, & security in time of warre. This honor, and this glorie is not onely in euerie Nation, but even in the neighbouring Cities, coeuring as much to be accompanied with such a company of men, as with so manie vertues. Whereof practise is made by Ambassages, and plenty of presents sent; nay, oftentimes, they will undertake Armes, for the bare name to be termed a souldier. When a man is in the fight, it is shame to a Prince to be surmounted in vertue: and it is a more shame to his follower, if he doe not equall the Vertue of his Prince. It is a most infamous & shamefull thing, and not to be washed off in a mans whole life time, to return from the battell, his Prince being there slaine. The principall Oath that he takes, is to defend and sustaine him, and if he doe any braue or worthy acte in his owne person, to referre it to his Princes glory onely. Princes fight for victory, companions and followers fight for their Prince. Tacitus writeth: The Prince recompenseth such as follow him: for they receive (saith he) from the Princes liberality: this Horse of service, that Princes and their followers should be alike in their vertues.

Recompence to the Gaule Knights, for their seruice.

But can you tell me, what were the recompences of the Knights amongst the Gaules, and who managed this other part of their Common-wealth? As for the recompence of the Druydes, it hath bin spoken of already, which was honor, the greatest payment that could be, and only proper to vertue. Neuertheless, the Common-wealth it selfe could not be ingratefull towards them in recompences: considering that there were Impolls & Tolles, which appertained to each Citie, as is to be seene in the first Booke, and their greatness of Tribute, in the sixth Booke. Tacitus hath declared among the Germanes, what worthy recompences were performed to Princes. Cities had a custome, to collect (with their owne good liking) by the poll or head, either of their cattle, or of their fruites, to give to their Princes: which being received as an honor, serued also to supply necessity. About all, they tooke delight in presents given by their neighbouring Nations, not onely by particular persons, but in generalis of choise Hories, faire Armour, trappings for seruice, and also of Chaines. And hence then they haue taught vs to accept of mony.

But let vs pursue other manners of the Gaules Common-wealth. Caesar doth often accuse the infirmity of the Gaules, because in aduice they were fadain and mutable: but especially in this place of his 4. Booke. There is a common custome (saith he) amongst them, to compell passengers or way-faring men, to say whether they will or no, and to enquire of them, what each man hath heard, or knoweth of euery matter what soeuer. The popular and common people, they flacke about Merchants in the Cities, and constrain them to tell, out of what countries they come, and what things they knowe, or haue heard of there. The ancient Gaules, had not onely this wonderful desire, to know matters of nouelty: but besides, that they should be imparted, and made knowne to them and theirs.

I will set downe two examples of some admiration, the first is in the fifth booke, of the victorie which Iulius Caesar had against the Neruians. During the bruite of Caesars victorie (this he writes himselfe) the

the man of Rhemes (with incredible swiftnesse) carried tidings thereof to Labienus, in foorth, that where as he was about threescore miles from the Garrison of Cicero, and that Caesar came thither after the ninth hour of the day: yet notwithstanding, there arose such a cry or noise before the gates of the Campe, and before it was midnight: that the men of Rhemes (only thereby) gaue understanding to Labienus of the victory, & made a signe of their reioycing with him. But the other is an especiall, and most notable cry or noise, when the Romanes were overthrowne at Genabum before Sun-setting: yet before the first watch was set, the cry was heard to the Aruernians, the noise running through all the Townes of Gaul, as Caesar affirmeth in his seventh Booke. For so soone as any important matter happened, by a cry they made it knowne in the fields, and so along thorough the Countries, and till as it was heard, others sent it in like manner to their neighbours, and according as it came to them. And that which had bene done at Genabum before Sun-setting, was knowne in the confines of Aruerne before the first watch, & yet the distance was about an hundred & sixty miles. So saith Caesar, and haply it may seeme, that that singular description of Fame, which is set downe in Virgill, tooke hence the first originall.

Virgil lib. 9. de Aeneid.

Fame, an euill, unmatchable in swiftnesse, Is sudden, mouing, gadding with rashnesse.

Rumor is commonly a babbling lay.

Caesar describeth the like celerity and effect of this cry, as Virgill doth of Fame. This concerneth the bruite and cries among the Gaules, whereby being moued, they often held Councils of important matters: whereof (not long after) they reported themselves, in regard they gaue credite to vncertaine noyes, and found them in the end to be nothing but fables. But hee that thus reprinted the common people of Gaul of lightnesse; commended their constant & politickal wisdomme. Those Citties (saith he) which are accounted to gouern best their Common-wealths, haue their Lawes, which ordaine, that if a man that hath heard any thing of his neighbour (either by report or otherwise) concerning the estate of the Common-wealth: he is to impart the same to the Magistrate, and not to any other whatsoever. Because it hath bin oft seen, that rash bearded men, and of small understanding, are affrighted by false noyes, or provoked on to unhappy attempts, and (dreadlesse) enter into important enterprizes. The Magistrate concealeth what he thinketh fittest; and discourseth to the Commons, any matter needfull to be knowne.

This last passage of Caesar, refuteth (very strongly) popular seruitude, for it testifieth, that euen in those Cities, which gouerned best their Common-wealths: that yet the Commons haue their authority, because the Magistrate imparteth to the people, what is necessary for the to know. Strabo auoucheth in his fourth Booke, that this was also vled in the Councils of the Gaules. If any one (saith he) did interrupt him that spake: the publike Minister steps up with a drawne sword, and using threatnings to the party, commanded him to hold his peace. If he would not do it, he advertised him in the same manner a second and third time. In the end, he would cut off such a peece of his garment, as the rest should afterward do him no seruice. Tacitus expresth it more plainly, as hee doth many other things; concerning the manner of electing Magistrates, and the Councils kept among the Germanes.

The Princes (saith hee) hold a Councell, wherein matters of meanest importance, and such also as are of greatest consequence, are handled together: And yet in such manner, that those affaires which appertaine vnto the people, are managed and ordered by the Princes. They assemble together (if there happen no sudden accident or aduerture) on certaine daies, either at the new Moone, or the full of the Moone: For they beleene, that those seasons are most happy to treat on their affaires. And they do not make their account by the daies, as we vse to doe, but by the nights. The fault ensuing on their liberty, is, that they are not altogether on the day assigned: but two or three daies is lost, to attend for such as slacke to come.

The same Authour declareth another strange thing of the Germanes, affirming, that many times they deliberate at Banquets, to reconcile enemies, to make alliances, and to gaine grace of Princes, yea, euen then to consult of peace or warre: because as then (rather then at any other time) they haue their spirits most open, eyther to simple thoughts, or more earnest to them of greater importance. This

They deliberate when they know no dissembling, and determine when they cannot erre. Such also was the custome of the Country, when the Gaules helde their chiefeft consultations: as hath already bene declared, in the leuying of their men for warre.

The ancient Gaules came armed to Councell.

Titus Livius, speaking of the Gaules, reporteth the same in his one and thirtieth Booke, saying. Then is seene in them a new and terrible apparance, because (according to the custome of their Nation) they are armed when they come to Councell. Why then the Pallas of the ancient Gauls, came herselfe armed to the Councell: and because they would not do any thing, but it should expresse the courage of the Gauls, their assemblies were alwayes made by sound of Trumpet. For Firrius writeth so of the Bellouacanes Senate, having knowne their misfortunes by all contrary things. Corbus being slaine, all their Cavalerry ouerthrowne, and the very valiantest of their foote-souldiers, when they thought that the Romans drew nere vnto them; then suddenly they assembled a Councell by sound of Trumpet, crying all with one voyce, to send Ambassadors and Hostages to Cæsar.

What shall wee say of the Germanes? What garments did they weare whē they came to councell? They did not any thing (saith Tacitus) neither in affaires publike or particular, but all in Armes. They went armed about their daily negotiations, and came in the same manner to their Banquets. Blame not then the counells of the Gaules to be done in Armes: for the Romane Orator could say in his owne Language.

Let Armes giue place to Gownes.

The habite of

quence vnited it selfe with the Armes of the Gaules, so that there wanted not at one time and place, both Commanders of warre, and learned Orators: for the Gaules Orators (by the irradiation of Armes) were encouraged to speake the more brauely. Princes were pleading Orators in the Gaules counells, where (in generally) all might heare, that had interest in the case in question, as is euident by the examples of Cæsar.

Princes were pleading Orators.

*Among the Germanes (saith Tacitus) in publike Counells, the King or Prince, according to his age, according to Nobility, according to the place for warre, and according to his residence in winterance: was much rather heard for authority in perfwaling, then any power in commanding. It was also permitted in a full Councell, to accuse of crimes deserving death. The cry or noise of the people, by listning fauourably, or otherwise: signified to the Romane Orators, that their Oration had found good or bad successe. But the counsell of the Gaules, which was made in Armes, as it was reasonable, made a signe by their Armes (although the clattering of weapons was a signe among the Gaules) how they tooke liking of that which had bene said. Cæsar writeth so in his 7. Booke, speaking of the Oration of Percingetorix: All the people made a cry (saith he) and according to their custome, made a clattering with their Armes, as they do, when they approve the Oration of any man.*

conquered, lib. 1.

Marcellinus declareth in his 21. Booke, that after Julian had made his Oration: the Army of the Gaules applauded him, and mingled dreadfull cries, among the loud clashings of their Targets. The Gaules consultations were in Armes; their Orations were approved by Armes, and the oath they take, was vpon Armes. The Carmines (as it is in the 7. Booke) promised in a full counsell of the Gaules, that they would be chiefeft in the warre against Cæsar, and because they could not in field giue assurance by the meanes of Hostages, fearing how matters might come about to the end that all might be certaine and sworne, after they had brought together al their Ensignes of warre (as alwayes they vsed to do in very ceremonious manner) they requested, that they wold begin the war, and the other would not forsake them. And in the same Booke there is a most holy oath, to assure the batell giuen by

by the horsemen. They on horse cry altogether, that this holy oath may be imposed on euery man: Neuer to be receiued into his house; neuer to goe backe to his parents, nor to his wife, vntill hee haue twice thwarted ouer the enemies armaes. Wherto that of Marcellinus conformeth, speaking of Julian: All were commanded to sweare in his Name, & setting solemnly the points of their swords vnto their throates, made execrable oathes and curses on themselves, if they brake their vows.

But now it is time to finish our discourse. Having thus reported the manners and customes of ancient Gaule, the temperance of the peoples liues, their assurance in dangers, their wisdom in artes and disciplines, their iustice, in ruling and establiishing the best meanes, for good ordering and gouerning their common-wealth: There remaineth now no more, but if we can recover the like leysure (having finished some other studies already entred on) we hope to proceed in the manners and customes of our new Gaules or Frenchmen, which will yeelde the more delight and pleasure, because the subject is of a farre more excellent nature.

THE SECOND BOOKE.

CHAP. I.

Of the new Gaules, or those that are called (now aduies) Frenchmen, or the people of France, succeeding after their Predecessors, the Ancient Gaules.

Among all parts of the Earth, Europe, (though it is the least) holdeth the verie cheefest rancke, as beeing the principall, and most worthy: So it is not to bee doubted, but that among all the Countries of Europe, France must needs be the most excellent in all respects. The people of Arabia that now are, haue a customary kinde of saying, that if the world were a Ring, the City of Ormuz must bee the Beziele, Collet or Head, wherein the most precious Stone is to be enchaied. By much better reason then, may it lawfully be saide of France, and a true saying:

France the cheefest country of Europe

France the cheefest country of Europe

France abounding in the fertility of all things.

It is the lesser eye, & the Pearle of the world.

As one of her owne Poets formerly hath sung. Which no way can be accounted strange, when consideration is iustly made, of the great blessings, commodites, and graces of Heauen, wherewith the Land is and hath bene endowed. For there is nothing else found to be compared therewith; be it if we regard the fertility and abundance of all things, not only necessary for the life of man, but also for all sorts of pleasures and delights. Bee it also, for the sweetnesse, temperance, and amenity of the Ayre: not hauing any other, more graciously regarded by the cie of the Sunne. No lesse commendable (for valour) is the courage and spirit of the people, which haue inhabited there to this present time, who not onely haue extended their renoune through all Lands habitable: but also haue excelled in whatsoever can bee applied to the height of minde.

About all (as most admirable) is the dignity, greatness, and Maiesly of their Kings, redoubtable and exalted (for their vertues truly heroes call) about all other on the earth. In this excellency then, there are three things to be discouered: the first is that of the Land it selfe; the second is of the People; and the third is of their Kings, which result as well from the two Precedents, as from their owne proper vertue.

Concerning the goodnes of the Land, it were an infinite labour to expresse fo many blessings, and all things else which it produceth, euen of best vie for the life of man, and that in such abundance, as sufficeth not only for the people; but also are imparted and dispersed to other Nations, without any incommody to it selfe, and (in a manner) not to be discerned. The fat fields, couered with good wheate and all graines else of any kinde, fill the Graunges & Garners euery harvest season. The Mountaines and Hillies, clothed with goodly Vineyards, which bring forth most healthfull and delicate wines: & almost euery where floured with all kinde of fruite trees. There is not a tote of vnprofitable Land, all is laboured and husbanded, or serues for pasturage for feeding beas, which causeth such plenty of all sorts of flesh. There ye may likewise behold goodly Woods & Forrests, filled with all kinde of game and Venison. Most excellent Flax & Hempe, wherof cloth is made in great abundance. Dyers woad also, Scarlet holme-ozke, Saffron, with many many singular Plants and Hearbs, not only for Medicine, but also nourishable.

Heereto I may adde, the admirable sight of great and goodly Riuers, both nauigable, and abounding with fish, dispersing themselves through France, as veins in the body of man: making the mid-land Regions as apt for commerce, as those on the Sea-coasts. Beside a great number of other waters, great Pooles & Pondes, Fontaines, and cleere running Riuers, all meruailous and delectable. Then haue yee goodly houses and buildings; an infinite number of rich and great Cities, Townes, Burroughs, Villages, Castels, and other Edifices. Moreouer, greater plenty of people, then in any other Region of the world. This is that which is so much wondered at by strangers, who haue thought France to bee a terrestrial Paradise: making more account (in this case) then Frenchmen do themselves, because it is so ordinary and frequent vnto them. But to such as haue sayled into farre remote strange Countries, or otherwise haue had intelligence of them: they hold it a happinesse to themselves, to see the felicity of France so farre beyond other, and thereby to know their owne good. All these graces might much better bee acknowledged, if we did but seuer and consider them particularly.

First, for VV heate and other Corne, which is the principall sustentation, to maintaine and strengthen the bodye of man: it encrease and aboundeth so in France (and that of the best that can bee) more then in any part of the world, and likewise all other sorts of graine. It is not a time now to acknowledge to great a happinesse, for we see that our Elders haue better knowne and felt it, when the Land was not thoroughly so well husbanded and tilled. As wee discern by that which is written by Strabo, Iulius Solinus Polybius, & Pomponius Mela, who speake thereof expressly. Also Cicero reporteth, that (in his time) was brought to Rome, and into Italy, great quantities of Corne from the Gaules. Pliny the Great hath also obserued the same, for speaking of the Corne of France, he saith: That it was most cleane Corne, and that it yielded foure pound of Bread, more then any other. It is well known in these dayes, that Spaine furnisheth herselfe with the Wheate and Graine of France, and that it is to her as a nursing Mother. And Portugal it selfe, which is described to bee one of the most happy and fertile countries of the Spains, hath recourse to France: as we may see by y which Ozorius saith, a Portugall Bishop of Sylues; & the same is reported likewise by others, who haue written of Relations.

And for Wines, the country is no lesse fruitful, in producing such as are very good, and in great affluence. This hath also bene confessed by our Ancients, according to the testimony of Solinus and Pliny, who renoune Bituricum-citem. Perhaps this may be interpreted, not of Bourges; but of the wine about Bordeaux, whereto hee giueth the cheefest place among all them of Gaule. And Iulian the Emperor said, that there were good vines in the grounds of Paris. Behold how Colonnella makes his moane, at that which the Italians did, for planting of Vines: forsaking their owne country, they went to seek in the delicate grounds of France, in the Isles Cyclades, and those of Andolonia. VV hereby we may perceiue, that he equalleth the grounds of France and their wines, with them of Muscadella, Greeke, and of Spaine.

Pliny saith, that in Italy they highly esteemed the Grapes of France, making mention also of a certaine kinde of admirable Grape there growing; which daily turneth it selfe to the Sunne, like as the Heliotropium doth, and therefore is called after the Greeke word Streptos. Wine is transported from France to Rome, which is there accounted very delicious: especially, that which is gathered in the grounds of Picenum, which they call Picenum, as Plutarch declarereth in his Symposiakes. Notwithstanding, there is a difficulty found in these words, as namely, that which Pliny saith, in the life of the Emperour Probus, That he had permitted to the Frenchmen to haue and plant Vines. Notwithstanding, it appeareth, that they were in France before his time.

The resolution of this, dependeth thus; that by the Edict of the Emperour Domitian, he had enioyned to the inhabitants of the Prouinces, to cut all the Vines, fewe excep-obtained. The Ethiopians (saith Herodotus) contemning gold, doe value copper beyond all other; and at this instant, siluer is made more account of in China; the gold is. The people dwelling in the Ile De Los Ladrões, in the Sea called Su, although they haue no more store of gold, then of other mettals: yet notwithstanding, they couet not, or demand any of passengers Ships layling by them; but call to them with loud cries, to let them haue yron, which they acknowledge to be most necessary.

It is to be credited, that there are no lesse store of Mines (both of gold and siluer) at this day in France, then formerly hath bene knowne, and spoken of by our Ancients: as daily might bee discouered, if men would giue their mindes to search and breake open the ground for them. But the French were neuer affected to such greedy desires, the earth yeelds and fush them vp commodities sufficient, goods & treasures in abounding plenty: without violence or deluding into the earths entrails, and very profoundest deeps, euen (as if we should say) to burye men aliue, renting and tearing hard Rocks in peeces, leuelling high Mountaines, to melte and fine them, with the losse of an infinite number of liues. Day and night is spent in these extreme passions, to get this vile mettall, and then to adoe it as a God, being the true cause & originall of the greatest miseries that can happen to man: albeit Nature (in her purity of wisdom) placed it to be trodden on vnder our feet, and hid it close in the earth, as a thing unworthy to be seene.

There are many other treasures & gifts of Nature, which are afforded vs by France. Quantum apud nos margaritis Indiciæ præcium est, tantum apud Indos in Corsilio: gignitur in Rubro mari, laudatissimum rerum in Gallico sinu ad Stachades. Looke how much (in these quarters) we esteeme the Pearles & precious Stones of India; as much reckoning there is made of our Corall. And though it encreaseth in the gulfe of Arabia; yet notwithstanding, the most excellent mettall from the Isles Stachades, now called the Isles of Ierex, so saith Pliny.

Among so many benefits and commodities, Salt likewise is one, the best & most wholesome that can be in any Country: in which regard, it is sought for by strangers, euen whence cometh great store of gold and siluer into France, beside that which is of her owne ordinary vie. Boto ranketh it among the foure things which aboundeth in France, tearmed by him Adamants, as drawing to them the gold of strangers countries. These foure Adamants (saith he) are Corne, Wine, Flax, and Hemp, and Salt.

In diuers parts of France, are the materials fit for all kinds of building. Hard stone and other matters, wherof infinite are to be seene in goodly, great, and rich buildings, Castles, and publike Edifices, wherewith the Country is wel filled, and cities beautified. Nor is it delitute of the fairest Marbles, in which respect, wee may not omit that which hath bene obserued by our Ancients, as a thing particular giuen to Gaule: that those Stones and materials do encrease in the Quarries, how liberally soeuer dispersed abroad, as Plinius the Lawyer hath left vs in writing.

It was not then without great reason, that the Poet Manilius called France Rich. And Dion tearmeth it flourishing in riches. It seemeth also to be knowne to Iosephus, who declareth, how King Agrippa deliuering to the Iewes, what inconueniences might come vnto them, by reuolting a gainst the Romanes: demanded of them if they could speake of more wealth then the Gaules had; more strength then the Allemaignes or Germanes; and better vinity and vnderstanding, then among the Greekes, all which (neuertheless) were vnder the dominion of the Romans. And he better to perswade them, in the commodities and advantages of all those people, being vnder their yoke & obedience: he saith of the Gaules, that they were (in multitude) three hundred & fiftie kindes of people. And had among them (by his manner of speaking) Welles and Springs of all happines and felicity, watering and bedewing the whole Land habitable, with riches and good blessings. He addeth beside, that there were then in Gaule, about twelue hundred Townes and Cities.

Inlike manner, Cæsar hauing bent all his hopes, one day to make himselfe Master and Monarch of the whole estate, power and dignity of the Romane Empire, and finding himselfe in want of money, charged with great debts, and yet (necessarily) to lay out greater largesse and expences, pences: to compasse the maine Master-piece wher at he aimed; Among the multitude of mighty Provinces, hee chose principally the Gaules (saith Suetonius) whose profite, riches, occasion, and opportunity, was to him subiect & matter sufficient, apt & conuenable for so great triumphing. Shewing thereby that it was the goodliest, richest, most potent, and worthy Province of the Romane Empire, & thought it there the fittest, to exalt himselfe to the Maiesty of Rome. VVhich accordingly came to passe, for by the means of the Gaules riches, not only hee discharged himselfe of his great debts: but enriched likewise all his friends, practising with diuers, & winning an infinite number of Lords in Rome, yea, they that were the cheefest Magistrates: In briefe, hee omitted not any kinde of bounty, as well publike as particular.

Among other matters, hee attempted the building of a Pallace, for the iudging of causes, the meere place costing him aboute 1400000 crownes, and altho came from the pillage of the Gaules. He feasted all the people of Rome, which was a thing (well neere) impossible and infinite. He doubled the pay of his Legions & companies of soldiers, to perpetuity; enriching the rest with good gifts, beside great distributions, as well of monies as flaures, as also lands and victuals, which he caused to be giuen to euery Citizen of Rome, & likewise to his Captains & Soldiers. For Plutarke saith; He emptied out of his owne Coffers, the riches of the Gaules, to such as help him to the publike gouernment of Rome, euen what they would haue. He acquitted Curius the Tribune, of a great sum of money, which he ought him: And gaue to the Consul Paulus, 1500. Talents, amounting to 900000. Crownes of french coine.

All this bounty, all these goods & treasures, were taken in Gaule, & (as Suetonius saith) without any spare of the Temples, which he knew to be rich in gifts & many times sacking Cities, rather for the greedy desire of booty, then any other iust cause. And Cicero saith: That he had overcome Nations, abounding in all things & in all the several kinds of power; this he meant of the Gaules. For not only was that true which Procopius saith; That Gaule is much more powerfull then Spaine: but also about all the other Provinces of the Romane Empire, according to the iudgement of Cæsar. So then, it may iustly be saide, that Gaule, as well for riches, as for the me that hee found there, gaue entrance to the great power of Cæsar, & was the cause, means, and instrument of his designs, & obtaining the Empire of the world, which hee enioyed, in despite of so many Romane Lords, his aduersaries and competitors.

But among so many prosperities, it is a matter both rare & admirable, that there are to be found few or no difcommodities at all, wherewith the land should be annoyed. There is not any Region in the world, how goodly or happy soeuer it may bee saide to be, but is subiect to sundry inconueniences, that make a counte poise to the felicity thereof. Arabia, which carrieth the surname of Happy, wherewith, beside many blessings it affordeth, the odors & perfumes there growing, maketh the aire all embalmed, as it were: yet in counterchange, it hath two very great difcommodities. One is, that in those Forrests of most odoriferous trees, throughout in euery place, are found a great number of small and short serpents, of the same colour as the earth is, that subtilly sting and bite men, before they haue any power to perceiue it, or defend themselves against it; and being thus bitten, they cause their death in a million of tormentes. The other is that these so happy people are subiect to a strange discale, proceeding fro their ouermuch ease, and hot perfumes of the country: so that to helpe themselves, they are enforced to find out all kinds of stinking and infectious smells, euen the foulest that can be, so saith Diadorus. So that there is no happinesse in any part, neither any such pleasing sweetnes; but it is conioynd & neighbored with one grieke or other.

The Regions of Africa, those that are the most delicious of all, are ordinarily afflicted with an infinite number of wilde beasts, horrible Dragons, Serpents, & other venomous creatures: beside Lions, Leopards, Panthers, Ounces, & prodigious monsters, which Africa produceth from time to time, often rayfing sledge against the inhabitants, compelling the to seeke out new dwellings. China, which is described to vs to be so fortunate, and abounding in all things: hath many afflictions. Fire fallies fro heauen there vially and such wonderful rauage is made, that not only it embraceth & consumes particular cular houses; but Villages, Burroughs, & great Cities altogether, yea, many times whole Provinces. Deluges and inundations haue also wrought there strange effects, spoyling, ouerthrowing, and defacing whole Countries, & that very often Earthquakes, ingulfings, and impetuous shewes of raie, are (as a man should say) there daily: thus you see what delight and happinesse, is in the greatest & most renowned kingdome of the East.

There are Countries, which suffer colds and insupportable freezings: as other are meere burnt and wasted with heates. Witnesse the * Namones, who in regard of this heate (they dwelling beyond the Torride Zoone) do curse the Sunne when it passeth ouer them. I hus then other Regions, being esteemed so happy for perfumes, odours, & such kinde of delights: doe sometime pay very dearly for their pleasures: perill is euermore neighbour to ioy, and contentment is close followed at the heeles, with some or other mishap.

Whosoeuer thinketh to gather the sweets of their fairest flowers, or the iuyce of their most delicious plants; may as soone meete with deadly poyson, and in stead of sweetnesse, finde such bitternesse, as quickly will bring him to his graue. Either by the Aspicke lying close hidden, whose pricke causeth sudden sleepe, & procureth death in that sleepe. The Snakes bying, bringeth a deadly drought with it. The Viper filleth the whole body full with venome, by his byting. The Basilike slayeth by his very sight onely. The earth by quaking, endangereth to swallow men vp, or ouerthrow and kill them in their houses. A deluge suddenly carrieth away, and couers all with water. The Lyon or the Tyger comes onely to deuoure.

Strabo hauing related the goodnesse of Batica in Spaine, which is now Granada & Andalusia, saith withall, that the country is persecuted with an afflictio very strange yet reputed to be ridiculous. It is by the great and immense multitude of Conies or Rabbits, which feede on, and consume their feedes, plants, and rootes of trees. He also saith, it hence enlueth, that almost throughout Spaine yea, and the neighbouring Isles, are thereby afflicted. Adding beside, that the inhabitants of the Isles Gymnasia or Baleares, now called Maïorque and Minorque, sent Ambassadors, to request aid of the Romanes, against these hurtfull creatures, and to chafe them out of their country, as being vnable to endure their multitude. And succour was necessarily required in so great a warre, which doth not alwayes happen (saith he) but when the country is subiect to be infected with some plague of pestilence, famine, or such other affliction and punishment sent from Heauen.

Marcus Varro writeth, that a Towne in Spaine was wholly vndermined, and ruined by those Conies, & another in Thes-salie, by Moales. Some that haue bene dis-peopled & forsaken, in regard of the great multitude of Frogs. Another in Africa, by Locusts. Also, that the inhabitants of the City * Gyaros, now called Gura, in one of the Cyclades; were expelled thence by Rats: and that in Italy, an ancient City called Amylea, was vtterly ruined and lost by Serpents. There is a Region in Africa, where a great extensure of the country is become desert, the people which dwelled there being driuen to all extremities, and quite exterminated, onely by Scorpions and Pistemires, which are a kinde of venomous Ants. Theophrastus reporteth, that others were expelled by * Scelopendraes. And Strabo saith, that Spaine was ordinarily infected with a strange multitude of Rats: whereupon (oftentimes) followed contagious diseases. The like happened once to the Romanes, when they were in the countries of the Balques and Astures: so that they were glad to hire men to chafe them away, the Rats came so fast vpon them, and hardly could they faue themselves from them. An ancient Philosopher, named * Dicaearchus, wrote a Book, of the ruine of men, and had collected together, how many ruines had happened in diuers countries, by reason of the inopinate multitude of beasts: by whose impetuous violence, he sheweth, that some Nations haue bene lost and consumed.

FRANCE, on the contrary (God be praised for it) neuer was subiect to so many miseries, & there is nor any Region found in all the habitable world, being so happy, tasteth lesse inconueniences. Deadly poyson cannot deccie him that gathereth there her whole some flowers & hearbs, or perfumes. man from his home. The Serpent cannot annoy the passenger or haruest Reaper by his byting, because there is none at all to be found there. A man may safely take the Evening or Mornings benefit on the greene grasse, without dread of any venomous creature, which are most dangerous in other countries. But admit that there were some kinde of Serpents or Snakes in some peculiar parts: yet are they very few, and no harme at all discerned to come from them. No Egyptian Aspicke is there to bee found, and that which is termed in France an Aspicke: it is no Aspicke at all but rather a Viper, as is verified in the Observations of P. Bolanius. Neuertheless, it is rare or seldome to be seene there, and benefit (rather then any harme) is to be receiued thereby. And say that this Serpent were very venomous: yet notwithstanding, it serueth most commodiously for the life of man, and Treacle is compounded thereof. The verie learnedst Physicians do hold, that the flesh thereof is soveraigne for many diseases, and that which is much more, it hath power to lengthen the life of man, in such as make ordinary vse of it, as manie of our Ancients did, and other healthfull people yet liuing, who haue heretofore referred the cause of their so long healthfull continuance. Thus our Ancients, and especially the learned Egyptians, vfed the Snake as an Hieroglyphick, marke and signe of health: presenting it to theyr Goddesse Sanitas, rouled about with other creatures.

Moreover, France is not subiect to the miseries and horrors of Earth-quakes. Neuer shall ye there heare the earth grone, bellow, then tremble, shake, and swallow vp houses, Burroughs, & whol Townes, making groweth of Mountaines, by leuellling and plaining other places, to drie vp waters and riuers, and then sodainly to let loose Flood-gates of Nouelties; to stay their violent course of a streame, and then to make it run directly against his currēt: to let forth flaming fires, to finish that with greater defolation, which the former Earth-quake had left behinde it. By an especial priuilege of heauen, France stands exempted from all these; experience hath made it apparant, & Pliny long ago witnessed it, when he saide: That the Gauls were not shaken by tremblings of the earth.

To know the quiet condition and felicity of France in this case, wee may compare and consider other Nations & Provinces, and what great afflictions and ruines haue insued to them by such harmes, in most part of the worlds Regions. Wee finde, that in Italy and other Countries, in the time of the Punicke warres, the people were tormented with Earth-quakes, seuen and fifty times in one yeare. VWho would not be amazed, to heare that two hills should approach neere each to other, to iustle (as it were) together; then, to retire and auancer on againe, after the manner of fight, stirring and moving furiously, with an horrible noise and breaking? A great fire and sioake rofe vp betweene them; and by this their rude encounter, houses and villages (seated in the valley) were bruised and beaten downe, & both men and beasts smothered to death: euen as it happened in the Territorie of Modena, in the yeere 622. and in the City of Rome, in the time of the wars of Marius and Sylla. This was seene in broad day time, by a great number of passengers & Romanes Cities, who beheld this wofull spectacle, from the neere-neighbouring high-way, or hill ascending to the Capitoll.

It was a strange thing, that trembling or Earth-quake, which happened vnder the Emperor Tiberius, and in the 5. yeare of his Empire (to the end we may not, as Orosius doth, confound it with that which chanced twelue years after, miraculously, euen at the passion of our Sauour: Tacitus reporteth, that in this yeere (which was the 770. of the City of Rome) in one night, twelue great and famous Cities of Natolia, were ruined and vtterly ouerthrowne, such as was Ephesus, Sardis, Cuma, Philadelphia, and other of the same ranke. And that which was most terrible, they had not the means of open flight, an ordinary succour in such misfortunes; yet thereof they were deprived, because the earth shrunke and opened vnder their feete, and swallowed them vp immediately. Herewithall arose shinings and flames of fire among the ruines; and that which was plaine champaigne ground before, was exalted to Mountaines, and contrarywise, Mountaines became euen and leuell ground.

Heere might also bee alledged, the vfall

small and frequent earthquakes at Constantinople, and whereto it hath bene alwayes subiect. And in such manner, as during thereigne of the Emperour Theodosius, there happened such an Earth-quake, as lasted foure moneths continually: the people being constrained to fflye out of the City, not daring to returne in againe. There was another as strange, which chanced in some yeares before, in the City of Nicea in Natolia, which was ruined; and the dreadfull effectes thereof are particularly written by Ammianus Marcellinus, and vnder the reigne of the Emperour Constantine. Zonarus reporteth, that thirteene great Townes of Champaigne ground in Italy, or in the foyle called Terra di Lavoro, were vterly ouerthrowne. But among other, the City of Antioche was wonderfully afflicted. In the reigne of the Emperour Iustinian, it was ouerthrowne; and an infinite number of men therein swallowed. Soone after, it was re-builde by the liberality of the Emperour, and two yeares were not fully expired, when this goodlie and flourishing Citie had bene newly finished; but againe in like manner it was wholly ruined, and the greater part of the inhabitants buried in the downfall. This was in the beginning of Iustinians empire. Such miseries neuer hapned in the Kingdom of France: Gallæ terræ motibus minime quatitur.

It is likewise a happineſſe particular to France, that the ſweetneſſe and temperature of the Ayre is ſuch; as in compariſon of that in other Provinces, there is neyther exceſſive colds, nor inſupportable heats. And if in ſome year it happen otherwiſe, it is but once in an hundred yeeres, and of ſo ſmall continuance, that it is only but as a ſcantling: therby to let the Frenchmen know, the ſharpe rigour and difcommodity that other people endure, to the end they may the better vnderſtand their owne felicity, and ſhape their comforts anſwerable thereto. Length of Winters, and of Nights; the bitter North-eaſt windeſ of Scythia; Mountains of Ice and Snow, neuer hindereth their Commerce, nor their Voyages at all ſeaſons of the year. Their Seas doe not freeze, as often it dooth in Pontus Euxinus, or Mare maior, euen ſo farre as the ſtreights of Conſtantinople. On the contrary ſide, extremity of heate constraines not men to keepe them a long while hidden vnder ground, without daring to come forth but in the night time: neyther to sleepe in the water, and like the Amphibii or halfe Fishes, to dwell there the most part of their time. That which is reported of many people, & particularly of the dwellers in Barbarie, Ormus, and them of Taprobane, now called Samatra: no any thing here is like vnto them, but all most temperate. From so sweete an Ayre, can proceede nothing but healthfullnesse, the Heauens being no way subiect to ingender frequent and irksome Diseases. Therefore did Cæsar deservedly set this commendation on France: To be a Country most sweete and healthfull. And so the English-men likewise, in the recital of Froissard, doe note France, To be a most safe Country, and very sweete, a courteous Country, with mild aire, and delicate iuers.

It is an admirable matter also; that France produceth such diuersity of things and in such abundance: there being no Country throughout the World more commixed, and that hath lesse meanes of subiect, for recourse vnto other. It is by a priuiledge and particular right, and against the Law which Nature hath giuen vnto other landes; but to speake vprightly of France, it is proper to all, and in such sort, as there is not any thing particular to other, which is not common in it. In regard whereof, and considering what hath formerly bene said, there needs no doubt to be made: but that which Virgil meant to say in commendation of his Italy, was much more fitting for the Land of France.

Beside, that which he could say concerning the amenity or delectableness of Italy, was but for some certaine places; & the Italians themselves do know wel enough, that whatsoeuer they do admire or commend, in any particular part of Italie, it is to be found every where in France, and is meerely common there.

Moreover, the Kingdome is most absolutely feared for Navigation: because on the one side it hath the Mediterranean sea, and the Ocean sea on the other, environing it by a long exendure, and wherein are many goodly and commodious Ports and Hauens. As for the Land it selfe, it is as in the very middest or hart of Europe. Suriano, in his relation of France, hath well obserued it, and makes great reckoning of the commodiouseffe of the situation, vying these very words.

Il regno di Francia, come quello che è in mezzo della Christianità, è commo- & oportuno più d'ogni altro per vnire & diuidere (sua volontà) le forze de i più gran Principi, & de i popoli più bellicosi, perche à dnanzi l'Italia, & l'Inghilterra ale spalle, à man destra la Spagna, à sinistra la Germania, di qua Suizzeri, di qua Flamengi, & oltre di questo à fer di mare, il Mediterraneo dell'vna parte, & l'Oceano d'all'altra: onde per mare & per terra può facilmente fauorire tutte l'imprefe & tutti li disegni di ciascun Principe & Potentato del mondo. Et quanto à se, è sicuro di ogni banda & per Natura, & per Arte.

The Kingdom of France, as that which is in the midst of Christendome, is oportune & commodious (more then all other) to unite and divide (at her owne will) the forces of the very greatest Princes, and of the most warlike people. Because it is bath by before it, England to shoulder it, Spain on the right hand, Germany on the left: on this side the Switzers, on that side the Flemings. And beside all this, it is betweene two Seas, the Mediterranean on the one part, & the Ocean on the other: so that by sea and land, they may easily fauour all the emperizors, and all the designs of euery Prince and Potentate in the World. And as for her selfe, she is most secure on euery side, both by Nature, and by Art.

Let no man then thinke strangely of it, if France be endowed with so many celestiall graces and fauours, and so wel peopled and inhabited, that any thing can be comparable thereto, in all other Countreys whatsoeuer. There is not a iorte of voyde or waste ground; the goodly and great Cities and Townes, are all well filled with inhabitants, and very neer neighbouring one to another. Trauailing vpon

the common high-wayes, from any part whither you please: you shal finde them bordered with great villages, faire Houses and Castles, and the people swarming euery where, euen as if al France were but one Citv.

It is not so in other regions, for in some there are immense Forests, Lakes, and Marish grounds, taking vp immeasurable roome; as in Germany, and in the Low Countries. In other places, are great and sterile Mountaines, which take vpe no meane part of the Countrey: as Botero acknowledge, that the Apennines vsurpe a whole quarter of Italy. There can you not behold (as you may in France) small hills and dales, sweetly clothed, and flourishing with delicate fruit trees, or vneathie Vineyards, or else employed to some other profitable vse. As for the Alpes and Apennines, for the most part, there is nothing to be seene but sharpe and craggie rocks, bearing their heads vp vnto the clouds, couered with Mosses and Saltpetre, and hauing very dreadfull downefalls. There is nothing but hardnesse, rocks full of horror, places vnacceffable, vnprofitable, and fruitelesse, cyther for Men or Beasts.

Concerning Spaine, so much as it is far off from this happinesse of France, euē (in comparisōn) it is as slenderly peopled. Behold the perspective thereof, according as Sr. abo hath drawne it downe for vs. Spaine (saith he) for the most part is very ill inhabited. For the Mountains, Forests, and plaines (whereby the land is dried, meager and barren, being but slenderly holpen with waters) takes up too much ground. The same Author faith in another place, that hee cannot beleue that there hath bin so many Cities or Townes in Spain, as some haue reported, or else they counted Villages for Townes. For (saith hee)

The Nature of the Country cannot receive any number of Townes, in regard of the barrenneſſe of the ground; by being farre off, & retired from one of the worlds corners: and alſo the ayre breathing not gracious & agreeable. Thus you ſee the true deſcription of Spaine, and this licke Iayth, becauſe it is found in ſome Authors of Antiquity, who have teamed it to be happy and fertile: it is to be underſtood of the Sea ſhores, and ſome Countreys, where (in truth) it is ſo. mented with a pestilence, which doeth greatly dispeople it: to the no meane amazement of many, that haue made deep search into the cause. So it is in like manner affirmed by diuers, that the Grand Caire is euery year afflicted with the Pestilence. Vndoubtedly, when I consider with my selfe, that great Louis, vulgarly called Chlouis, stayed his opinion, and made Paris the seat of his kingdome, leaving many other Cities which were then far greater: and that before him, the Emperor Julian (being come into France) established there his ordinary abode, and called it Amiable or Louely. I am compelled to admire therein, their great Wisedome and vnderstanding, in choosing a place so commodious, so pleasant and answerable; although then it seemed to be one of the least Citties of Gaul. It would require an entire volume to speak thereof, and yet none will credit what it is, except they haue the happinesse to see it: & the fight may much better satisfye them, then all that can be sayde or written of it. Therefore I wil end this discourse, adding onely that which is sayde by Botero Parigi, Città che di popolo, & di abbondanza d'ogni cosa, auanza di gran lunga tutte l'alre di Christianità. Paris a City that in people and abundance of all things, goeth farre beyond all the rest of Christendome.

CHAP. II.

Of the People dwelling in this fruitfull Land of France, what they were being ancient by Gaules, and afterwards Frenchmen: their Manhood, Valour, and successfull Fortunes.

Land it selfe in all things: let vs now see (according vnto our intended purpose) what the people haue bene and are in their condition. Such as haue heard of so extraordinary felicity, perhaps may quickly condemne mee, by alledging it as a matter impossible: that in a Region so pleasant, gracefull, and abounding in all kindes of goodnesse: the inhabitants can any way be vertuous, valiant, and courageous. Great Cyrus was of that Opinion, when his victorious Persians laboured to change their Countrey, in regard it was sharpe, rough, rude, and Mountainous; for one of them which they had conquered, that was more pleasant, consisting of goodly plaines, and euen Champaigne grounds. Which hee would not suffer them to doe, but shewed them, that like vnto feeds and plants, so are the liues of men made conformable vnto those Regions where they abide. As if hee would haue sayd, that in a fair & fortunate countrey, the mindes of men alter, and quickly become effeminate.

Hanniball, not onely inuincible by the Armies of the Romanes, but also by so many victories ouer them, bringing them neerer to their viter ruine, then euer they were or had bene: was ouerthrowne and confounded, by the soft and easie delights of Capua. The sweets of his winter sojourning there, did enurate and weaken both him and all his army, which the rough Alpes and freezing snowes, had formerly made vnconquerable. Euen so we may say, and very truly, that the high and mighty courage of Alexander, was softened by the luxury, sumptuousnes, and dissolutions among the Persians.

It is a matter verie frequent and ordinarie, that the Provinces of greatest happinesse, become a prey to others, in becoming voluntarily destitute of courageous men. For, a more warlike people coming to invade them, after they haue continued there for some time: they forget their former generosity, as if they were wholly changed, and with the very ayre of the countrey, had deriued to themselves the verie same Nature. Sicily hath alwaies bin the butte and ayne of all warlike people, as of the Grecians, the Carthaginians, and the Romanes, and of many other beside.

Also in Egypt, which is one of the verie choicest, fertilest, and richest Nations of the worlde: the most martiall people that come to stay there, doe after enter into such a lazic condition, that they stand in neede of chafing thence, euen as they did to the first inhabitants. The like great and frequent changes haue bin often obserued, as well in ancient as more moderne times; and namely, vnder the Mahometane Califfes. It is reported of the Wel * Salmacis in Caria (which is one of the regions of Natalia) that such as drinke the water thereof, doe immediately become women. But the truth is, according to the relation of Vitruuius, that it is a place so goodly, pleasant, and where the people liue in such delights and dissolutions; that the courages of men, after they haue liued there any long while, becometh altogether effeminate or womanish; which gaue such a subiect to the Fable, as if they had bene changed into women, and receyued into another Nature. Some haue attributed (to the felicitous reason) the vmanlinesse of the latter Grecian Emperors of Constantinople, through the ouer-much delicacie of the Countrey.

All this is contrary in France, for amidst such a great affluence, and euen among a world of pleasures; generous spirits are borne, truly warriors, and of men excelling in all vertues, it yeeldeth withall the like abundance of euery other thing; yea, euen among those Frenchmen as suffer themselves to be led into all pleasures, in peacefull & vndisturbed times; yet are they not thereby softened a iotte, neyther lose any of their courage, valour, and addresse to actions of Armes. But euen, as if they were meere borne thereto, nor euer learned any other kinde of exercise: being euermore readie to giue ouer all pleasures, to follow the warres, march to fights, and throw themselves first into the mouth of danger. This is their true exercise, their naturall inclination, which they knowe not how to forget or giue ouer; and whensoever they delight in hunting, yet are they more readie to returne to Armes.

The like naturall disposition is described by Zozimus, of the Emperor Valentinian, who although hee was a man giuen to much pleasure, and addicted himselfe thereto at due seasons: yet notwithstanding, when occasion required, he was alwayes readie to vndertake Armes, whereof as patiently hee endured all the paines, toiles, and incommodities, euen as if hee had taken a great pleasure and felicitie therein. Such a man was Demetrius King of Macedon among the Grecians, and Marcus Antonius among the Romanes; and Scipio giues very little ground vnto them in martiall disposition. Caesar also, speaking of his Army (composed for the most part of Gaules) saide: That his Soldiers, howeuer they were perfumed, yet they left not (for all that) to fight valiantly and courageously. Milites suos etiam vnguentatos, bene pugnare. The like account was heretofore made, that the Belgians were the most hardiest and valiant amongst the Gaules: because, they would permit no Merchandizes to be brought into their Countrey, that any way might serue to soften the naturall inclination of Men. But he knew well enough soon after, that valiance and Militarie vertue was so naturall vnto them that were borne and nourished vnder the ayre of Gaul, as it could not by any meanes bee quailed in them, or separated from them, by the plenitude of any thing seruing vnto voluptuousnesse.

Some haue held opinion, that the rigor and austeritie of the Persian youths, and their continuall manner of liuing in so stricke a kinde; prooued to be the onely cause, that they were much better men of warre, then their neighbours. And surely, the Lacedemonians differed not from this coniecture of them, when they saide: They made no great merruile why they went so boldly to warre, and exposed themselves vnto death; considering, what small delight and contentment they tooke in life, in regard of the harsh and rigorous discipline of their lawes. But the Gentlemen of France, although they be borne and bred delicately, they do neuer faile in generous courage: Armes, and verie hard Trauailes in Warre, are vnto them as sportes and pastimes; and, to speake iustly, they are born thereto, without neede of so much cunning and instruction, as others haue to exercise and prepare them.

Those people that Fraunce hath bred and yeelded, haue alwayes bene redoubtable for their Armes, to all other Nations of the world. The Romanes well felt it, when they were hewed in peeces by the Gaules, on the day at Alia. And afterward, when (vpon their fodaine coming on them) they were constrained to such an abundance of youthfull French, that they filled Asia, euen as if it had bin swarms of Bees: in such sort, that the Kings of those quarters of the East, attempted not any war,

wherein they had not Frenchmen under pay.
And if they chaced to be expelled from their estates, they had no other recourse, but to throwe themselves into the armes of the French. Such was the terror of the French-mens Name, or the inuincible felicity of their Armes; that Kings knew not howe to pro-uide, nor conferre their Mæsties, or to re-couer it againe being lost, without the valour of the French. To conclude, being called by the King of Bithynia, to lend him succour, after they had parted away with victory, they also parted or diuided his kingdom with the,
and surnamed the Countrey Gallo-Gracia, or

Those verie Gaules whereof we now
speake, were come away from Thrace,
where they (before) had established a Kingdome: which continued afterward,
till the time of Charyas their last king, according to the report of Polihius. The people of Thrace, of Bizantium, and of Cherronsus, being then their tributaries.
All this is affirmed and maintained of the ancient Gaules.

Nowe, as concerning such as haue
caried the name of Frenchmen or Gauls, ancientlanders, and dwellers in partes neerer hand, as well on this side, as beyond the Rhine: they long time made warre with the Romanes, pursuing them with their Armies, and ouer-labouring them by so many courtes; that at length they expelled them quite from amongst the Gaules. They were first obliged to appeare vnder that name of Frenchmen, in the time of the Emperor Galen; and from thence onward, the Roman Histories are copious, how manie times they passed and repassed the Rhine, to make warre with the Romanes, vwhen

they thought to teare away Gaule out of their hands. Panegyricall Authors, exalting those Emperors with praises to heauen, that had in any encounter (how silly foeuer) got any aduantage against the French; do yet make it sufficiently known what great account was made of this people and generous Nation, yea, more then of any other, as being most fearefull
to them, and to whome (for this cause)
they yielded themselves tributaries.

Vnder the Emperor Claudius the 11.
they inuaded Holland, and other neighbouring Countries, and made thence their courtes and wonted expeditions, as well by Land as Sea; vntill they extended their power to onward, that they entred sometaine voyage of theirs, and a chance well deseruing memory. The Emperor Probus

hauing made warre on them, and wonne
the vpper-hand in some encounter; hee tooke diuers of them prisoners, which he led away into Asia. Soon after, they made an escape, & being embarked in certaine small vessels, which they found fitting for their purpose: they ouer-ran and raged the coasts of Greece, and the Isles of the Ionian sea, besieging and taking Siracusa,
and afterward passing the straites of Ge-baltare, returned home againe into their owne country. The verie greatest affairs, that euer the Romanes had with Straingers, were alwaies against the Gaules, or French, who neuer would suffer them to liue in quiet.

In the end, the Emperors well vnder-stood their valour, and made vse thereof to their seruice. Constantine the Great, in the warre hee made against Licinius: had great store of them in his Armie, vnder conduct of a verie valiant French Captaine, named Bonticus, whose manhood is well noted by Ammianus Marcellinus. At the same time, partly by conquest, partly by conuincence of the Emperours; they extended the Gaules name very farre, and did so great seruices to the Romanes, that they filled whole Legions of them. Especially, vnder the Emperours Constantus, Constantius, Valens and Valentinian, as is to be seene in Ammianus Marcellinus, *Zozi-

times.

more strict alliance with them, could find out a Mellibands, Prince of the French, beside many other Captaines and Soldiers: by whose meanes he assured his owne estate, and carried away great Victories
from the Germanes, whereof thirty thousand were laine in the field. This Prince did so highly esteeme of them, as they serued him in all occasions: yea, they filled vp the Army which he gaue to Theodofius, to make quietnesse in the East, and to repulse thence the Gothes, Moreouer, he fauoured and aduanced them to great charges of his Court, and euen (as if in respect of them) he began to grow in distaste with his Romanes; so prouoed it (partly) to be the cause of death.

It is most plaine and apparant, that for the space of about 200. yeares, they were the threshing Flaile, the terror & amazement of the Roman Empire: wherto (to vse the same words that Claudian sayth of them) They sold peace and quietnesse at the prizes of money, and tooke great recompences to cease their fights. The Epithets vvhich
the Authors of those times gaue them, were the names of Terrible, dreadfull, and redoubted Warriors; as being the only nation, that (more then all other else could do) amated, bruised, yea, & vterly brake
in peeces the Romanes forces.

After that this Monarchy of the French in Gaule was fully established: they could then vndertake other great enterprizes & voyages. How many times did they passe in Armes, both into Asia and Africa, to chafe thence the Infidels, Sarazens, and Turkes, to deliuer the Holy land, and the Christians that were there in their seruitude? There hath not bene any expedition in Christendome, wherein they haue
not bene heads and conductors, yea euen
the better part it selfe. Many times haue they succoured & re-established the Emperours of Constantinople. And in the end, to reuenge the death of Isaacius Angelus, (whom they had defeated som short time before) cruelly murdered by the Tyrant Marsuffle: they took in their assault that great City, where they commanded (almost) foure hundred yeares. They made themselues so knowne thoroughout the East and South parts, and haue so liuely engrauen there the memorie of their name: that (euen to this day) all the Orientals terme the inhabitants of Europe,

by the word Franki, as thinking that name to be vniuersall. As in like manner the A-rabians and the Abyssines, who call Europe by the name of Frankia.

Ozorius, the learned bythop of Sylves
reporteth, that the Indians when the Por-tugals make warre against them: they call them by no other name then Franki, as confessing naturally, that since the braue expeditions of the French, against the Turkes and Sarazins; this name (full of admiration among those people) had fo-spread it selfe thoroughout all Asia and Africa, that alwaies afterward, the same was to be attributed vnto all the Western people.

But to deliberate no longer at this time
on all the expeditions of warre, and voyages attempted by the French for the christian name, for the defence of religion &
the Church, against Moores, Sarazins, Turkes, and other Mahometanes, in di-uers Countries of the world, and the glorious and goodly actions thereby them performed: Can any thing bee tearmed more hardy, valiant and generous, then that which they did for conquest of the holy Land? Vnder-taking so long a Voyage, crossing so many Countries, & with such store of difficulties: Nothing could dant or turne them; nothing seemed impossible to them, beeing altogether inflamed with a zealous & diuine desire. They exposed themselues to all kindes of dangers, inconuenience of places and passages, famine, thirst, pestilence and warre:
merely prodigal of their liues, for religious zeale. In whatsoeuer we read concerning antiquity, yea euen of the fabulous ages, neuer are to be found such deedes of prowesse, as they did in that conquest.

Let Godfrey of Bullen set himself before you, with his gallant French troopes, tra-uersing al Germany & Hungaria, & arriuing
at Constantinople: there is assailed by diuers ambuscadoes on the Emperours behalf, yet ouercoming them all, euen as if it were against his wil to preuaile. Then looke on him passing the straits of the Hellepont, besieging the city of Nicea, one of the strongest in all the East, munited with all things sustained and defended by a people refolued, as wel for assaults given, as fallies repelled, or by any cunning to bee circumuented. During this siege, the Army

After this, beheld another battell giuen in Cicilia or Caramania, by thirty thousand French onely, against an Armie of two hundred thousand Turkes and Mahometanes, led by the same Soliman, and the Sultane of Perfia. These two hundred thousand Turkes, hauing (at their first charge from farre off) covered all the Christian Army with a cloud of Arrows; and making a counterfet shew of flight, sent another shower of shafts in the same manner, and then a third, they not hauing any meanes to ioyne or come neere them. So that there was scarcely one man among the Christians, but was wounded with their steeld Arrows, some in the armes, others in the legges, and many in diuers parts of their bodies, notwithstanding the helpe of their Targets: euen as if we saw the like Army of the Romanes led by M. Crisus against the Parthians. Vntill such time as Godfrey refused to make a pretence of flight, and (indeed) yretted, as if he had bene no longer able to endure them. Which moued the Turkes to pursue after them out of order, as if they were altogether ouerthrowne and disheartened. But when the French behelde them within their compasse, that they might deale with them by handy stroakes: all wounded as they were, they gaue such a couragious charge vpon the Infidels, that they foiled and vanquished the whole Army. So proceeding on, the Citties of Tharsus and of Edeffa, and all the other betwene them, were likewise taken.

City of Antioch by Godfrey of Bullen.

Antioche besiedged by a long siege, the besiegers being incessantly assayed, as well with the yssuing forth of an Army that was within, as by the ambuscadoes of many troopes at liberty abroad, besides cutting off victuals, and all other commodities from them. In these extremities they were also oppressed with contagious diseases, famine, and other kindes of necessities and miseries, every thing being opposit and contrary to them, and the Emperor of Constantinople, doing his very vttermost to endamage them. All which notwithstanding, they lost not a jot of courage, or became any way at all disheartned in this their enterprise, although to make their misery much more:

there came also on them another dreadfull Army, containing all the powers of the East, and appearing impossible to bee resisted. But the Christians conducted by Godfrey of Bullen, over-spent and wearied as they were, hauing giuen the battles; ouercame the great Armies, and droue them to flight.

The happy
successe of the Christians against the Infidels.

Let passe an infinite number of particular charges, encounters, combates, fights, ambushes, surprizes and assaults, to come to the siege of Ierusalem, where they met with all resistance possible, both by force and cunning: which neuertheless (in the ende) after infinite famous actions of Armes, was wonne by liuely force, and in a generall assault. All this was done in lesse then two yeares, from the yeare 1097. to the yeare 1099. when Ierusalem was wonne, and in the Month of Iuly. Then was Godfrey chosen King of Ierusalem, who yet refused the crowne of gold, saying; It fitted not him to weare that pompe, where his Lord and Saviour wore one of sharpe pricking thornes. Every one of the other Princes & French Lords, which made vp the body of the Army, were also partakers in the chiefe possession of Citties and Prouinces thereabout; & there was not a man among them, but was capable of holding the Empire of the world, and by farre greater reason, then is reported of Alexanders Captaines. And this may iustly be the cause (in part) that the successe was not so great as it might haue bene: they being able to haue passed on, so farre as the extremest parts of the East, to conquer all the Country, and plant their Ensignes on the banks of the Indian Seas. In brieft, there was neuer a thing comparable thereto, neither for religious piety, nor manhood in Armes.

It was also a matter admirable in Godfrey, that being Souldier; he should be culpable of so great prouidence, iustice, and moderation of spirit. It is reported of him, that although he was King; yet he clothed himselfe, and liued so simply, as the very meanest Souldier about him. So that vpon a certain day, diuers Lords of the Country being come vnto him, to present him with gifts, but (to speak truly) to espie and take knowledge of what they could: being brought before him, they found him sitting on a Sacke full of straw, & vpon the ground. After they had well observed it, being driuen to no meane admiration, they made enquiry; how so great a Prince, being a Lord of such matchlesse merit, hauing taken all the East, and seized on the very greatest kingdom, should be seated so poorly, without any pompe, no rich hangings, nor any Guard about him, to make him dreadfull to such as should come neere him. But he demanding what they had saide, replied thus: It is the best seate for a mortal man, and by good right the earth should suffer and serue to beare him for a time: in regard that (afterward) it must be the house for his body to dwell in. Which when the Lords had heard, admiring his answer, humility, and wisdom, they returned thence, saying: This is (indeede) such a man, as ought to rule over all these Regions: and to him (in equity of desert) it belongeth, to commaund ouer all other people whatsoeuer.

How long time the French
held the kingdome of Ie-rusalem.

I thus the kingdom of Ierusalem was held for the space of about fourescore & some yeares by the French, who (in the meane while) made warre vpon the Infidels, being succoured from time to time by the Kings of France: among whom, Lewis the tenth, called the young, and Philip Augustus went thither in person. But afterward, this kingdom was conquered by Saladine, first Souldan of Egypt: And then the French, vnder conduct of their Kings, ceased not alwayes to attempt voyages and expeditions, as shall be declared in place more conuenient. Here I forbear to speake of the great warres and goodly exploits in Armes, of the French against the Allemaignes, Hunnes, Danes, Normans, Saxons, Sarrazins, Gothes, Lombards, and English, which are to be discouered hereafter.

The apparant
singularity
of the French,
above all other Nations.

There is not any other people, that haue caused themselves more to bee spoken of, to spread their renowne so far, and enterprise matters more great, goodly, & difficult, then they haue done. Other Nations neuer could come neere them, nor the Spaniards, of whom Strabo yeeldeth refection, that they neuer did, or ever durst vnderake great occasions. They being (saith he) exercised and inured to slender exploits, & loue of base enterprises; as some light ambuscadoes, courtes, and brigandages or theeneries. But concerning the valour of the French, and the greatnesse of their courage; there remaineth very sufficient proofes in antiquity. Some haue attributed this quality to them; to be voyd of feare, and boldly to cast themselves into the midst of dangers. Strabo reporteth, that certaine Frenchmen being brought to Alexander the Great; when he demanded of them, what it was they most feared; made this answer: Nothing at all, except the Heauens should fall on our heads. Signifying by this manly reply, that feare had no power to freeze their blood, or v-surpe any place in their warlike soules.

In like manner, they neuer knew what it was to flye, or turne their backs in the most dangerous fights; neither to gile so much as the least inch of ground: as the Emperour Leo declared in his Art Military or Tacticks, and Chalcondilus the Grecian, in his Turkish History. Both of these Authors do affirme, that they hold this the heaviest sinne, which can happen to be committed by them. The selfsame is also toucht by Aelianus, who deliuereth these very words. Among all men, they that most affect dangers, and most valiantly expose their lines to perilles; I understand them to be the Gauls. The whole subiect of their Songs, is of such men of vertue; as died valiantly in foughten battels. Crowned they combate, and adorned with Markes & Trophies of their victories: as we'll to honor the worthy acts which they haue done, as to serue for memory to posterity, according to the manner of the Grecians. But above all flight is held so dishonest and shameful among them, that very many times, they will not get themselves gone, or make escape away from a tottering house, though it be ready to fall vpon their heads, or all on a flame, and themselves in immediate danger to be burned. This may seeme very strange; and rather blame worthy, then commendable: yet it is done in no other regard, but only to shew what their resolution hath alwaies bene, as shunning all occasions, whereby they might bee reputed timorous.

their courage abated. And when they wer shot through with darts and arrowes, so long as any respite of life remained, or the very last gaspe or breathing; they fought stil manfully, and made a massacre among their enemies: yea, there were many among them that snatched the Arrowes & Darts out of their own wounds, and shot them backe against the Greeks, or being neerer hand, slew them with the same Arrowes and Darts, even by meere stabs. Whereat the Greekes being amazed, to behold such wilfulnesse in fight, such courage, contempt of death, & prodigality of life; not knowing whereto they should attribute it, nor (to speake truly) what to say of it, (being wont to commend no men but themselves) they saide; This goes quite beyond the nature of men.

In the same case and respect, Aristotle, imagining that such strength and valiancy was without example, and above the capacity of any humane spirit: attributed this viciuete of soule, to a kinde of furious and naturall insensibility, not fearfull of any thing; neither earthquakes, nor the roughest stormes or tempests: Even like (saith hee) as it is reported of the Celts or Gaules. Warre was their true trade & exercise, there was not a man among them, that would excuse himselfe from marching to the field, without any distinction of ages. The olde man, wearied and spent as he was, went to it as cheerefully, as hee that farre greater force and vigor. A yong lad, euen in the first floure of his time, found therein no difficulty at all; he made offer of his youthfull members freely, to be hardened by colds, and inured to traualles, alwayes disposed and ready to support most difficult occasions, yea, and the very dreadfulest accidents of war.

In briefe, as it is confirmed by Marcelinus, a faithfull Author, a Souldier or mæfit for the warre, who hath liued any time among them; shall neuer be there mette withall, as among the Romanes: where there were some, that to shun the warres, would cut off some member of their owne, especially their thumbs; Whom we termed (saith he) in derision and mockery. Marci. To men of such base and feruile condition, as will thus cutt off a ioynt, to make themselves vncapable of being Souldiers, may bee referred that iniurious French disgrace, Polsron, a police trunco; A knue hath his thumbs cutt off.

This generosity and greatnesse of courage, is likewise familiar among the women of France, whereof we haue testimony in the same Author Ammianus Marcellinus, who writeth thus. If a man of Gaule enter into a quarrell, his wife being with him, there is not any troupe of strangers able to resist or stand against their strength. Especially, when the women are moued & enflamed with choller, stretching forth their brawny armes, gripping their strong knit hands together great and white as snow: so that both with feet & fists, they discharge blowes as liberally, as if they wer stones from slingz, or quarrels from Crossbowes. And as they are thus excelling in magnanimity, so are they as complete in other perfections: but chiefly in providence, discretion, and good aduice.

VVereade, that before the Gaules passed into Italy, a strong sedition happened to grow among them, which dispersed it selfe into a ciuill warre. But the women, euen as the two Armies were ready to meete each other; threw themselves into the midst betweene them, and questioning the reason of their difference, drew them to so great equity, and fulnesse of content on cyther side; that they began admirable and reciprocall loue and kindnesse among them, not onely betweene the Townes and Cities, but also in the houses neighbouring together. Whereupon, after that time, they continued all consultations of their affaires (as well concerning warre as peace) with theyr wiues, and pacified all quarrels and differences with their neighbors and kindred, onely by their meanes. And therefore, in the composition which they made with Hannibal, when he passed by the Gaules, they concluded (among other Articles) in this manner. That if it so came to passe that if the Gaules pretended any wrong to be done them by the Carthegenians; the Carthagenian Captaines and Gouernours (which were in Spaine) should be the Iudges thereof. Contrariwise, if the Carthagenians could alleadge, that the Gaules had offered them any injury; the women of Gaule should bee Iudges therein. And therefore Plutarke had great reason, to ranke those Ladies in number, among them reputed to be vertuous women.

and his noble
minded Lady, Tiphania.Behold what generous words of a woman can doe.

The Gaules euer called them to their counsels and consultations, as well for warre as peace, because they knew their naturall disposition to be such; as not a woman among them, would seeke any to soften and weaken (willingly) the boldest or most courageous enterprize her husband could vndertake. And this may be the cause, why the ancient Romane Souldiers would not be married: As now at this day, there are certaine kingdomes of the Indies, where the Noble-men will by no meanes admit marriage. But the Gaules knew well enough, that this sexe were so farre off, from any way hindring their Marttall designs; that they would by no meanes permit the very least inclination to negligence or cowardise; they rather serued as sharpe spurres to their vertue, to excite, encourage, and animate them more and more.

To this purpose, I may not omit a notable example, though not of the ancient Gaulish women; but of a French Lady, as yet recent and fresh in memory. Bertrand du Guesclin had benee alwayes a most valiant Knight, and one highly renowned in all Histories. After he had performed many worthie enterprizes, euer to his fame and honour: he married with a beautiful Lady, named Tiphania, descended of a noble family. After which marriage, he growing to leaue, and discontinue his former exercise of Armes; as he sate discourting with his Lady, she gently began to blame and reprove him, declaring, that (before their marriage) hee followed the warres, wherein hee had atchieued the cheefest reputation. And that it neyther suited with the nature, nor duty of a true Gentleman, to lose the least repute of honour wonne before, by ouer-much affecting a new made choise. As for mee (quoth shee) who ought to shine by the bright radiance of your fame, I shall account my selfe too low deiected, if you giue ouer a course so well begun, and lose your spirits in doating loue, werr it to one more worthy then my selfe.

These words did so neerely touch the Knight, that hee began againe to follow Armes, wherein he carried himselfe so valiantly, that they did well and worthily attribute it to him, to stand as a stout Rampier for France, in the very sharpest times of warre, and euermore made a meere

Barre of his body, against the hottest insuasions of the English. By vertue of his valour, King Charles the fifth, hauing reconquered most part of those territories, which had bene insuluted on in the reignes of the precedent Kings: alwayes helde head against that valiant Edward, turne the Blacke Prince, and Prince of Wales, and disappointed all his hopes. It was he that re-established Henry the 11. King of Castille, in his kingdom, in despite of all the Armies and English forces. Hee was also made Constable of France, by King Charles the fifth, who helde him in such endeared affection for his valour, that hauing bestowed great gifts on him in his life time; after his death, hee did him so much honour, as to let him be buried at S. Denis, at the feete of the same Toombe, which this King had prepared there for himselfe.

What couer is heere set downe, concerning this honourable Lady Tiphania, hath benee, and is as familiar to all the Ladies of France, who partake in the selfe-same affection; and couer rather to enflame, the freeze their husbands forwardnesse, in winning honour by Armes; and the like they are (in all respects) to their children. For whosoever will but aduisedly well consider, on the admirable generosity, and greatnesse of courage in the people of Gaule; they will make no meruaile at all, of those bolde words vied by the braue Souldier Vercingetorix. If I could (quoth hee) write together all the French: I should compose such an Army of men, as if the whole world did conspire, and bend all force against them, they were not able to withist and them. Take it as a vaunt or brauado who will. The very prooffe of their fights and conquests, made but by some part of their people, may yield sufficient testimony, that if the words spoken by Vercingetorix had bene put in execution; they would haue proued true, and the same effect must needs haue followed.

And to speake truly, if we conferre them with other Nations, we shall apparently perceiue, that the French haue gone beyond all in Military vertue. So many expeditions, and yet in so farre remote Countries, so many warres attempted, & fortunately finished; so many foughten battels; and so many actions of Generosity, sity, have made them sufficiently knowne to the world. The Greeks and the Romanes (albeit their sworn enemies) doe render but too true testimonies thereof: not speaking (in the like termes) of any other people whatsoever. But especially the Romanes, who neuer feared any Nation so much as they, whom they acknowledged to be fatal to their City, and the greatest thereof. So that when the Gauls of Italy, but particularly those on the higher side of the Alpes, made but a countenance of removing themselves; or designed any enterprise: they were immediately possessed with terror, and in a continuall apprehension, omitting no needfull provision of all things, even as if their City were to be besieged againe, or halfe surprized. Polybius faith. They verily persuaded themselves, that they should never become Masters of Italy; no, nor conferre their owne lands sufficiently; so long as they had the Gauls to be their neighbors.

They felt againe the force of the warlike Gauls in the second Punicke warre, when Hanniball went to encounter them in Italy. That great Capitaine passed then through Gauls, and made alliance with the Gauls, whose valor was well enough knowne unto him: and hee conducted them into Italy, where they did him great service against the Romanes. And notably doth Polybius remember them, when in that great day at Cannas, there were slain 4000. Gauls in the field on the Carthaginian side: That were (saith he) the principall instruments of the victory, wonne by their blood for the Carthaginians, which was the most deadly day for the Romanes, next to that of Allia, where the Gauls overcame as many. I forbear to speake of all the other encounters, batailles, and most signale warres, which this courageous Nation had against the Romanes, for the space of about two hundred yeares. It is easily discerned (even out of their owne reports) how many times the Gauls had the upper hand of them, and what dismal feares and amazements they haue put them to. Also, where they haue noted downe any conquering of the Gauls, it may be well observed, that it was compassed only by some stratagem, deceit or cunning, whereby (according to their own saying) they brought all their purposes to passe.

In a word, after that the Gauls of Italy were emptied of men (by continual wars) and brought into subiection, Polybius reporteth, That there was the end of the Gauls war, she like whereof was neuer heard or seen, be it for courage, boldnesse, and resolution in Soldiers; be it for greatness of fights; be it for numbers of slaine men, or multitudes of their troups. Further he proceeded on in the accidents of their wars, by way of giuing some encouragement to weaker mindes, against the dreadfull attempts of the Gauls: Who made seizure (saith he) on the Greeks, not only before, but also in my time. Of any other nation, he findeth none but the Grecians & the Romanes, that can deliuer any such true testimony of them: which rendreth faith sufficiently on their side, & (among all other people) they neuer could be followed. Albeit Cicero in his time, speaking of the Spaniards and the French (saith, That the Spaniards exceeded in number, but the Gauls or French in valiancy. Wherby is evidently seene, that in the comparison of these two Nations, he giueth the honour to the French, attributing to the other, nothing but number.

And yet me thinks it is strange to be credited, that the Spaniards should exceed the French in multitude of men, considering, that Spaine (as hath bin spoken herebefore) is described to be but badly inhabited, even by ancient Geographers, and them more moderne: whereas contrariwise, that France is so filled with men, and so greatly inhabited, as it is wonderful to behold. But it may bee, that the mighty numbers of the Gauls were not (as then) knowne, Gauls being not subiect to the Romanes, as Spaine was, which they held almost wholly. For whatsoever shall consider, what Armies the Gauls gathered from time to time, to make warre vpon the Romanes, according to the recital of Caesar himselfe, will iudge that Spaine, nor any other Province of Europe, could not be so fully furnished.

Moreover, it would not be much differing from our purpose, if wee should set downe, what troups of strangers the Romanes then kept at their pay: & namely, that they had more mercenary Soldiers out of Spaine, then euer they could get from France. Because those people being more barbarous, lesse ciuiliized, & polished with good carriage, gaue themselves selues to no other exercises, but to wander at randome among the Mountaines, there to pilfer and rob from one another, or else to serue as mercenaries, partly to the Carthaginians, and partly to the Romanes, after they had once got footing there. On the contrary, the Gauls (of whom no question was at any time made to be no warriors, excelling in valour and greatness of courage) in regard that they were much ciuiliized, neuer liued after so base a manner. And although they had such plenty of warlike people, yet wanted they no means of freeing themselves from ydenesse, when their grounds were to be tilled and husbanded, or other Arts and Trades vsed, necessary for the life of man, as well in times of greatest turbulence, as seasons of more security. For no where can it bee read of them, as it is of the Spaniards, that they left their Lands barren, because they would not till them, but referred them wholly to their wives to take that paines, who both before and after their times of childing, were feigne to toy toyle and moyle themselves.

Other of our Gauls employed themselves in the studie of Letters, and exercises of Religion, and contemplation in celestiall matters: witness so many skillfull Druides, and such beside as followed after them, renowned for their Learning through all the parts of the world. So that the Gauls dwelling beyond Gauls, serued but very slenderly to the Romanes, vntill such time as they had conquered Gauls: then they found the sufficiency of their assistance, and acknowledged not only their vertue and valiancy, but also their infinite number of warriors. And this was the reason, why Cicero, speaking afterward to Caesar, concerning his victories in Gaul, said: That hee had overcome Nations, innumerable in multitudes.

Now, to speake of all other Countries, there is hardly any one of them, but it hath bene as a prey to strangers. Italy, sometime the Conquerresse of many people, with her Rome, calling her selfe, cheefe Lady of the world: was free not (for long time) exposed to the rauages, irruptions and pillages of the Vuisigothes, Herules, Gepides, Ostrogotes, and Lombards: who intirely sacked and rent her in peeces (each after other) and droue the people out of their dwellings? Spaine became inuaded in the same manner, and afterward was cantoned by the Vandales, Alanes, and Swenes: yet were they also expelled (in following time) by the Vuisigothes, who established their owne abiding there. Next to them, came the Ostrogotes, who held the Country powerfully to long, till the Sarrazins overcoming them, were vntirpally possessed of well neere all Spaine. Allemagne, or Germany, was not it likewise made subiect to the inuasions of those people which dwelt more Northerly, who at length ouerthrew the whole Romane Empire? I say nothing of some other quarters of the world, where the like fortune hath many times happened: yet this is most certaine, that thorough all the Provinces of the earth, there haue bene changes of people, and of frequent Colonies.

But to speake more particularly of Spaine, at the first it was filled with people of the French Nation, as along the Riuer * Anus or Ana, now called Gaudiens in Castille, so farre as the Promontory Arctabrum, or Cabo de finis terra, in Gallicia in Portugall. Also the Celiberians in Castille, by the testimony of Strabo, Ptolomie, Pomponius Mela, Pliny and Appian. From whence it ensueth, that some ancient Geographers, as Ephorus and others, haue comprized them vnder France. But be it howe soeuer, Spaine hath continually bene taken, held and commanded by strangers: as by the Ionians, Lydians, Thracians, Rhodiens, Phrygians, Cypriots, Phoenicians, Egyptians, Phoenices, and Carthaginians, according as their owne Historians haue acknowledged. Since then, by the Vandales, Alanes, and Swenes, that inhabited there for a long time: and afterward by the Vuisigothes and Ostrogotes. At last, wholly filled with Moors and Sarrazins, who held it in possession about seuen hundred yeares. And there they remaine yet to this day (according to some Writers) in the Mountaines of Andalusia, called Alpuexarrus, whether the Armies of Conquerours could neuer come or reach.

Heereby may bee gathered, that they are a mingled people, and composed of so many seuerall Nations, as haue dwelt there in the countries from time to time. As their very language it selfe (euen the best polished and most frequent) sufficiently ently sheweth, consisteth (for the most part) of the Gothish and Arabick. It would aske an infinite and wearisome labour, to make search for all the mutations that haue ther happened. But France is a Country, which hath least bene that way ill entreated: as hauing kept herselfe more pure, entire, and neate from rauage, and incursions of so great numbers of strangers.

* Timagenes, an ancient Greeke Author that flourished in the time of Augustus, cited by Ammianus Marcellinus, saith; That according to the opinion of his Nation, the Gauls were Autochthones, that is to say, Originaries, and borne in and of the selfsame Country. Declaring thereby, that they were not come or deriued of any strangers Colonies: like the Athenians also attributed to bee a matter of great honour. I know well, how it may be objected to me, that Marfeilles was builded, and inhabited by the Phoenices; yet there was none other but that only Colonie, beside that which is reported of the children of valiant Hercules, which he had by the women of France, and who there commanded for sometime, as is testified by ancient Monuments and Antiquities of the Gauls, which Ammianus Marcellinus saith, that he himselfe had seene in Gaul.

As concerning the Britannijs or Bretons, who being expelled out of England by the English Saxons: they withdrew then selues into Bretaigne, the called Armorica. I hold, agreeing with the iudgement of many learned men, that they being ancient Pillars of the French, parting from the firme land of the Gauls, to dwell in the Isle which was before it: coming backe afterward, to refuge themselves in France; did but re-establish their owne ancient Country, and returne to their true originall. Naturall reason, for the neighbourhood both of the one and other, doth apparently shew it selfe. The same is confirmed by Cornelius Tacitus, & by the common opinion that then was, as also by the similitude and likenes, both in faces and manners of the inhabitants. And beside, there is to be seene in the Geographicall description of that Island (according to Plolomy) the names of many Gaulish people, who vndoubtedly had planted Colonies there. Such were the Belgians, the Parisians, the Atrebatiens, &c the Cornubians.

As for the French, they were no strangers, they entred among the Gauls, not as enemies, but as friends and brethren to the Gauls: to deliuer them from the tyranny of the Romans and Goths, who had expelled them, and were (in that manner) restored to their former freedome, and so the Gauls and French became but one people, as shall hereafter more plainly be declared.

The Goths, hauing so long time kept their reuels in Spaine; to speake truly, came also among the Gauls, but yet for a very short while: nor was there any English or remarkable valor in these Goths, making comparison of them with the French. It is said, that their property was to be fearefull, and soone put to flight: so reporteth S. Gregory Florentinus, Archbishop of Tours, who liued somewhat neere to those times. And Salustianus that eloquent Priest of Marfeilles, acknowledged the Goths to be the most feeble and slothfull, among the generous Nations of the North parts. When they were in Gaul, and stood to encounter with the French: they durst not tarry, or make any head against them. The Kings Mercureus, Chloris, and Cindibert, beheld them to passe ouer the Pyrenean Mountains, yet they assailed and ouercame them in battaile, euen in Spaine, hard by Toledo, their capitall abiding. The Burgundians and Germanes, who had invaded some small parcels of France, were soone cut off, and quite extermined.

So the French and Gauls, conferred themselves within their own limits, without hauing any strangers mingled among them. And as (in former times) they filled the world with their Colonies or troops of people, so did they continually the like afterward: hauing againe peopled Germany and Italy, vnder the Emperour Charles the Great, and his successors. So that it is not without good reason, that (at this instant) the very greatest houses of Germany, deriue their originall from the French: as is declared by Hermanus, Count of Near, in an Epistle which he sent to the Emperour Charles the 5. on the the Annales of Peppin and Charlemagne.

True it is, that the Gauls haue bene overtaken by the Romans: but what people knew how to resist them; considering their their admirable order, and exact Military discipline? Iosephus, very fitly to this purpose, attributeth thereto all their great conquests and large extendure of the Romane Empire. So that after he hath demonstrated the forme of their Campe, their ordinary exercises for Armes, and a sumonary obseruation of all their behaviour, he concludeth. *All these being well considered, wee neede make no doubt to say; that the possessions was much lesse then the possessors. Adding withall, that hee extended so farre in declaring all this, not as any commendation to the Romans power, but rather as a comfort to the conquered.*

Moreover, of the Western Prouinces, France was the last conquered by them, whatsoever is els said to the contrary. Whereas (on the other side) Spaine came among the first into their hands, in the time of the wars against the Carthaginians. France was that Country, that longest of all resisted, and against which (to speake no more then truth) their invincible Armies, yea, they that were victorious throughout the whole world; became merely edgelesse and blunted, as not able to beare off their blowes. All other Romane Captains vtterly lost their labour, Cesar only excepted. Which is no meane honor to the Gauls, to yeeld themselves vnder the yoke of so great a Prince: who is acknowledged to be the most wise and perfect Captaine that euer was. And yet for all that, France was not conquered at the first onset, neither made surrender of her spoyle, without sweate and blood. That great Commander in warre, tooke intollerable paines, and travelled for the space of ten yeares continually, with all the power and strength of the Romans, which then held the more part of the wide world. And yet (euen then) he had not prevailed neither, if hee had not serued his turne with Frenchmen themselves, & made a conquest of France, by France. Diuisions and partialities, which were then on foot among them (an ordinary and fatall ruine to the most potent kingdomes) called him thither, wher finding all to be diuided in diuers factions, ciuill warre kindled among them, allied with many, and fortified with their troops, as namely them of Arthun and others; it was so much the more easier to be surprized by him, and in such an opportunity of aduantage.

All which notwithstanding, it is an admirable matter, and well worth the obseruation, that in the resistance made against him, by people so disioyned & perplexed: yet in ten whole yeares, the Gauls fought thirty ranged batailles, wherein, according to the account made by Appian, there were slain well neere eleuen hundred thousand able fighting men. And beside, himselfe testified in his Memories sufficiently, with what manner of people they had to deal: & they likewise could no way performe, without receiuing great losses, as there he seareth not to confesse.

If wee had but his Ephemerides, or particular Iournall booke, we should see other matters of his owne confession; considering that Ammianus Marcellinus, speaking of the conquest of the Gauls, saith: He pacified them after many great losses on either side sustained in ten years war. And as touching his owne person, it is recorded, that in a certain encounter, he was releued, (notwithstanding all his Greatnesse and goodly Armour) by a Gaule, who hauing remounted him vpon his owne horse, bare him away through all the throngs. But there came another Gaule, who brauely cryed to his companion, Cesar, Cesar in the ancient Gaulish language which is as much to say, as Let Cesar passe, & this was the reason of his safe passage. Wherein they worthily declared, that it was honour enough to their generous mindes, to carry Cesar safely away from danger, when they had him in their power, and could haue slaine him, Satis est prostrasse. The Grammarian Seruius citeth this example out of the Ephemerides or Iournals of Cesar, which wee cannot come by in these dayes. In like manner, Cesar knowing them wel, and hauing (on the other side) experimented the dulnes of the Easterne people, in the war which he had against Pharnaces, King of Pontus, saide. Most happy was Pompey that he had nothing to do with the resolute French, but with the faint-hearted men of the East, for got the surname of Great at so cheape a Market. In briebe, the Gauls were neuer ioyned to the Romane Empire, by any power in the Romans, but thorough their owne proper forces: as a great Captaine speaketh in Tacitus. Verè reputantibus Galliam suismet viribus concessisse.

Josephus lib. 4. de bel. Iud.

And as King Agrippa declareth in Josephus. It was not through want of courage, or any dull neglect, that they were overcome: considering the Romanes themselves said, it was four score years, before they could fasten hold in one small Atracental or South-erly Province of Gaule, & afterward fought so much against Caesar: But rather it was by the frugal managing of their own felicity, wherein they pacified both destiny and fortune: whereby they plainly saw that the Romanes got the upper hand rather by force than otherwise, and (in a word) by the divine permission or providence. Nay, and that which is much more, after so long warre, against such power, and so great a Captaine, yea, and after so many losses: yet notwithstanding, Gaule fell not into the Romans hands, as being subiect, but rather as allied, and in farre better fashion then all the other Prouinces.

Gaule not so much conquered, as lovingly leagued.

De bello Gallico. lib. 8. in fi.

He that continued Caesars Commentaries, saith: That while hee wintered in Belgia, he had a carefull eye, onely to maintain the people in amity without giving to any one either will or occasion, to rise or take themselves to Armes. For that which hee most of all desired, was, that vpon his departing, there might happen no occasions to flay him: or if hee had cause to bring an Army thither againe, yet that he should not bee troubled with any long warre, whereunto Gaule gaue listening with very good attention, when hee saw her selfe out of apparant danger. Vv herfore, causing the Citties to come before him, with his best respect, and greatest honour he embraced them, and gaue very goodly gifts to the principall and most apparant persons: not imposing on the rest any charges, or extraordinary subsidies, whereby he contained them in peace, and the better disposition to obedience throughout all Gaule. And so by this cunning, Gaule (at last) gaue place, and became mildely quieted. For the affability of Caesar, and the courtesies he extended towards them, did more conquer them in one winter, then all his Forces, Legions and Armies could doe in ten years.

One winters kindeesse in Caesar wonne more then all his Legions could doe in ten years warre.

ouer and beside, the titles of Alliances, of Peace, and of friendly conference, are so frequent in the Romane Authors, euer where they speake of Gaule; that it plainly testifieth on her behalfe, that shee was not conquered by Armes, but rather left a louely liberty, by friendly parlanes and confederations. Which Ammianus Marcellinus himselfe also confirmeth, for he saith, that Caesar; after many losses on the one side & other sustained, during a warre of ten years continuance: in the ende (by external pactions and agreements) ioynd the Gaules to the Romane society and alliance. We see also, that they left some people in Gaule wholly free, as (among other) the men of Aunergne, who termed themselves as Noble as the Romans, and called them their brethren; the men of Aethion, the Marsellians; them of Tionnois, Foresis, and the round neighbouring Countries.

Now as concerning Subsidies & Contributions, a Romane Gouverneur, named Cerialis, sheweth plainly in Tacitus: That such tribute was but for maintenance of the Legions, and for preruation of peace in the Prouinces; which could not bee continued without Armes nor Armes without wealth. As for the rest (saith hee, speaking to the Gaules) all is in common with vs, oftentimes you gaue command to our legions, your selues also gouerne in the Prouinces, as others do in our Empire. By the selfe-same reason, that which bound them most to duty, was the entire amity of the Romanes to them. Caesar made a great number of their Citizens Romanes, and Angustus in like manner, though in more sparing fashion, with some restriction fro vulgarizing to great an honour of the City or Bourgeship of the Romanes. Afterward, the Emperour Claudius gaue the right of Senators to the principall of the Gaulish Lords. And in the ende, Galba, for the signale seruices which the Gaules had done to him and the Romane Empire against Nero: hee made them all Citizens, without exception.

The like was neuer done in, or for Spain, where there were but some Colonies: had the same right, and no more then to any other Prouince of the Empire: who obtained that priuiledge, but by generall Edit of the Emperour Antoninus Caracalla. Nor was it without great reason, that they made such great account of this Prouince: considering, what great advantages it gaue vnto them. For, were it in respect of treasure, rich Gaule furnished them with more reuenues; then (by vsing the common manner of (saying) all the rest of their Empire, as it is recorded by Pelagius Paterculus. Were it for leuying vndaunted Souldiers, and for such as they mustered from thence: it consisted the maine strength of all their troops. And that Caesar knew well enough, and published it sufficiently abroad, as hauing made choise of them above all other, and (by their means only) came to possesse the Empire of the whole world. For ouer and beside what hath formerly beene said, concerning the wealthy treasures of France: the valiancy of the Gaules holdeth the most eminent place, by whose courage he was especially and principally serued, to gaine that greatnesse, whereunto hee had so long time aspired.

The victory which hee wonne against great Pompey, ought to bee attributed to the valour & warlike vertue of the Gaules. And if he had not bin furnished with such men, valiant and strong, not onely against the enemy, but also to endure famine, and all other kinds of necessities euen to the feeding on bread made of grasse & roots; he had bin lost in his hopes, and vtterly defeated by the long & lingering delais of his enemy. This was that which most of all amazed Pompey, who gaue expresse charge, that such dread should not bee scene in his Camp; for feare of disheartening his Souldiers, or driving them into dereliction of their paines, wher they considered, the sharpe extremities suffered by their enemies, with whom they dealt so cruelly, that they left them nothing to feed on, but euen as brutish beasts.

Moreover, Caesar hauing sent a small number of Gaules, for great succour to M. Crassus against the Parthians; these were the men, who (in that most vnhappy day for the Romans) performed most strange exploits of Armes, and shook the enemies victory very sharply. These were the men in whom young Crassus reposed most confidence, as being the warriors, with whom he performed admirable actions of prowesse. For they received (with their bare hands) the sharpe points of the Parthians Pikes, and closing with them body to body, threw them to the ground, among their horses feetes; where they lay all along stretched out, vnable to releue themselves, onely through the massy weight of their Armor. Many ther were beside, who forsaking their owne horses, crept vnder the bellies of the belonging to their enemies, to pierce & stab them with the points of their Swords: which causing the horses to bound aloft, by extremity of the anguish they felt, trampled vnder their feete both their masters & enemies together, and so fell dead without any rescue.

The same Caesar, prepared a complete Legion of Gaulish Souldiers, which hee called the Larke, and added it to the Romane Legions, and whereto (at length) he gaue the honour of Bourgeship. Nay, and that is much more, hee not knowing how he might worthily enough recompence the Gaules: made a great number of their Senators, to the great discontenting of many Romanes. And as for the Caualtery or horsemen, wherein the Gaules euermore excelled all other Nations in warre: Caesar had (almost) none other, but continually ready at this seruice ten thousand Gaulish horse, according as it is declared by Appian. These were the French horse, that afforded so many great seruices to Caesar; as well in Spaine against Affricus & Petereus, Lieutenants to Pompey; as afterward in Affrica. Vvher it is said, that in one fight, lesse then thirty Gaules in number, fought against two thousand Mauritanians, and droue them to flight.

Nere to Munda in Spaine, Caesar fought against the sonnes of Pompey, where all had bin vtterly lost for him, hee knew not any means for helpe or redresse: till the Gaulish horsemen reconferred all, and was the cause, that the day (being before reputed for desperate) came solie to Caesar. His successors found themselves alwayes well serued, both with ordinary horse and foote of the Gaules. Tacitus maketh mention of a Cohort or Regiment of the Sicambrians, which did many remarkable deeds, in the warre against the Thracian Mountaineers: Who were (saith he) prompt and hardy against dangers, and no lesse dreadful for their Armes and order of marching in battaile array. This I do the more willingly set downe, because of those Gaulish Sicambrian Nation, the French are properly descended.

France alwayes fit them with men for the warres. The same Author faith in another place, that vnder the Emperors Aracadius & Honorius, about the time of the insurrection and reuolt of Gildas, a great Army, composed (for the most part) of Gauls, was brought to succour Greece, then rauaged and spoiled by the Goths; and they performed there such deeds of valour, as holpe the Country to recouer her right. So that being (for long time) wel entreated by the Romans, partaking in the honours and administration of the Empire: it was no matter of maruaile, that their peace should be of so long continuance. One onely thing also was like- sum & burdenous to the, in regard where- of, they troubled the Romane Empire with some stirres and perturbations, the Gauls being naturally addicted to vertue and severity. And therefore they hated to be commanded by such Emperors as were negligent, dissolute, and quite giuen ouer to all vices: which made them despite subiection to such as was Tiberius, Nero, Domitian, Commodus, Helioabius, Galen, and other such like monsters of their names. They would endure none but vertuous Princes, and such Governours were the fittest men to confirme and keepe them continually in peace.

Heereupon was it, that the Emperour Valerian, in a Letter of his said; That hee had made a certaine man, named Polthimius, Governor of Gaule. A man (saith he) well worthy of the Gauls severity. A word sufficient to reiect the obiection of leuitie, wherewith some would haue reproched them. Another Author, writing the life of the Emperour Carus, confesseth: That to command the Gauls, there needed an Emperour very constant and vertuous. So that being vnable to suffer the detestable vices of many Romane Emperors, they departed (at euery occasion) in this respect from their obedience: whereby it may be iustly said, that they continued alwayes free, and being not truly subiected, gaue their seruice to no other Emperors, but such as themselves repured worthy. Vntill such time, as vpon the declination and fall of this great Empire, by the insatiable auarice of Romane Governours, and other insupportable charges: they altogether fell off from them, and gaue ayde to their compatriots the French, and so wholly did roote out the Romanes name.

But to examine a point (heeretofore handled) somewhat more particularly, it cannot bee faide with any reason, that France was conquered by the Romanes before Spaine: neither that the Spaniards made any more resistance, or continued longer time from subduing or subiection. For on the contrary, it appeareth, that the Carthagenians possessed themselves (in few yeares) of a great part of Spaine: euen at such time as the Romans fell likewise on it, and carried away their share without any difficulty. Vntill the treaty of peace, made betwene the Romans & Hadruball, chiefe Captaine for the Carthagenians, wherein it was cōtenuanted, that the Riuer Iberus, now called Ebro, should bee the bound of the Empire for these two people, and that the Saguntines, free people originally of Greece, who were betwene them both, should confederate with the one and other.

After this, it is sufficiently knowne, that the Romanes had long time made warre against the Carthagenians in Spain, who gaue them there many valiant fights. During which while, no estate, or fewe, made mention off among the Spaniards; who stood but as spectators, in expectation of the yssue, to see which of those two people should haue command ouer them. This was at the beginning of the second Punicke warre, when the Scipios (after they had spent eight yeares in war) were slaine by the Carthagenians. And afterward, Great Scipio, turnamed Africanus, being sent thither, after diuers encounters, and taking Townes from the Carthagenians: expelled them wholly thence, & first of all made it a Romane Prouince, in the yeare of the Citie of Romes foundation CCCCXLI. All the busines which he had with the Spaniards, was for some reuolts of particular people, whom he likewise as soone suppressed. So that very truly Amianus Marcellinus hath saide: That all the Prouinces of firme Land in Spaine, were the first conquered by one Prouince by the Romanes.

All Historians agree together, reporting also, that in the yeare CCCCCLII, two Pretors were created at Rome to gouerne Spaine, which was then diuided in two parts, and termed Citerior & Pterior, so wit, on this side, and beyond Ebro.

ra. The elder Cato was also sent thither, to quell the reuolts of some people. When he had ouercome them, & made prouision, that no more rebellions might afterward happen: he sent his Letters & command to euery City in particular, to this effect, that they should cast down to the ground their wals and fortifications, & disposed the action so orderly, that his command was obeyed in the Cities, and he arriued ther at the same time. So they being verily perswaded in each City, that this command stretched but to that place onely: yielded the more willingly, which otherwise they would not haue done. Whereupon ensued, that in one day, all their Townes were dismantled, and their wals raced. In regard of which successe, Cato made his vaunt; That hee had taken more Townes in Spaine, then there were daies.

Now, as concerning Gaul, the Romanes neuer had footing there, but in the yeare IVCXXII. & in Provence only: about an hundred yeares after that Spaine was wholly conquered. Nor had they there but a very small parcel, which was a nere neighbor to them: all Gaule being neuer made a Prouince, but by Cesar. By what likelihood of truth can it be said, that Spaine was brought vnder the power of the Romane Empire, after France? Neuerthelesse it is very true (as Strabo saith) that the difficulties which the Romanes had in Spaine, to make it peaceable, grew onely through the reuolts of some particular Townes & people, and by the incursions of the heues gathered together in troopes, and these (of necessity) were to be chastised. So, making war, not in grosse, or with a body of iust Armes, but by peeces and parcels, one after another, in small courtes and surprizals: the Romanes had more trouble to finde out, then conquer them. Againe, although Spaine was held & commanded wholly by the Romanes, yet notwithstanding, there remained some people, dwelling in difficult, sharpe & mountainous places, as * Baques, & * Astures: who afterward, in the time of Augustus, were wholly vanquished, and added to the rest of Spaine. As also (about the same time hauing conquered Aquitaine) he made it a Prouince, as the three other of Gaul.

Moreover, there cannot bee found so great a number of worthy Captaines, af-

foorded by any country, like vnto France. As were among the ancient hellonians and Sigonsians, chiefe of the first & furthest off expeditions among the Gauls: Brennus, that surprized Rome, and another Brennus, who afterward subdued the most part of Europe and Asia. Dumoris, Diniconis, Ambiorix, Dumnatus, Vercingetorix, Diditacus, and many more recorded by Cesar. And to set Kings aside, who can recount all the Dukes, Earls, Barons, Lords & Gentlemen, that haue excelled in the Art of wars. They are not to be numbered, such as haue bene in later times, as Godfrey of Bullen, king of Ierusalem: besides many Princes and Lords, as went in the expeditions to the holy Land, the wars of Spaine and Africa, against the Turkes, Moors, and Sarrazins at sundry times. The Marshall Bouciquant, in the dayes of king Charles the first, as also Iohn de Saintré, knight; Bertrand du Guesclin, Constable of France; Enguerrand, Lord of Coucy; the Conte de Dunois, chiefe of the famous house of Longueville, the right hand and maine helpe to King Charles the 7. for expulsion of the bolde English. La Fiere, Potbon de Saint-rales, Tannequy du Chiffell: Gaston de Foix, Duke of Nemours, one of the Ancestors to great K. Henry, hee, that after he had conquered a great part of Italy, bare away the renowned victory of Ravenna, trampling (vnder his feete) all the forces of Spaine and Italy coniuied against him. Odet de Foix, Lord of Autrec; the Captain Bayard; the Lord of Chamont; Louis de la Trimouilles; Guillaume and Martin du Bellay; Charles de Bourbon, Constable of France; Frances de Bourbon, Duke of Anguyen; Charles and Timoleon de Colfe, of the house of Brillac, and an infinite number more, most honourably remembered by the best Historians.

What shall we say of our Kings Merenne, Chlovis, Childbert, Chlothaire, Charles Martell, Pepin, Charles the Great, Hugh Capet, Louis le Gros, Phillip Augustus, S. Loays, Phillip the third, Phillip le Bell, Charles the first, turnamed the wise, Leues the twelfth, Frances the first, and the valiant Henry the fourth, father to the King now reigning?

ing grosse corpulency: so that they condemned (in very great fines) all such yong men, whose bellies exceeded the ordinary measure of their girdles, according to the auouching of Strabo. Moreover, the French haue bene reputed to surpass all other Nations, in these two noble and warlike exercises, hunting, and ryding great horses. Hunting, which is nothing else
but a lively image of warre, and an assidue meditation thereof, as Xenophon saith. Eginhard, the nursing-child of Charles the Great, and his Secretary, writing his life,

*But before I can finish this discou-

French. I cannot forbear to say somewhere a man may well say, that a small followeth in this manner.*

with the king of Hungaries army, hauing

(in assault) the honor of diuers Townes:
and at length came to lay siege before
the City of Nicopolis.*

*VWhile the greater part of the Army besieged the City, Enguerrand Lord of Concy, taking with him five hundred Lances: made vp into the Countrey, to seek some enemies that they might fight withall, and it is credibly reported, that (verie nere vnto them) there was a troop of Turkes, of about twenty thousand in number. Now, albeit this multitude exceeded their finall companie beyond all measure: yet notwithstanding, they resolved to grapple with them. And hauing
first of all drawne them beyond a wood, wherein there was an ambuscado; they came and charged them in the rere. The fight was (for all that) cruell, and of long continuance, wherein the French, although they were so few against so great a number; yet they did performe wonders that day. So that in the end, the Turkes being disheartned, faintned extraordinarily, & more then fifteen thousand lay slaine in the field.*

*Some short while after, Baiazeth being come with a dreadfull Armie, consisting of more then three hundred thousand fighting men: they advanced themselves to deale with the enemies armie,
being not worthy to be termed any number, because they were (in all) but seauen hundred, when they beganne the fight.
The French small troops, made a goodly fight to behold, being all well armed and appointed, in rich glittering and gorgeous Armors, wanting no coit of golde
and siluer, and brauely mounted on gallant horses, most sumptuously barbed & caparioned; so that such as saw them,
might well haue termed them an Armie
of Kings. But (beyond all the rest) vvith what force, ardour and courage they fought, although they were meerey shut vp, and round railed or ringed in vvith innumerable enemies. At the first only, they wholly defeated and ouerthrew the auangard and first battell of the Turke, bearing them on stil before them, euen to*

the verie midst of the bodie of the maine
army, where was Baiazeth himselfe.

*Many there were, who pertourning
meere miracles of manhood in fight, cleit or hewed out their passage thorow the prease, and very thickest of all the Turkish Army, compelling them to make them-way, both for going on and returning backe again, euen to two or three severall times of enforcement. And yet no one man among that poore small troop, who seeing the vnauoydable danger of death,
was desirous to take hold on any aduan-tage, or shew so much as a countenance of retiring, albeit their enemies (gladly) offered them many meanes. All resolved to loose their liues, but yet the enemy bought them at very deere rate, filling the field vvith mountaines made of their dead bodies: euen till such time as the fight hauing held a great deall of the day,
the most part of the French lying dead
on the ground, and the rest (a very small number) wearied vvith killing the Turkes, and pierced through vvith wounds being ouervvhelmed vvith multitudes, were (in the end) taken prisoners. But it was generally held for truth, that if the great body of the Hungarian army (being wellneere the number of an hundred thousand able men) had seconded them, or vied nee-uer so little resistance, in making; but a shew of vvithstanding the enemy, to hinder the French from being so enclosed; (by any forwardnesse in redeeming them,
and not fearefully fly away on heaps thro-rough the valley, as the Hungarians most cowardly did, suffering themselves to be murthed, vvithout any offer of fight) the day had remained to the Christians. And I dare speake it, that the power of the Turkes, which afterwards so great enlarged it selfe (meerey throw our diuifions) had then bin vterly ruined from the top to the bottome.*

*Then you plainly perceiue, that of this small troope of resolute Champions,
the greater part of them lay dead in the field, hauing made a slaughter of infinite enemies, more by fifty times then they were, and fought to their latest drop of bloode; but verie few of them remained prisoners. But on the next day, Baiazeth

of battell, and take acknowledgement of the dead, when he found that for one

Balaizeth had but little joy in his deare victory, desiring to deale no more with the French.

Frenchman flaine, whole heapes and piles of Turkes filled vp the field, and all his Army left in such pittifull condition, he took it so desperately, and entered into such outrageous choller, as beeing vnable to confider on his losse, or take any means for contentment, hee commanded a passage vnto death thorough the army, of all the prisoners, except about some twentie of the greatest Lords: as the Conte de Nevers the Generall, and others; who being knowne, were saued and put to their ranfomes. Balaizeth complaining on so fadde a victory, which cost him so deare, could not depart thence but very pensively; and in plain truth, such another overthrow would absolutely haue confounded him altogether.

This may seeme sufficient for the valiancie of the French. But som may obiekt, that such warlike people, accustomed to liue among Armes and Martiall exercises, should bee voluntary disdainers of matters appertaining to Iustice, acknowledging no other right then that of Armes. Forbear (said Pompey) till to morrow, to alledge your Lawes to vs, who haue our swords by our sides. This is quite contrary to the French, who are no way to be lesse commended for their iustice then for their valor and excellency in actions of armes, and haue euermore bene accounted to be true louers of Iustice. Agathias a Grecian authour, who liued more then a thousand yeares since, hath prayed and commended the French for their Iustice. Whereof (saith hee) they are verie desirous, as also great louers of their Country. He further addeth, That because they possesse a most assured estate, they haue (as their victory and support) many goodly principles engrauen in the hearts of their Kings and People. Why then let mee vndoubtedly tell yee, that among all other Nations, the Gauls & the French haue most highly cherished and loued Iustice, and haue alwayes religiouslie honoured it, yielding themselves thereto, and making continuall exercise thereof, without any passion.

And not to make repetition of an infinit number of goodly institutions, and diuers examples of their Iustice, it may well appear by this notable custome, which both Greeke and other ancient authours haue obserued among them. To wit, that if any one haue slaine a Citizen or Bourgeois, he hath no other infliction but banishment; whereas, if hee commit the like offence on the person of a stranger, he is punished with death: for the paine is augmented in consideration of the stranger, to whom the more easily the injury may be offered, so much the more (they hold) that the offence which he hath done, ought to be feverently punished and reuenged. It may be thought somewhat hard, that a stranger should be fauoured and defended, more then a Citizen. To cut off which difficulty, we see by the diuine law, ordained on the strangers behalfe, that he is so oftentimes repeated and defended, that a man must very carefully keepe himselfe from harming him, and that iustice must be rendered him equal with a Citizen. And questionles it may be truly said, that (euen at this day) there is not any country in the world, where a stranger is more humanely entertained, lesse offended, and more defended in all right of iustice, then among the people of France.

In like manner, we finde by probable histories, that (very often times) Princes and straunge people haue referred their differences to the iustice of France, as well of the Kings, as of the Parliaments. Among other, the reputation of their Iustice in King Dagobert, was spread so farre into strange Nations, that the Hungarians, the Sclauonians, and other people neighboring about, desired him to be Iudge in their differences. And more, the Sclauonians said, that if ever he came into their country, they would acknowledge & obey him, as if he were their King.

Furthermore; let it neuer be said or imagined, barbarism at any time had entertainment among the Gauls. Continually they were most human, hauing milde and well polished spirits by nature, & being aduantageously shaped or fashioned for the study of all arts & Sciences: especially they studied eloquence in such sort, that the elder Cato in his originals cited by Christus, hath rendered this testimony of them. That they were quick conceited & industrious principally in two things; in the Art military, & in well speaking. The proof hereof appeared in that Hercules of Gauls, so much renowned by our forfathers, figured in such fashion, that from his mouth hung dangling downe at his tongue, manie small chaines of fine gold, wherewith he tied & bound the people by the eares, leading them whether so euer he pleased, & with their their owne good wills, free from all constraint. Declaring by this figure, what precious account they made of well speaking, and what power wordes had: no lesse (but rather greater) then that of Armes, to subdue people, & cause them become obedient willingly.

Vnder the Romane Emperors, there was a combate of eloquence in the City of Lyons, fought in Greeke and Latine; wherein, such as were vanquished, gaue the prizes to their victors, and were constrained (besides) to write in their commendation. And as for such as performed no matter worth the esteeming, they were bound (by necessity) to wipe out what they had done with a Spunge, or with their owne tongues; except they better affected, to be either beaten with rods, or throwne headlong into the River. Wherto may be referred that which Iuuenal saith.

Pallast ut nudis prestat qui calicibus anguem, Aus Lugdunensem Rhetor dicturus ad arā.

And the same Author makes mention also, concerning the Eloquence of the Gauls, which they instructed vnto other people.

Gallia caudicibus, docuit sacunda Britannos.

I am enforced to extend my selfe somewhat further in this discourse, by making report of a few more testimonies; to overthrow the false conceited opinion of those, who haue esteemed, that the people of France (in their first times) were not addicted to Sciences, erudition, nor the study of Letters, wherein they are very greatly deceived. For on the contrary, it is plaine to be proued, that (as in all other things) so therein also they haue most singularly excelled, and taught the same to the Romans. He that first instructed the Art of eloquence or well speaking in Rome, was one Lucius Plotius, a Gaul borne; vnder whom Cicero (beeing then but young) was some yeares with his Brother Quintus also. And about the same time, or not long after, another Gaul was highly renowned in Rome, named M. Antonius Gnipho, beeing endued with a mighty spirit of singular memory, and infinitely skilfull and eloquent, as well in Greeke as in Latine, and verie liberal (wherefoeuer he came) to teach what he knew. So that for these goodly and commendable qualities, hee bare such sway in those times, as his house was much frequented by the very greatest Romaine Lords.

It cannot be denied also, but that the great Oratour Cicero went often thither when he was Prætor. But that which (aboue all other) may make him most Famous, was, in being Teacher to the great Dictator Cæsar himself. Surely, not without some especial providence therein, to the end, that this Prince might hold wholly from Gaule (not onely the encreasing and establishing of his Greameffe) but also this honor, wherein (not a jot lesse) hee excelled, then in actions of armes. Gaule hath euer since kept her selfe in this reputation. Quintilian, who was a Spaniard, made great reckoning of the eloquence which was taught in Gaule, and about the declination of the Roman Empire, Symmachus Gouernour of Rome at that time, in one of his Epistles, sayeth; That if he would performe any worke worthy of memory, he must go of necessity, and dreine it out of the Gaulish knowledge and elegance. The same man also acknowledged, That whatsoeuer was in him, either of eloquent or polished speaking, ought the due thereof to the aire of France, where hee had learned them. And in another place hee saith, That Mount Helicon, sacred vnto the Muses, was transported from her owne place, into France.

Saint Hierome writing to a certayne Father, who was very carefull for the institution of his sonne in well speaking, saith; Post studia Galliarum que vellestissima sunt, misit Roman non parces sumptibus, ut vbertatem Gallici nitoremq; sermonis grauius Romanis conduceret. After (saith he) he hath performed his studies among the Gauls, where they are most flourishing; for sending him vnto Rome, make no spare of expences, to the end, that the abundance, delicacy, and luster of the Gaulish language may be seasoned with the Roman gravity. The same author sayeth in another place, That France is fertile in Orators. In another place also he saith: That shee hath alwayes abounded in most eloquent men. As illustrating vnder that title, Quintus Montanus in the time of Augustus, afterward relega-

Then Gabinianus, M. Aper, Julius Florus, Julius Secundus, verie famous Oratours vnder Vespasian, and many more whom I omit, to come to more moderne times, wherein Aquitaine only hath more furnished Rome with Senators and Orators, then all the rest of the world beside.

A testimony heereof was the Learned Nazarius, Author of some Panegyrics, yet remaining with vs. And that which is more admirable, was the daughter of this Nazarius, named Eunomia, the miracle of her age, who was not a lot inferior to the very worthiest Orators. Beside an infinite number of others, mentioned by the authors of those feuerall times, too troublesome for vs to rehearse but one halfe of them. Heere to appertaineth the writing of Claudian: That Gaul with her Learned Citizens, did ordinarily guard the Emperor, and serued him in the most part of his affairs. Moreover the greater part of the Roman Senate, and a number of the Magistrates beeing great and famous persons of that age, are especially noted to bee Gauls. So that wee may very well auauch that, which Ausonius sung in his Mosella: It is no longer Rome, that only made shew of her Caues, in regard that Gaul did euerie way equal her.

Other Sciences also haue carried as full saile there. In the first times thee had her Drydets, Vuates or Eubages, & Bardes, of whose learning we haue yet lesse some remains and memories. The Bards composed in Verses, and conferred to all posterities, the names and commendable actions of vertuous men, as puer sufficient to animate the very dullest corages. The Eubages, called also Vuates by Strabo, applied their studies to the contemplation of celestiall things; as also vnto Naturall Philosophy. As for the Drydets, they are sufficiently famous, and although wee haue spoken to good purpose of them in the former booke of the ancient Gauls; yet some especiall things there omitted, may the better in this place be remembered in larger manner.

They instructed and taught about all things else, that mens soules wer immortal: which is the foundation of all religion, and the very strongest bond of human society. They discoursed also on the stars, and of their course and motion: also of the greatnesse of the world, the earth, the nature of things, the power of God; & gaue instruction in all these to their youth. This is auouched by Ammianus Marcellinus, Mela, and Strabo, who say, That the most of them held the world to be immortal. An opinion surely (after many great disputes and alterations) found to be most true by the verie best Philosophers and Diuines, framing a distinction thus.

Assuredly, the world is of eternal and incorruptible matter, in regard of the celestiall part, which receiue no alteration, neither shal receiue any at their consummation: but by s^c aduinction of light and whole perfection. But what is vnder the caue of the Moone, composed and mixed with Elements for the vse of man, shal perish by fire, and returne into their first essence and Elementary quality. The course of heauen shal stay, and by consequent, al motion and corruption cease; according as it was held by Peter Lombard long since Bishop of Paris, & called Master of the Sentences; and with him all the Theological Scholasticks, and the Angellicall Doctor, Thomas Aquinas.

They beleued also, that (one day hereafter) the water and fire shal haue Dominion; whereby we may perceiue that they had notions comming neere to truth and our beleefe, albeit altered and confuted. For that which they conceiued of the water, they saide was already come, and for the matter of fire we doe credite the like, & expect the consummation of the world thereby. Why then it is no matter of maruell, if hauing imparted their knowledge to other people, Aristotle should confesse, That Philosophy receiued her originall from the learned Gauls, whom hee calleth Semnotheans, and auoucheth France to bee the Mistresse of Greece. All the Gaulish Philosophers were in such reputation; that the people conceyued the goodnesse of the yeare, the happinesse and honor of their

their times, to consist in the multiplicitie of them.

This shal suffice to shew, that such men were not well informed, as haue written, that the French did not adiect themselves to Sciences; considering, that they haue alwayes continued in the exercise of Letters and Learning. And for that purpose they had (from time to time) many famous Schooles, established for the instruction of youth. Marseilles equalled Athens in learning; so that very oftentimes the Romaines sent their Sonnes to that Academy, rather then to Athens, as it is reported by Strabo, who wrote in the time of the Emperor Tiberius. We reade moreover, that the Emperour Augustus, sent thither Julius Antonius, the youngest sonne of his Sister, to study there. And Tacitus reporteth, that the probity, integrity, and knowledge of Julius Agricola, his Father in Law, came by the nouriture & instruction, which he receiued at Marseilles in France.

About the same time, Aufine also became famous for the study of letters and liberal Arts, whereof wee haue the testimony in Tacitus. And againe, after these publike schooles, who were established by the Emperor Constantius, father to Constantine, who to that purpose sent thither the Orator Eumenius. There is a Law in the Code Theodosianus, of the Emperours Valens, Gratian, and Valentinian, wherein is declared, that there were a great number of Townes in France, which flourished by the excellency of Masters, Oratours, and Grammarians, in the learning both of Greeke and Latine. Among which towns also, were them of Bordeaux, Tholouse, Narbonne, and many other. Ausonius likewise speaking of that Bordeaux, sayth, That then issued from the hand of one only Doctor, Neitor Minervius, a thousand Famous Advocates or Councillors at law, swiue as many Senators or graue Statesmen.

These Fountaines of all erudition, haue not dried vp in France vnder the reignes of their Kings, but rather haue encreased and abounded more and more, by multiplicity of Schooles, publicly established in many other Citties; wherto they since haue giuen the right of an incorporated body or vniuersity. And by this occasion, such Vniuersities, in fauour of the studie of Letters and Sciences so founded and erected, haue bene endowed and adorned by diuers Kinges, with goodly great priuileges and particular fauours. Among which, that of Paris hath extraordinarily surpassed all other in the world. To her, as to the Queene of Learning, refers the affluence of people from strange Nations, there to learne the Sciences, and especially holy Diuinity. This is as the Faire, Mart, or Market of the whole world, for the liberall Arts, and for instruction in all Languages. This is as a Nurfing Orchard of good plants and ingenious spirits; in all verue and faire erudition: from whence hath bene selected (like swarms of Bees) learned men in infinit numbers, that haue dispersed themselves, and meereley peopled most parts of the earth. Also it hath bene the module and originall, whereby all other haue taken example, not only for France it self, but likewise for all Europe.

Pope Innocent the third, made such estimation thereof, that from thence he selected all those men, whom hee intended to aduance to the Bishopricks of Christendome, and other dignities in the Church. Beside, it appeareth by good & sufficient testimonies of other Vniuersities, for more then three hundred yeares since, that the studies of Paris haue bene the Foundation (in great measure) of the Church. Stadium Parisiense esse fundamentum Ecclesie. And euermore it hath bene the chiefeft in opposition against heresies, to combat and ouercom them, euen lo soone as (at any time) they began to grow. Infinite victories and triumphs hath the crowned her selfe withal, in so famous a contention, whereof I spare to make any report; because they are no lesse carefully then elegantly set downe by the Lord Loyell, in his Tract of the Vniuersity of Paris. Vv herein also hee hath most learnedly obserued, the true institution of that Vniuersity, against the vulgar Fables which haue bene noyed thereof. There are likewise many other Vniuersities, founded, and established in diuers Citties and Townes of France, as in Tholouse, Bourges, Orlean, Angiers, Poitiers, Cahors, Mont-pellier, Nymes, Caen, Nantes, Rheims, &c.

Also from France, and all her Schooles, haue proceeded men as learned and excellent in all kindes of Sciences, as in piety and and probity: and as this Discourse would require whole volumes, so yet it would exceede possibility to name and re-count them all. There have beene many wise & learned Byshoppes canonized for their sanctity of life, who have established Christian religion in many Countreys, and suppressed monstrous heresies, dispersed in many parts of the world. As S. Hilary Byshop of Poitiers, the true confounder of the Arian heresie, where-with the Church was too much tormented, euen at the beginning of her increasng. Saint Sulpitius Seuerus, whose learned writings lets vs yet sufficiently see his piety, and painfull endeours together, as the Arch byshop of Bourges, that liued vnder the reigne of King Gontran, and also a more ancient Priest of Aquitaine, of equal standing with S. Hierom and S. Martin, with whom he was very familiar, & who wrote his life.

Pontius Paulinus, who being a Senator, descended of a great family, and infinitely rich, gaue all his goods to the poore, & becoming an Ecclesiastical person, was afterward elected byshop of Nola in Italy. Of the same country of Aquitaine, were also S. Ruficus, S. Phocadius, and Prosper, Alethius the Priest, so much commended by S. Hierom, for his sanctity, eloquence, and learning. Ecdicius Autius, and Mammertus, instituter of the Rogations, Arch byshops of Vienna: S. Sidenius Apollonaris Byshop of Auvergne; S. Lupus byshop of Troyes; and S. Germaine byshop of Auxerre, who settled and assured Christian religion in England. Eucherius Archbishop of Lyon; Salustius and Gennadius, priests of Marcellus, and S. Vincentius Monke of S. Honoratus in the Isle of Lerins. And since the Monarchy of some later Kings, S. Rhemizius, and S. Gregory Florentius, Archbishops of Tours: who is compared by Fortunatus, an ancient Christian Poet, to S. Gregory Nazianzen, as giuen to the East, and by Gregory the Great, Pope, giuen to the South, as he for France was to the West. It was at the same time, when Pope Gregory (hauing scene at Rome) nor only admired him, but did him so much honor as could bee deuiled, Arnold, Byshop of Metz, Hincmar Archbishop of Rheims, Lupus Abbot of Ferriers in Gallia, Arnold de Liffieu, Fulbert & Tues, Byshops of Chartres, Sugerus Abbot of

S. Denis, S. Bernard Abbot of Clermont; Peter Abbaylard, of whom there went a Prouerbe in his time, that there was not any thing in all the world, reaching either to the highest heavens, or to the lowest bottome of the profoundest deepes, but they were all familiarly knowne to him. Also Peter Lombard, byshop of Paris, so admirable in the profession of Diuinitie, that (euen to this verie day) all Christendome acknowledgeth him for her Maister.

Hee should neuer make an end, that would take on him to recite all the great men of France, not onely such as haue preceded them of these times, but infinite numbers beside; whereby may bee iustly said, that Learning and the Sciences, not onely receiued their ancient flourishing splendor in France; but also haue imparted themselues (as before) to all other regions of the earth. There hath bin heretofore (beside all them formerly named) one Eumenides of Marcellus, a most wise Philosopher, who (among manie other things) made a very feruorous inquisition, & learnedly wrote on the originall of Niles. P. Tertentius Varro (surnamed Atacinus, of his Countrey in Narbonne Gaul, on the riuer of Aux, now called Audax, which belongeth it self into the sea at Narbonne) much renowned among the Roman Poets, for making foure bookes of the Argonautiques affaires, diuers Epigrams, and the Sequanes warres, recited by Pliny in many places, as also by the Grammarian Priscian.

Heere we may not forget the Philosopher * Philonius, so highly renowned vnder the Emperor Adrianus reigne: a native of Arles as Philostrophus reporteth in the discourse of his life. Nazarius the Orator, and Latinus Pacatus, Author of the excellent Panegyricke of Theodosius. About the same time flourished Rutilius Numatianus a Poet, and Anonius of Burdeaux, most worthy the name of a Poet, since the dayes of Augustus: diuers namelesse workes of his haue bene found, and (for their especial deservng) haue bene attributed to be Virgils. Hee was chosen for Schoolemaister to the emperors Gratian and Valentinian: for it was an ordinary course in those times, when there was any necessity of learned men, eyther to instruct the Emperors sons, or the great test Lords of the Romane Empire, they were secht fro France, as we read in many places of the workes of Symmachus, then Gouernour of Rome, & who sucked (himselfe) the milke of the Mules of France.

I forbear to speake of those strangers, who by becoming there learned, haue honored their owne countries; though re- spiring first the sweet ayre of France, and borrowed a beame from her bright splendour, to giue some lustre thereof to their places of birth. In breefe to speake truly, it is as difficult a thing, to name all the famous persons that haue flourished in France, as it is easie for other people to make a shew of all such as they haue had, which would rise to a far inferior number. Moreover, many great persons (being strangers there) hauing diligently surr- ayed the spirits of the French, haue found them by experienced iudgment, to be full of life, subtilty, proper & prompt to all occasions, cleare sighted, and piercing into the Sciences; thinking it very convenient that whereas some haue esteemed the ancient Gauls to be light and mutable, they should rather say, & very iustly, that they were tractable, apt and ready to performe any thing imposed on them whatsoeuer.

Of this minde was Julius Caesar Scaliger, an Italian, a man most learned and iudicious, who speaketh in this manner. Ilud est compressis aduertentibus non esse cum animo- rum mobilitate coniuncta fidei iacturam. Gal- los enim vides ad omnia momenta vel euen- tum vel disciplinam promptos paratos, ver- satiles: ut semel quicquam vel visum vel au- ditum, illico apud eorum ingenia & deponit & amittit nouitatem, in eo ipso penitus exci- plo videntur nati atque educati. Qui animo- rum vigor ignem, maturaque celritas nulli alij nationi data est a natura. Quod in- cubere felicissime esse dant, quod proficiunt gnaviter exercent: mercaturam, artes, arma, litteras, eruditionem, subtilitatem, candorem, eloquentiam. Omnia tamen gentium atque nationum, fide sunt maxime integra & consti- ti. It is a matter that well deserueth to be no- ted or considered, that the defect of faith is not alwaies conioyned with the mobility and lightnesse of spirit. That it must needs be so, I see that the French are prompt, ready, and tractable at all moments and occasions, be it eyther for the diversity of accidents, or be it for the Sciences: and that in such sort, as so soone as they haue scene or heard any thing, immediately it leaseth all novelty with them, and carrieth no such matter of newes in their mindes, for it seemeth as instantly bred and borne with them. This hot and fiery vigor of vnderstanding, and this promptitude with maturity & iudgement, hath not bin giuen by nature to any other Nation. On whatsoeuer they purpose a resolution, they supply the elues thereto very happily, profic therein most speedily, and exercise it carefully: either Mer- chants, Artes, Armes, Letters, erudition, subtilty, affability, freedom, and eloquence, or any thing else. And yet notwithstanding, among all nations, they are the most upright, & intirely constant of their faith and word.

Moreover, as there is nothing that doth so much civilize and sweeten manners the study of good letters, & to win know- ledge in the Sciences, which do beget in our soules all humanity and courtesie, and expellesh all rudenesse in carriage: euen so is it very true, that there are none more gracious and humane, then the French, especially towards strangers. The mildnes that is inwardly, and lodged vp in a french mans heart, maketh plaine outward shew and appearance in his countenance. In his forehead he carrieth a naturall franchise, and freedom in life and ciuill conuersa- tion: all laid downe euidently, without dissembling any thing, or vying any cunning or flattery. Good iudgement was made hereof by the emperor Julian, who said, He thought himselfe most happy, to meet with such good natured men, so facile & fel- lowly, & yet (neuertheless) without flattery.

It is a world of time since the Gauls had no mean reputation, for entertaining curteously, and liberally welcoming strangers among them. Diodorus the Sicilian highly commended the courtesie of the Gauls in this point. And Tacitus hath written particularly of the Germans, that came from the Gauls, and had meereley learned it of them. And when the French name began first to appeare, Salustius of Marcellus gaue them the vertue, to be kinde to strangers. About all, this people hath alwaies helde Religion in singular recommendation, as being a foundation of vertue: & they haue continually bin deuoted to diuinity, euen when they had no true knowledge thereof. Cesar saith, Gallia admodum dedita religioni- bus. And Livius describing the siege of the Gauls at the Capitole, saith, that a man of the house of the Fabij, being cast down fro the

the top of the Cittadell: without dreading any thing, went to Mount * Aventine,
to make an annuall and solemn sacrifice
in his family, and returned to the Capi-tole thorough the midst of the enemies.
They looked vpon him, without any violence or assailing, & suffered him to passe on; Being assembled at such resolution, as at a miracle: were it through respect and reue-rence to Religion, whereof (saith hee) this Nation is very carefull.

But after that the bright beames of the Gospel began to shew their splendour, it is hardly to be credited: with what feruor of soule this people embraced it, with what veneration, and (euenvpon heapes)
voluntarily presented themselves to death,
to resist the zeale of their affection to Christian Religion, and seale with their blood the sincerity of their faith. On the other side, saith S. Ierom, Spaine sometime brought forth Geryon the dreadful monster.
Heretics haue swarmed in most part of the earths quarters: Gaule only hath conferred her selfe in the truth, without denouing her selfe. But hath abounded alwayes in great personages, learned, and holy in life together.
Arianisme had infected all Christendome,
only France hath continued pure: for her Bishops carefully employed their paines,
quickly to stifle those heresies & schismes,
which grew too troublesome to the church.

Whē it came so to passe, that the schisme of the Donatists exalted it selfe, and many partialities, quarrels, and harreds by particular persons were intermingled: the Bishops that were in the faction with Donatus, required of the Emperor Constantinus,
that Judges might be sent from the Gauls, onely for their piety and learning. Whervpon the Emperor granted vnto them 3
Bishops, Rhetimus of Autun, Maternus of Cologne, and Marianus of Arles: who went to Rome, and together with Pope Milite-der, hauing exactly lookt into the matter, decided the cause, and condemned (by their sentence) the error of the Donatists, as it is reported by Optatus, one of the Orthodox Bishops of Africa, who hath left vs in writing the history of this schisme, &
gaue his helpe to the suppression thereof.

In the year VCCLVIII. Pope Stephen
the third, entreated Pepin King of France,
by his expresse Nuntio, that he would send him the very learnedst Bishops of France,
to the ende, that by their authority, hee

might reforme & re-establish the church, which he performed accordingly. Wher-by is plainly discovered, in what esteeme and account, the learning & piety of the Prelates of France hath alwayes bene.

According to this purpose of ours, it may be very truly maintained, that Gaul, among the Prouinces most towards the West, did first receiue the Christian faith, next vnto Italy; being brought thither in the first birth and infancy of the Church.
For ouer & beside the Apostle of France,
S. Dionysius Areopagita, who is said to bee sent thither by S. Paul: it is certaine, that one named Crescentius, the scholler of S. Paul, did first of all preach the christian faith in Gaul, and there performed the office of a Bishop and Pastor: as is to be gathered from S. Paul himselfe, from Epiphanius, S. Clemens, S. Ierome, & Eusebius, who report, that he was sent thither by S. Peter, and that there he dyed. I for aside what our Annallists haue recounted of S. Peter and S. Phillip, that they came thither. But I may not omit what is said by Epiphanius, that S. Luke came into France, and there declared the faith of Iesus Christ.

All that can be imputed to the ancient Gauls, concerning the acte of religion, is, that they sacrificed men. But this manner of sacrifice was not particularly to the Gauls, they hauing dealt no otherwise therein, then was vied (well neere) by all other people. The like is reported of the Scythians in general, and Mela nameth to be the Essedones. The Carthaginians, whē there hapned among the any plague
or famine, or any other publike affliction,
they made their recourse to this superstition, & ordinarily bloodied the Altars of their Hercules with humane sacrifices, yea
they would sacrifice their owne children to Saturne. Strabo saith, that the Lusitani-ans, a people of Spaine, would offer vp their prisoners in war. And Seneca declareth, that the Masilians, a people of Greece, &
well educated, would feed a man very immeasurably for some space of time, then they would conduct him through their city, charging him with accursed execrations & imprecations; and in the end they would sacrifice him, to expiate their pub-
like offences, and to lay on him the penalty of all their sins. Among the Grecians it was very common, not onely during the Trojan warre, of Iphigenia, sacrificed at

The Gladiators or Fencers of Rome

Sacrificed
the Grecians

the gate of Anlis; but likewise of Poluxen, in the Land of Troie. Long time after, Themistocles (a little before the day of Salamina) by command of his diuinitors, caused three noble Persians to be sacrificed. And about the same time, Xerxes, King of Persia, offered twelve men in sacrifice. Many examples more are there of the Grecians, declared more at large by Plutarchus. What thinke ye then of the Romans? Were not they addicted to the same superstition, and vied the like sacrifices of humane oblations? Wee finde it faithfully set downe, that they sacrificed
two Gauls, a man and a woman, to their Tutelary or household God. I cannot imagine what should be the reason, why they chose their offerings to be of that people, rather then of any other; if it were not in this respect, that they supposed they shold present a more acceptable sacrifice (in so doing) to the God of their City, then to offer any other people, whereby he might be offended, because once they had consumed Rome in cinders, and therefore they might bee judged the more able (afterward) to ouerthrow the whole Empire.

Plutarchus reporteth, that they caused some of the Gauls to be buried alive, during the Consulship of Marcellus, by reason of a Gaulish warre which had happened to them, and whereof they stood in fearfull doubt. And that afterward, euē till his time, they would haue celebrated the like bloody anniuersaries, which might not be permitted (it may bee for the immunity) and all the world to see
it. The like was put in practise at Rome, soone after the dismal day at Cannas: &
the Emperor Domitian likewise sacrificed
two: They had a Supiter, surnamed Latiolus, to whom they made offerings of human blood, and of the liues of men. This Tertullianus saith was ordinarily done in his time; and Lactantius and Eusebius, who liued soone after vnder the first Christian Emperours, do ascribe as much.

The often & frequent spectacles, among the Gladiators or Fencers, were they: any thing else, but even a cruel and bloody sacrifice of many men. Nay, which was most detestable, to cause them kill one another for other mens pleasure? They were not any small number of one or two, but ordinarily five hundred, a thousand, two thousand, and three thousand: and it hath bin

observed, that at such times, ten thousand haue bin thereto exposed. Let Cicero then and Plutarchus cease to reprove the Gauls
with this custome, seeing that they themselves, both Grecians & Romans, haue observed the same. Nay, the Grecians did far worse, for wēt contenting themselves with such sacrifices, they would needs know what good meate it was to feede on humane flesh, and as Pliny hath left written, to taste of all the parts of a man. If it was ill done to sacrifice a man, how much more detestable was it then, to serue in his flesh for food to the table? As for Cicero, I pardon him very willingly, for that which he said in one of his pleadings of the Gauls: because it was to serue his own cause, and for the reproofe of witnesses,
which made whatsoeuer he saide the lesse considerable. Contrariwise also, as himselfe hath written. He may soone deceiue him selfe, that thinks out of mine Orations and Pleadings, to deriue any available authority of my opinion, or else a forme of testimony, by that which I haue said: because (saith hee) it was the cause that spake and not I. And yet
if wee obserue more neerely, what Cicero hath said concerning this case, wee shall perceiue that the Gauls made glad sacrifices of malefactors, as thinking such an offering to be most agreeable to the gods,
as (sacrificed) there could bee none more proper, then the iust punishment of wicked persons. And yet notwithstanding, sometimes they were constrained to goe
so farre as innocent folke; merely for the defect of other: because this opinion was noted in them, that the Gods could not be pleased, for the life and safety of one man,
but by offering to them the life of another.

Howsoeuer, they deserued herein no imputation of blame, because what they did, was by superstition, the excess of true religion, notwithstanding it for any error, to offer to God what might bee most acceptable; which made them to present him with so noble a creature, the only perle of all other, and so consecrated to him the most precious oblation of all oblations:
wherin they are the lesse rasable for their custome (though indeed euell) yet not proceeding so farre as others; as the Grecians, who selfe voluntarily into Atheisme. Among Gods people, we see that Isaiah fell into the same error, vnder the shadow of a vow & deuotion: albeit I know very wel that

that the Hebrew Text hath no other carriage, but that he offered to God, no more but the virginity of his daughter only, & that this is the opinion and interpretation of the most learned Rabbins. I passe over the abominable idolatries of the Jewes, to the Idoll Molech, who practised the very same. Yet what hath bene said, might (perhaps) favour of some signale and sensible apprehension, or preface, that man could not be faued, but by a man himselfe: And that one day, man should bee redeemed, and brought into his former condition, by the blood and passion of a man. This haue I set downe in their excuse, it being a zeale proceeding from religion, when as then they walked in darknes, destitute of any knowledge of the true God.

Now, forasmuch as I haue heretofore indifferently vsed these words, Gaule and France, Frenchmen and Gaules, as being no other then one and the same thing, whereof some may conceit very strangely; I hold it convenient, & suitable to our purpose, to deliuer a sufficient reason therefore. That which our Ancients had named Gaule or Celtic, was afterward designed by the name of France. Likewise, the Kings of France haue long time commanded, in all those parts which were tearmed the ancient bounds of Gaule, betwene the Rhine, the Alpes, the Pyreneans, and the Mediterranean and Ocean Seas. These were the ancient limits of France, which also by sea-sons, and vnder certaine Kings, haue extended themselves a great deal further. But if any parcell thereof be at this day dimembred or cut off, that may not change the true appellation of things. Considering, that such distraction is nothing but the acte, the right alwaies remains in his perfect integrity. And as for the French, it will be auouched, that they are one self-same people with the Gaules, on whatsoever side search be made, and the truth set downe of their originall.

I may not flay my selfe heere, to fight with the false opinion of such, who thinking to make the Gaules the more honourable, would haue them to be descended from the Troyans, because it hath bin already done by others. But it is a point so cleare and apparant, that there is no man (now adayes) so filly versed in letters: but plainly knoweth, that they are altogether meere fables and fictions. There hath bin another opinion, and pursued by many, who imagineth the French to be come forth of Allemagne or Germany. And according to this conceit, there shall be no place of distinguishing the French with the Gaules: because it is most true to say, that Germany hath bene peopled by her neighbor Gaule. So in making the French to come from thence into Gaule, is to returne them backe to the place where they receiued their originall. For it is to be credited, that Prouinces which are the most temperate, haue bin the first inhabited, & after that men are encreased in multitude, they then make their recourse to more remote places, which are of ruder quality, and more subiect to cold. Beside, Cæsar himselfe (long since) testified, that the Germanes or Allemaignes, called the Gaules their Brethren: for the similitude of their manners, and the customes of both these people, reported by our ancestors, may instantly make faith for this their fraternity.

Others would fetch them from the Pannonians, as it is reported by S. Gregory of Tours. Now it is very certaine, that the Gaules did sometimes people both the Pannonians: especially at that time, as Brutus made warre in Macedon, and throughout all Greece. And the Geographers, as Stephanus, Arrianus, and Strabo, do nominate the Celtes among the people of Pannonia. There is yet another opinion, the truest and most certaine, and yet notwithstanding little enough knowne. For oftentimes (saith an ancient Writer) it cometh to passe, that the originall of great people is as much unknowne, as that of our greatest Rivers. This is that which hath bin obscured by diuers passages of Sidonius Apollinaris, S. Gregory of Tours, and other neighbouring Authors, concerning the beginning of this Monarchy: that the French came from Sicambria, and that the Sicambrians are many times taken for the French.

Now we are to note, this Sicambria is not that Sicambria, which some haue vniuallly seated in Franconia: but it is described by ancient Geographers toward the North, wholly ioyning to the riuages of Rhine, as well on the one side, as the other. But more principally towards the place, where that goodly streame falleth into the Sea: a place of very difficult access, by reason of the great Marishes thereabout. Suetonius maketh mention that the Emperor perous Augustus caused those valiant Sicambrians to passe on further into the firme land of the Gaules, and namely, that he gaue them * Batavia to dwell in. This he did, some way to content them, and to hinder their courses: as also to serue his owne turne with this warlike Nation, being vpon the extremities or vnnorth parts of Gaule. And beside, we read in Tacitus, that there was daily at the Emperors seruice, a Sicambrian band or Cohort, highly esteemed for their valiancy.

Heereby we may know, that they are defended of the same country with the Gaules, and it is to be credited, that these were the people onely, which neuer came into subiection of the Roman Empire, in the time of Cæsar: in regard of the difficult places, and badnesse of the country which then they held. This Sicambrian people, knowne & renowned by the name of French onely in the time of Gaius, vnder Posthumus, one of the thirty tyrants, about the yeare of our Lord, CCLXIX. could not keepe themselves alwayes in their Northerly corner or angle of Gaule, such as (at this day) Holland and part of Friesland are: but they made their extendure into neighboring countries, & continually there tormented the Romanes in Gaule, after whose liberty they longed first to time. And part of them passing into Gaule among the Romanes, were there highly esteemed, and came to vndertake the cheefest charges, as we may reade of many of them, in Ammianus Marcellinus.

Part of this people also, namely they that were transported by Augustus, continued (for long time) in obedience to the Empire, as appeareth by many examples, and Histories let downe by diuers Historians, which I may not heere recite, because (for the most part) they haue bene diligently collected by the Lord Faucher, in his French Antiquities, where this true opinion is approoued, by the passages of Lozimus, Ammianus Marcellinus, Procopius and Zonarus. At the fall of that great Empire, those inuincible Sicambrians, Frances, or French, accustomed to make ordinary courses into Gaule, perceiving the inuasion of Northerly people, as the Alanes, Vandales, Bourgnignons, & Goths, they could not endure, that their ancient country shold remaine any longer so subiect, neither by the tyranny of Romane

Magistrates, nor by the inuasions of barbarous people. Hereupon taking apt occasion, they proceed on further into the midst of the Gaules; where they were receiued (in open armes) by their olde mother, and by the other Gaules, who ioyning with them, shooke off the yoke of the Romanes, & expelled also the strange Nations, had so insolently intruded on the.

From thence forward, both one & other named them Frenchmen, as being but one people by originall. Nor can it be conceived, that the Sicambrian people shold be enemies to the Gaules, but rather called by the as their fellowly brethren, to helpe in their enfranchizing, being receiued with the liking of euery one: as these places of S. Gregory of Tours do sufficiently shew. Inter cæcū iam terror Francorum resonaret in his partibus, & omnes eos, amore desiderabili cuperent imperare, &c. Also in another place: Multi ex Gallijs habere Francos dominos sumo desiderio cupiebant. Moreover, it is to be seen in many places of the histories, written by the same S. Gregory, that the Gaules were neuer trod downe by the French; but admittred in publike charges, & took part in their honors, not as a conquered people, but as companions, friends, and associates, and as making but one people. In regard whereof, a man may vse the names of French and Gaules, & France and Gaule, being but one and the same thing. And the country euermore inhabited by the same people originallly, being neuer thence expelled, nor subiected.

A country the most happy, the most fertile, the most abounding in all things, and the most agreeable with the world, & least incommodious. The people dwelling therein, the most martiall; & warriors at all times, that the Sunne neuer beheld better. By others also commended, for all those good and vertuous qualities, wherewith any humane spirit can be adorned, quicke, apt, & ready to whatsoever they apply themselves, with moderation, curtesie, and humanity, as none greater can be desired. The happiness & felicity of this Land, together with so many commendable qualities of the people, haue bene published (in some measure) by the Poet Buchanan of Scotland, when at his returne from Portingall, coming backe into France, he made these verses, which I thought fit here to insert, to serue for a conclusion of this discourse.

How ancient Gaule became afterward to be called France.

Confusion of adjectives may not alter matters of truth.

CHAP. III.

*Of the Maieſty, Dignity, and high Eminency
of the Kings of France: And what infinite actions of Honour they haue done from time to time, to renowne the glory of that kingdome.*

IT is not yet ſufficient, ney-
ther maketh it vp a perfect felicity, that France ſhould bee filled with ſo much wealth and commodities,
as the earth can any way yeeld: alſo that the people are ſo generous, endued with ſo many commendable qualities, beſide,
moſt humane and acceptable conuerſation.
If all do not correſpond to this proſperity, and that the forme of her eſtate &
good government, is not the main height of all this happineſſe. Wherein it may well be ſaid, that France hath bene as gra-tiously fauoured by heauen, as in al other things whatſoeuer. There hath neuer beeene ſeene ſo many ciuill warres and fa-tions, for change and alteration of the State, as hath often happened in many other Princes. After ſhe had once taſted the Monarchall Government of one only naturall Prince (which all the greateſt Philophers, ſuch as were brought vp in free citties, haue confeſſed to be the beſt) ſhe neuer found any change, neyther did it euer make offer of itſelfe, or any way propoſed.

France well may boaſt this in common, with a great part of the people of the world, that ſhe is a Monarchall eſtate:
but yet this is more particular to her, that ſhe hath ſuſtained no mutation for ſo many Ages; but hath beeene inuolubly alwayes conſeuered in her owne Royall eſ-tate and government. And it may as truly be ſaid, that her Kings haue excelled as much about others in the world, as France
itſelfe hath gon beyond all other Lands.
Then to come to the point of her Kings,
and of their Greatneſſe and Excellency:
it reſulteth firſt of al, from that which hath beeene diſcourſed heretofore. Becauſe
there is no man, but will tearme that king potent, rich, and redoubtable, that com-mandeth ouer a country ſo fertile & well furniſhed: and he will alſo vouchſafe, that Kings commanding a people ſo vertuous and generous together, muſt needs be Pa-ragons in generoſity and courage, yea, & true models of all vertue. Moreouer, what other Kings can make their vaunt, to haue
ſo goodly, ſo opulent, and ſo happy territories, and to command ouer ſuch a people? In like manner, what Land can ſay, that it hath had like Kings, and ſo great
in all reſpects, as they of France haue bin?
This in general, and the touching of this point thus were ſufficient, without need of any further inquisition: becauſe it is euident to the eyes of all men, euen as what hath bin related in our former chap.

But to diſcourſe more particularly on their other prerogatiues. Firſt, it is a matter moſt conſtant and certaine, that the Kings of France are Soueraigns in their State, holding their kingdom but of God
onely, and by the Sword: this needs no other profe, becauſe it is granted without dition. Alſo, they haue bene in this poſſeſſion, not onely for exceeding the memories of men, or for three hundred yeares tearme more then ſufficient, for eſtabliſhing ſure and inuolubly a Soueraigne eſtate, as maintained ſeptah, chiefe of the Iſraelites againſt the Ammonites, but alſo for twelue hundred yeares. There needeth no other teſtimony then that of Pope Innocent the third, who ſpeaketh it expreſly

in his Decretall, That the King of France
acknowledged not any Soueraigne, in temporal occaſions.

This was it which made ſo ſuperfluous
impertinent, inept, and idle, the diſputa-tion ſo much canuaized amongſt the Doctors Imperialiſts, to witte; Whether the King of France were ſubieſt to the Empire,
or no, and whereabout the Doctors diſputing vainly, contraried themſelves, and ſufficiently ouerthrew their owne iudge-ments. Peter Iellaga, an ancient Spaniſh Doctour, in his treatiſe of a Prince, & Oldradus an Italian Doctour (the cheefeſt of his time do maintaine; That the kingdome
of France acknowledgeth not, either by ac-te or right, any Prince of the world.

The Emperours themſelves alſo, haue
aunouched as much; declaring by diuers
actes, That the King of France is Soue-raigne, & that he depended not on them
in any faſhion whatſoeuer; which will be more amply handled, in a place fitter for the purpoſe. To as filly effect was that,
which Doctour Lopez Madera, a Spaniard hath written; That the Kings of France doe
take their Title, by a conſeſſion made vnto them by the Emperor Iuſtinian, according to the recitall of Procopius. But a man can ſet no ſure footing, on that which is ſaide by a ſubieſt to the Empire. And beſide, ſoon after, Iuſtinian himſelfe could ſay; That he quitted whatſoeuer hee had pretended to the Gauls, becauſe he held not there any thing.
And in other places, he ſpeaketh not of al
the Gauls, but onely concerning them of France, and the neighbouring Landes, which the Goths held before, & which he pretended appertaining vnto him, by his conqueſt made of them. VVhich Landes, the Goths hauing made ouer to the Kings of France, Iuſtinian approved the conſel-ſion, and on that conſideration, departed
with all his rights and pretentions.

The French do not ground their grants,
as the ſame Lopez did for Spaine, on the grant which he pretended to be made by the Emperor Honorius, to the Gothe Alaricke. They deriue their title from higher place, and not from the Romaines: who had no other right, but an vniuſt inuaſion by Armes. For theſe are the Gauls, namely, ſuch as enfranchiſed themſelves from the Romaines, and that by meanes of the French, their auncient Columnes and Compatriots. And therefore it is apparantly ſeene, that they haue no way vſurped by nouelty, but rather haue regained their firſt condition and liberty, as being reduced to their primitive nature. A matter very favorable, and a reaſon moſt impertinent among the Ciuill Lawyers. In like manner, what was more tuſt then that which the Romaines caried away by force of Armes, and was taken again from them

bv the very ſame meanes? But this is infallible, that the Kings of France are Soueraignes, knowne to be ſuch, at all times and euery where, without any controuerſie, or fruſtulous contradiction.

It cannot bee ſo ſayde of many other Kings, and namely it hath called in queſtion the King of Spaine. For Pope Gregory maintaineth in his Register, that Spaine is parcel of Saint Peters patrimony, and is to make prouiſion for his Lord:
hauing thefore inueſted a certain Count
or Earle of all that which he had conquered from the Moores. In conſequence whereof, by report of their own Spaniſh writers, Ramirus the firſt, King of Arra-gon, payed a tribute to the Popes: which his ſon Sanchio after continued to Pope Alexander the ſecond. And ſince this ſub-iection to the Romane Church, as from feodatories, it hath beeene acknowledged by other Kings.

VVe read that Peter the ſecond, King of Arragon, beſide acknowledgement of feodality, ſubmitted & rendered his kingdome, by ordinary cenſuall (to Pope Innocent the third) of two hundred and fifty peecees of Arabian Golde, which had free
courſe then, as appeareth by the Registers in the Vaticane, which were extracted and ouer-written by Ciacconius a Spaniſh author, who wrote the liues of the Popes, &
by diuers hiſtories of Spaine.

In like manner, the Realmes of Sar-dignia and Cyprus doe depend vpon the holy See, and the inueſtiture of the ſame
in the Vaticane, which was made by the Pope

Pope to Peter the third, King of Arragon. In consequence whereof afterward, Jaques of Arragon, did homage liege at Valencia, betweene the hands of the Legate, in the year, MCCCLIII.

I finde also, that Ferdinand and Alphonfus, Kings of Arragon, did make faith and homage, in the year MCCCCXLV. The Islands of the Canaries, and Cape du Verd, are held in the same sort, and I reade, that Lewes of Spaine was inuelted, and redired faith and homage to the Pope, in the year MCCCCXLIII, being charged to pay to the Apostolicall Chamber, four hundred Florins of gold; whereof Petrarch also maketh mention. And as for the East Indies and Perru, it is very certaine, that Pope Alexander the sixth, in making partage of that which was newly discovered, betweene the kings of Castile and Portugall: reserved expressly to himselfe, the full power and souerainty, by consent of both the kings, whom afterward he constituted his vassalls, in all acquies & conquests by them made, or that should be made thence forward, as the Spaniards themselves haue written. In like case, pope Julius the second, gaue to Ferdinand the sixth, King of Arragon and of Castile, the kingdom of Granada, which hee had conquered from the Moorers: with this charge, to hold it of the Roman Church, in faith and homage.

All these feodall acknowledgements and subiections of the estate of Spaine, as well in generall as in particular, are no matters of novelty. For before them, and during the reignes of the Goths: the kings alwayes payed tribute to the holy See, in acknowledgement of souerainty: vntill that a tyrant named Pitiza, a little before the ruine made by the Sarrasins, refused to pay it. And afterward, by the generall inuasion of Spaine, hauing bin wholly discontinued; Pope Gregory the seventh complained thereof in his Register, as is well obserued by the worthy Cardinal Baronius. Which may be the cause, that each particular king, beginning to strengthen himselfe against the oppression of the Sarrasins, would returne againe to the duty of this submission, and ancient subiection.

On the other side, it is found recorded, that the kingdom of Castile is in Fief to France. For Henry the second, King of Castile, submitting himselfe to Charls the first, king of France, promised as well for himselfe, as for his successors, to be vassall, and to hold his kingdom of Castile, of the Kings of France, by a treaty in the year MCCCLXIX. which is kept in good forme in the Treasury of France. This king of Castile, being expelled thence by his Brother Don Peter, was at length re-established there againe, by power from the king of France, vnder conduct of that valiant knight, Bertrand de Guescline, Constable of France, notwithstanding all the efforts of the English, banded to the contrary.

There is another notable quality, which is no meane advantage vnto the Realme of France, in that it is, and euermore hath beene successiue hereditary, and not electiue. And like as by generall custome, in all succession in the Realme, death seizeth on the liuing: euen so this taketh place, & is obserued so much the more certainly, for succession in the State. Not vnlike compared to the golden branch in Virgill, which being pluckt away, another springeth vp instantly, so that there is neuer any detiallance.

Pro anulo non deficit alter.

Whence arose the common saying among the French, That the King neuer dyeth. Because that there is alwayes (naturally) another of the same kinde, who (without any controuersie or difficulty) succeedeth at the same instant in the others place. And when as France happeneth to be over-trailed and pressed by potent enemies, euen to the losse of her King; yet it causeth no confusion or disorder, neither giueth any advantage to the enemy, or can be (by such an accident) vlturp vpon the State. It hath beene proued (to the cost of some) like vnto a reuiuing Hydra, not to be surmounted; or rather as a Phoenix, that reuiuet another out of her selfe. Also, that the Kings of France were truly bred of an immortall race, neuer parting from hence, to returne to the true place of their celestiall and diuine originall; but they left a successiour, who (in the same moment) is made King, without any other formality.

But to render their succession the more assured, & (therby) the kings immortall, it hath hath alwayes beene receyued in France, that such as are of the blood-royall, although they or hee should stand farre off by a thousand degrees: yet notwithstanding, if there be not any other that is nearer, they or hee are called to the succession of the kingdom, and possessed thereof, only by the others decease, without any other contradiction; which hath beene well obserued by Baldus, an Italian Doctor, and hath euermore bene so continued, euen to the person of the King nowe happily reigning, to bee descended from the King, called Saint Lewes. Sic in Francia morietur toto domus Regia, extaret vna de sanguine antiquo, puta de domo Bourbonie, & non esset alius proximior, esto quod esset millesimo gradu, tamen iure sanguinis, & perpetua consuetudinis, succederet in Regno Francorum. Item Guliel. Benedicti, in Cap. Regnatus in ver. duos habens, Num. 78.

Agathis the Greek, who wrote in the time of Iustinian, obserued the same also, saying, Amongst the French, Children take the kingdom, by succession to theyr Fathers. And in another place, hee saith and reciteth, That Theodebert King of Metz, being deceased, his sonne Theudibalde, or Thibault succeeded him, although hee was but an Infant. But (saith hee) it was the Lawe of the Countrey that called him thereto. Assuredly a most wise institution, especially, for the representation of succession to infinite ages: to obuiate disorders, inconueniences, and ouerthrowing an Estate, which may happen during a vacancy, and when the successor is vncertaine.

Before I passe any further, I may heere tell you, that such succession in a kingdom hath not alwayes beene in Spaine. And there needeth no other prooff thereof, but the confession or acknowledgement of Spanish Authors; and particularly, of Lopez Madera, who wrote in the Spanish tongue, and yet but little for the dignitie of the Kings of Spaine. For we find, that the Kings were ther established by election, not only during the kingdom of the Goths; but also, after that they were ruined, and in the inuasion of the Sarrasins. Pelagius, king of the Asurians, & (after him) many other his successors, came by the very same meanes, as is exactly approoued by Molina a Spanish Authour. In a word, all that Lopez produceth, is, that the Kinges were electiue: but yet, that none were at any time elected, excepting that they were of the Family and House- Royall.

The contrary appeareth, by the certaine sequel of Histories, and namely by the Councils of Toledo, who permitted, that the election should be made indefinitely of all persons; except of Slaves, strangers, and others, that were not of the race of the Goths. Wherein (it may be) an equiuocation is made, when as Lopez sayth, Decadem gente: the interpretation beareth, Of the Family and House-Royall, and not of the Nation of the Goths, as the Councils vnderstand. Therein also were many constitutions, for the honour and conseruation of such as were of the race of the precedent Kings: it being a matter necessary to assure them in this manner, because there were other Kinges of their house. For whom there needed no such prouision, nor search for such assurances, if the Kings should haue beene successiue. But yet much more by the fifth Council of Toledo, there is denounced a curse and excommunication against such as shall come to the kingdom of the Goths otherwise then by election. As we read in Ritius, one of their owne Historians, that Bamba a labouring man was made king of Spaine by Pope Leo, and approved by the election of the people.

It neuer hath bene so in France, where the right of succession hath euermore bin inuolubly kept: There, the Race-Royall which surpasseth the rest in greatnesse and vertue, are borne and destyned to reigne.

Nor was it without good cause, that in Greece they made so exact an inquisition and search for such as were of the Linage of Heraclides, and of the Acadides, to make them Kings, Captains in warre, and Governours of estates. Plato, and nexte to him Aristotle, are of opinion, that Monarchy is indeede the best forme of Government: Were it not as a dream (say they) to find a good king. As thinking it a matter impossible for a humane spirit, in so great a fortune, affluence of so many goods and delights, and such liberty without contradiction, and in so supream a power, to keepe in, and command ouer his owne passions. Plato addeth, Wee line not in the Commonwealthe of Bees, where naturally one is bred much greater and better, to command our all the other. And yet the very same happeneth to the French, whose Kings come from their very birth, more great (not of body) but of courage, generosity, and vnderstanding, then all the rest borne and esteemed (by heaven) of another nature, then any common person to reign.

We could we but a little consider the great difficulties and inconueniences, which are noted in an electiue estate, by reason of such forme of election, we should the better know, what an advantage, excellency, and prerogative France hath. In an estate electiue, the death of the Prince hapning, there is an Interregnum, during which time, it falls into "Anarchy, which causeth disorder, vnruinesse, and confusion; whereon ensue infinite euils, murders, afflittes, violence, and thefts. As hath beene well obserued in those elections, made for the Kings of Thunis, & the Soldanes of Egypt by the Atamellukes, Nay, and hath sometimes happened at the election of Popes, in Sede vacante.

And which is yett farre worse, the Interregnum sometimes lasteth for many dayes, because, beside vnder-handed suites and made factions, there is a naturall inclination to dissention in men. As hath oft bene scene to happen in the Empire of the East, after it yeelded it selfe to be electiue: And in the Realmes of Hungary, Polonia, Bohemia, Denmarke, and Sweden. During these Interregnums, nothing hapneth but schismes, diuisions, and many menaces of diuers persons, which ordinarily do draw on ciuill warres, every one courting to haue a Prince of his partaking, or as he would haue it.

It hath also bene obserued in the Empire of Germany, that many Emperors haue bene elected, vntill they haue had seuen or eight at a time, as after the death of the Emperour Fredericke the second. And there could no sufficient remedy be found, for the establishing of a Government, that might haue commanded in the meane while; because about the election of that Governour, there grew on still the same inconueniences. And perhaps it might haue so fallen out, that the Governour being seized on the estate, would attend no other election, as some haue done heretofore: finding but few men, that will render vp so great an engagement;

Moreouer, it cometh so to passe sometimes, that such as haue the right to elect Princes, will deliuer forth some apparances of credence to them, yet to haue them murdered and massacred, if they please them not, or else by corruption leaue them and elect some other. Hereof the Romane Empire can furnish vs with sufficient examples; and that it neuer was more calme, then when her Princes came to the Empire by succession. On the contrary, when the election was in the Soldiers hands, they set the Empire to sale, and filled all the State with rapines, thefts, murders, cruelties, and barbarous brutishnesse. When an Emperour pleased them not, were he the most vertuous man and the best Prince in the world; they would massacre him, without any difficulty, and establish another; as it befell to the good Emperour Pertinax, after whose murder, they caused it to be published through the City, that the Empire was to be sold to the fairest offerer.

In like manner, they murdered Alexander Seuerus, one of the best and vertuous Princes that euer was. And so they dealt with Probus, Traianus, and many more, as may be gathered by the sequell of Histories from time to time. Yet this is not all, each Legion and each Army made his Emperour all which (in the end) had their throates cut, after cruell ciuill warres: the poore people enduring all this while, infinite miseries, and there are obserued (in that time) will neere thirty, among whom there was two women.

These inconueniences were ordinary (anciently) in the estate of Spain. S. Gregory of Tours saith: Sumptuosissime habent delectabilem consuetudinem, ut si quis eis de regibus non placuisset, gladio cum adpetere; et qui libuisset animo, hanc sibi statuerunt Regni. The Gothes had taken this detestable custome, that if any one of their kings did not please them; they would murder him, and establish whosoever falleth into their fantasie, to be their King. This he wrote concerning Theodas, Theodeysiles, and Agilas. And in Germany, after that this order of election got footing there, there were eight or nine Emperors slain; as William of Holland, Raoul, Albert, Henry the seuenth, Frederick the second, and Leues of Bawaria, &c. beside them that haue shamefully bene expelled from the Imperial Throne. And of fifteene Sultanes that reigned in Egypt, seauen were murdered.

VVith these wee could ranke many equally, and equally worthy, growing onely through hatreds and discontentment: from whence haue proceeded diuisions and seditions; so that the choise and preferring of one man, hath prouoed the viter contempt of another. And questionlesse, it will be very hard for him that hath bene refused, intirely to be obedient to him with whome hee hath contested for the royall authority, as his equal in house, reputation and merit.

Happy France, and truly happy, where to God hath giuen the grace, to breathe but one acceptable libertie, vnder the sweet command of thy naturall and successe Kings: which hath bene thy warrant from ruine, dangers, & deadly tempests, and hath kept thy State alwaies flourishing, yea, in full strength and vigor.

Amongst other inconueniences that may be met within an electiue estate, this is one: A Prince electiue will neuer be carefull of the state, which he holdeth but by entreaty, or at other mens liking, but of his owne family. For knowing well, that he cannot leaue the kingdome to his children, he makes his profite of the publike purse, deriuing and turning it to his own particulars, by venditions and other alienations. According as Rodolphe of Habsbourg did, who comming to bee elected Emperour, by the fauour of his Master Elector, the Arch-Bishop of Magunce; founded & built vp the house of Austria vpon the ruines of the Empire. Euen so farre, as to sell at prices of money, her fiefdomes and Seigneuries to Cities of Italy; as to Florence for six thousand crowns, and to Lucas for ten thousand, and so to other in like manner. Which prouoed to be the end of the kingdom and command of the Emperors in Italy: in regard whereof, he was highly blamed by all the Historians of those times, and by such as haue written euer since.

I forbear to speake of many other Emperours, who practised in the same manner, and alienated the hereditary patrimony of the Empire, Cities, Townes, Territories, and Seigneuries, as well in Germany, as in Italy, and other places. And by this meanes, diuers Principalities established, and great cities franchised, beare now no more but the bare name of sovereignty for the Empire. Also it is to be credited, that a Prince doing what he can, will ouerthrow all, yet not to spite turly: but will mingle (as one saith) heauen with earth, but he will make his issue to succeed, so strong and mighty is this passion. Few or none are found to follow the example of Moses, who knowing and acknowledging his sonnes to bee incapable to command the people of Israel after him; rather chose to establish another, as preferring the weale publike, before affection or charity to his owne. It is recorded, that the Emperour Charles the fourth, promised an hundred thousand crowns to each one of the Princes Electours, to haue his sonne Wenceslaus elected emperour; and being vnable to pay them, hee was constrained to giue ouer to them the ordinary reuenues of the empire in payment.

The case is quite contrary in France, where the inheritance and patrimony of him that cometh to the crowne by succession, accrue and reuinieth it selfe (by the same meanes) to the crowne. In regard whereof, the Kings haue not two Kindes of inheritances, the one particular, and the other publike for all cometh of one and the same nature, & all is made publike. Wherein is discerned the full effect, of that which the emperour Antoninus Pius said to his wife. Seeing (sayeth he) that we are come to the Empire, wee haue lost that which we had before.

But although this kingdome bee successiue in this manner, by the iuuile custom of the country, rather the by hereditary right yet notwithstanding, women, and the descendants of them in that kind, neuer haue bene, neither euer can be admitted, no not in the defect of Males. VVithout reason, some enemies to the French name, and enuious (to speake truly) of this prerogative; would strue to call in doubt the Salique Law, which reiecteth women from succession in the kingdome, saying, that the originall thereof is doubtful and vnertaine. As if a man can desire a better and more certain prooffe, then the success and possession of so many hundred yeares, since the fer-led establishment of that estate. That law hath bene engraven, not in Marble or Copper, but in the hearts of Frenchmen and alwayes certainly kept.

Lopez Madera the Spaniard, seeing that the like could not be in Spaine, and that the dignity was much lesse, to couer the defect, and bring some shadow for it, labourerth to prooue, by stretching out a long discourse, that the succession of women is very naturall. This carryeth good reason in matter of succession for Patrimony in particulars. In which case (neuertheless) we can shew, that the succession by right (well nelle of all people) hath alwayes bene referred to the Males: who are as firme pillars and Anchors of assurance to great Families. But in the succession of a mighty estate or kingdom it were a mockery for the French to imagine, that the maintaining of womens succession could be the better. There is verie great difference (sayde the Emperour Adrian) betweene the search of an heire of my patrimony, and a success for in an Empire.

Moreover, it were superfluous to goe seeke for the original of this Salique Law, and enquire any further, when or how it was made; because it appeareth of a certaine vse, and that it hath alwaies bin kept by the French. Law hath no force, if it be not by custome, which is the very strongest Law of all other. And it may well be sayde, that it is a right of great authorities, when it hath bene obserued so strictly: as there is no neede of reducing it to a law by writing.

It is no written Law, but borne with them, neither haue they inuented it, but sucked it from nature herselfe, who gaue it them by instinct, & so instructed them: which not only the French, but most part of the people of the world, haue likewise most religiously obserued. If we look vpon royall and imitation of government generall in the world, by the Soueraigne vnitie, from the very first birth, that is to say, when the world tooke beginning, we shall find, that the first fathers of families gaue command in their houses themselves and not by their wiues, and that the male children succeeded them in the foueraignty of the Family, whereas the Daughters passed to another house, without hauiing any part there.

Whence came it, that all people (in the first ages) were governed by Kinges, (not of many Prouinces) but of a Citie, or small territory onely, which had bene before but the inclosure of a father of a Family? As is to be seene, as wel in holy Writ, as by the ancient histories of each Countrey. That which great Aristotle faithfully interpreted of nature, hee hath well acknowledged. In the beginning (saith hee) Townes and Cities were governed by Kinges, as now adayes people and strange Nations are. For they were composed of people, that liued vnder Royalty: each Family being governed by the most ancient. So women could not come to the Royaltie, neither hold part in the succession of particulars. Contrarywise, Fathers of the family receiued commodity by rich gifts and presents which were given them, by such as made request for their daughters: as wee read in holye Writ, of the Father, Mother, and Brethren of Rebecca, the wife to Isaac, and as (at this day) it is a common right among all strange people, as well of the East, west, and South, where it is obserued in the same sort.

Aristotle reporteth, that the ancient Greeks did buy their wiues: whereof (as yet) we haue the testimony of Homer. But since the prime simplicity & good nature of men forsooke and gaue them ouer, iustice and peace withdrawing themselves: while in this truly Iron Age) all began to grow more strong, without any right or iustice, and that ambition (a most pestilent disease) ranne currant in the hearts of men: that goodly order became peruerced and ouerthrowne: when the most mightie, such as the Scripture reporteth, as of Nimrod and others, of Ninus, Sesostris, Nebuchadonazar, and Cyrus, troubled the quietnes of their neighbours, and invaded their lands. So, on the ruine of a great number of small estates, mightie Empires and Monarchies grew to bee grounded, and gaue command both in length and largeness.

In this inuasion, confusion, & ouerthrowing of kingdomes, as also particular and naturall Principalities, some also mounting vp against their Soueraignes; in stead of naturall Royalty, brought estates to popularity or Oligarchy. Afterward in regard of these disorders thus happening, the greater part of the people being not willing to liue so: became at length contray-

strained to render themselves to their own nature, & return to the good government of kings, to enjoy their former iustice. To the end that the weakest might bee in as safe security as the strongest, and y which pertained to euery private person, might peaceably be possessed, and defended by their kings, against the violence of neighbors: which were the two principall functions, that incited wading people to reunite & submit themselves to kings. Wherin Aristotle also hath placed the definitiō of royaltie, to wit: As well to render iustice, as to defend the subjects from inuasion of enemies. Such were the Iudges that governed the Estate of Israel, before the establishment of kings. Wherto is referred that which Herodotus said: That the Medes would haue Dioces to kee their K. to the end to render iustice. Be it then, that we regard the first original and naturall institution of kings, or be it the establishment of great Monarchies: yet it is doubtles, that women neither could or can be any participants. And as for the last institution of kings, for recourse of people, to the ende, they might be defended against violence, & to enjoy iustice: we plainly perceiue, this could neuer agree with the naturall disposition of women, because the vertue of pudicity rejecteth them from those functions, of iudging people, & defending them by Armes. And if in popular and Oligarchall Common-weals, women haue alwayes bin barred from government, and entermied with the publicke affaires: by much stronger reason then they ought to bee frō Royaltie, in as much as that forme of State is more excellent then the other. It hath bin obserued throughout all the Monarchies, euier pursuing the right of nature. And during fabulous times, if ther be found a Semiramis among the Assyrians; yet that breaketh not the rule. Considering the story it selfe saith, that to bring her purpose to passe, she disguised herselfe in the habit of a man: and was taken, not for Semiramis, but for her Son Ninus. And thereby it appeareth, that the Assyrians did not willingly endure the dominion of a woman, as Lopez Madera fondly supposeth. Contrarywise we reade, that that caused the ruine of their Monarchy, was, when Sardanapalus (their last K.) imitating the manners, fashions, & behavior of women, offended men so much, that by a iust indignation, for so many men to bee subiect to such a woman, who had no more but the forme of a man; they revolted from him, and constrained him to kill himselfe.

Women then are not capable of succeeding in the kingdom of France, as we haue already approued, that in ancient times (ordinarily) they were not. For out of the fabulous times, there is obserued only a Queene of Saba, and a Cleopatra in Egypt, and so few beside; that their rarity declareth, how contrary a thing it is, violent, and extraordinary to nature. Since the declination of the race and Empire of Charlemagne only, we haue seene in some parts of the Welt, where valour & virility hath failed or relaxed: foueraigne (words and scepters conuerted into distaffes, and by the succession of womē, many the like indignities haue met together in one body. This was that which rayled the houses of Spaine and of Austria, to the greatest they hold: a kinde of encreasing vnknown before, in any other house or foueraignty, because there was no right at all.

When then the Spaniards demand of the French, the prooffe and foundation of the Salique Law; it is fit for themselves to shew the original and beginning of the right for their feminine Crownes, seeing France hath kept the vse of Antiquity, & they haue saile to change among themselves. Which hath bin heretofore obserued and discoursed, by Seigneur Lesclapier, in his Treat of the right of Nature: where he sheweth, that by the right of nature, women stand exempted from succession in the Realm of France. I remember the answer which Licurgus made to one, who discouraged, that the government of many was the best forme of an Estate. Bring it first of all (quoth he) into thine own house. In like manner, to such as will maintain the government of women in kingdoms and great Empires, especially in France: a man may well say, let them begin that establishment in their owne houses. It is by good reason saide, that there is neyther beginning nor writing found for the Salique Law. It is a Law of nature, borne with men, and not written, as Aristotle saith: That whosoever is by right of nature, & by right of people, is not written at all.

Wherto I may adde moreover, that it is the common right of inheritances, which ought by stronger reason to be obserued in Royalty, as being the last and most eminent title of inheritance, and whereon dependeth all the other. So then this right, so naturall, hath euermore beene exactly kept in the estate of France.

Beside, the ancient lawes of the Salians, will not permit, that any part of Salique land or inheritance (that is to say, of lands distributed to the French, in their entering to the Gaules) shall come into the hands of women: but willeth, that it bee wholly left to the males. The same is also ordained in the law of the French Riparians. If this then took place in the succession of particulars, that the lands assigned vnto the French warriors, for recompence of their traualles, and to serue for defence of the Country, should not fall (as one faith) from the Lance to the Distaffe: by how much greater reason then ought we to esteeme, that this should be obserued, in the estate and succession of the kingdome of France, as the sequell of her owne Histories maketh knowne, that it hath bin at all times so held and practised there?

The great Louys or Chlonis had foure Sonnes, who by custome (then) receiued and diuided his Monarchies equally. Childebert the eldest, was king of Paris; Chlothaire of Souffins; Chlodamere of Orleans, and Thierry of Mets. Childebert had two Daughters, the one named Chrodefinda, and the other Chrosberga, as appeareth by the Charter of exemption, of the Abbey of S. Germain des Prez, and by that which Fortunatus, Bishop of Poitiers hath written in his Poems, who addeth, that King Charibert was Tutor to those two daughters. Neuertheless, neither of them succeeded in the kingdome of Childebert their Father: but without all further dispute, it was Chlothaire their Vnkle, as hath in like manner bin obserued by Agnatius the Greeke. Afterward, Charibert the son of Chlonis, had three daughters also, without leauing any male-childe: the one was married to a king of Denmark; the second named Berthebeda, of whom Fortunatus made an Epigram; and the third, called Chrodielda, entred Religion in the Abbey of S. Croffe in Poitiers: so that none of these daughters succeeded their Father, but Sigebert, brother to the deceased king, & that without difficulty or controuersie.

Now if there had bin any means or subiect to worke vpon, it is not to be thought, that the king of Denmark, who had married one of the daughters, could otherwise haue bin remoued. Or if he had bin impeached by power, at least he would haue complained, & the authors of those times could not forget to make mention of it. But they not making any account of the daughters, do report, that Sigebert succeeded his brother Charibert, according to the custome of the Country. Gonthram, King of Bourgogne, brother to Charibert, had but one only daughter, named Klothilda. And yet notwithstanding he inuested and inhiuted his Nephew Childebert in the kingdome of Bourgogne, to enioy it after his death. It is not here to be objected, that hee did it for any ill will he bare to his daughter, or because hee would disinherite her: For by an adle of accord or agreement, made with his Nephew Childebert, transcribed at large by S. Gregory of Tours, who liued in the very times, he stipulated great Lands and Seigneuries for her, declaring well therein his fatherly affection; but because the law of France hindered her succeeding in the Crowne, he aduantaged her otherwise as he found the best means to do. The same may be confirmed by the testimony of many strangers, who do agree in this point, that women are not to succeed in the kingdome of France: the names of whom, as also their authorities, haue beene (for the most part) noted, and collected by a learned man of this time, in an Epistle which he hath written concerning this subiect.

Adgerus, Bishop of Liege, in the life of S. Landaalde, written by him in the year VCCCCLXXX, faith, *Francorum Regni a sui principio semper per infatigabile, &c. Albert of Strasbourg reporteth in his Chronicle: In Francia nullus per foemineam lineam

The ancient custome of the Salians, by which the crown was to be inherited by males, is here observed.

S. Gregory of Tours, who lived in the very times, he stipulated great Lands and Seigneuries for her, declaring well therein his fatherly affection; but because the law of France hindered her succeeding in the Crowne, he aduantaged her otherwise as he found the best means to do.

This point is confirmed by the testimony of many strangers, who do agree in this point, that women are not to succeed in the kingdome of France: the names of whom, as also their authorities, haue beene (for the most part) noted, and collected by a learned man of this time, in an Epistle which he hath written concerning this subiect.

Adgerus, Bishop of Liege, in the life of S. Landaalde, written by him in the year VCCCCLXXX, faith, Francorum Regni a sui principio semper per infatigabile, &c. linea successisse dicuntur. Neuer hath any person succeeded in France by the line of womē.

The Emperor Charles the fourth, Son to John, king of Bohemia, in his life it is thus written. Eodem Anno obiit Carolus Francorum Rex relicta uxore pregnantē, quæ peperit filium. Et cum de consuetudine regni filia non succedant, prout in est Philippus, filius socii mei in Regem Francia. That year (saith he) died Charles, king of France, leauing his wife great with childe, who was deliuered of a daughter. And because by the custome of the kingdome, daughters are not to succeed: Philip, Sonne of my Father in law, was made king of France.

Froissard, a partaker with England writeth thus. Then after the death of K. Charles, the 12 Peeres and Barons of France assembled themselves together at Paris, with all the speed they could make, and gaue the kingdome (by a common consent) to Mesire Philip de Valois, and took it from the Queene of England & her Son, who was left Sister germane to king Charles, by this respect and reason; because they said, that the Realm of France was of so great nobility, as it ought not go by any means to a Female. And indeed, the Q. of England, and Edward her Son, would not go to the contrary: but acknowledged Philip de Valois for legitimate succellour to the kingdome. And that which is more, Edward voluntarily did him homage, in regard of the Dutchy of Guyenne, and the acte of homage was deliberated and aduised by his counsell of England.

Now as concerning that which hapned some while after, warre being moued betwene the two kings, for another cause and enmity excited among the, that Edward tooke on him the Name and Armes of France: this was only done by the inuention of the Flemings, who saide, that they could not aide him, except he would qualifie on himselfe, the name of King of France: because they stood bound by oath, not to beare Armes against the K. of France, on paine of paying two millions of Florins. So that in taking Armes for him against Philip de Valois, and to quit themselves of that payment; Edward gaue them a discharge and quittance, as being K. of France. And yet notwithstanding, the K. of England made difficulty of vnderstanding it, hauing attempted war vpon another subiect, as being Vicar of the Empire, and for recouering the towne of

Cambray, which the King then held. But in the end, to haue the helpe of the Flemings, & their allies, who were most important vpon him: he was induced to take the title of king, & the Armes of France, as may more particularly be seene in the sequell of the history set down by Froissard.

Eliuan de Garibuy y Gamalloa, a Spaniard, speaketh of the very same, saying, *Porque Philip Conde de Valois descendida de la corona Real por linea masculina: fue coronado por Rey di Francia por virtud de la Ley Salica. Al Rey Eduardo por descender de linea de muger, exluyeron de la successiō Real, &c. Aunque todas ellas razones de Eduardo, enaden y escluyeron los Franchescos Ley Salica, que en estos dias y tomando grande rigor y fuerça pararon los siglos futuros. Because Philip, Count of Valois, descended of the Crowne Royall, by the masculine line: he was crowned King of France, by vertue of the Salique law. For king Edward, he being descended by the Mother's line, he stood excluded from the Royall succession, &c. And all the reason alleged by Edward, were euaded & excluded for the French, by the Salique Law, which in those daies was in great force, and continueth also for future times.*

Doctor Baldus on the Pandecks faith, Filia Regis Francorū non succedit in Regno, ex rationabili consuetudine Francorum. The Daughter to the K. of France, succeedeth not at all in the kingdome, by a reasonable custome among the French. Which is also confirmed by Doctor Petrus Iacobi, on the Books of Fiefs or Inheritances, & many other Doctors. This may (by good right) bee registered among the honors, dignities, & preeminences of France. And such as content against it, as willing to impugn such a Law, or call it in doubtfull question; do slenderly conceiue, that the state of their owne Country could neuer pretogate, nor attribute vnto it selfe such a pretogate.

The King of France hath also this great aduantage above others, that he is not on ly Soueraigne, but likewise absolute, with full power & authority truly Royall: which is not common to all Princes, although they be Soueraignes. There are very few or none, but are restrained, either by lawes, or by assemblies of the generall Estates: who therefore cannot tearme themselves absolute, being so subiected, & their power limited. The perfection & height of a royall estate, is, when the Prince or daineth all by his owne will, doth what he would, without any restriction, and being no way answerable for any of his actions. This was the reason, that Aristotle elegantly named such an estate, by the name of tyranny, as one would say, Full and perfect Royalty. And wife Solomon speaking of a true king indeed, saith; He will do what he ever pleaseth him. Where the word of the king is, there is power, and who shall say unto him, What dost thou? This is also of no mean importance for the good government of an estate; be it to relucme more certainly on the affaires; be it to keepe counceils & designs secret; be it for facility, promptitude, and speedines of execution. He that hath such power, especially in actions of war, as the two great warriors Alexander and Cesar had, may sway the Empire of the world. One of them being demanded, how in so short a time, hee had made so many famous conquests: It was (quoth he) by neuer deferring occasion, or rising remissness. And the other was so prompt & ready, as many times he was at his iournies end with his Army, before any newes was heard of his comming. Yea, and in such fort, as enemies felt his figning, before they tooke aduice for his comming. Nor can this be done, if a man depend vpon another, in any manner whatsoever; & the his power is not absolute. The Romanes tooke good acknowledgement hereof, being wont in their very greatestt affaires, & dangers of the estate, were it in peace or war, to create a Magistrate, whom they called Dictatour, with such full power & absolute authority. In breefe, for the gouernement of great estates, and likewise of great affaires, the account can neuer bee well rendred, except it be to one man only. Otherwise, a Prince, although a Soueraigne, can neuer say, as Metellus Numidicus, and as it was after vsed by king Lewes the 11. that if he thought his shirr knew his counsell, he would tear it from his backe and burne it. He that is truly an absolute king, may well vse the aduice of his counceill, in such affaires as present themselves; but in an arrest and resolute, what seems good to himselfe. The excellency of that kingdom, as also of her kings, resulteth yet from two other considerations. One is the long continuance of the estate: a certain prooffe, as well of her good government, as of the supreme and celestiaall fauor. The other, is the antiquity of her race of kings: for to speake truly, there is not any more worthy, no nor more generous blood in the world. Who can in all the kingdomes through the Vniuersitie, shew another the like estate, as firm and stable, as hath continued for 1200. yeares? Who can nominate such a nobility & ancientnes of race, so fairly approued, and in so long succession of so many kings. Since the year 440. according to most certaine History, Meroveus planted the foundation of that Monarchy, and established it to the Gauls: & euen to this instant, the estate hath bin alwaies maintained, and valiantly stood against all violent assaults. In such fort, is the more it hath bin attempted, yea, in very dangerous extremities; then found she herselfe strongest, and more flourishing then before. There is not any thing comparable to such a succession of kings, in all other Realmes, as it will be easily verified.

Moreover, the noblenesse, dignity, and greatness of that royall race, hath received no diminution by those two changes, which historians haue there obscured. Let not Lopez Madera alledge then, that such changes hapned, because France would not admit the regiment of women. For if we regard the side & line feminine, though the succession be not therein; three races finde themselves all vnited with the other. The second of Pepin with the first, as some Chronicles of those times do proue. And that of the Capets which is the third, and reigneth at this present happily with the second, as M. Guillaume de Nangis hath deduced the Genealogy. The which Pope Innocent the 4. in his Decretale, speaking of king Phillip Augustus, full well acknowledged, when he aouched that king to be descended of the race of Charlemaigne.

But beside this, there are other faithfull Authors, who do declare, that the second race is ioynd to the first, by the males side, proceeding from father to sonne, that Pepin was descended in direct line by the males, of Chlogion, K. of the French, before Meroveus, as issued from Altericus, one of the sonnes of Chlogion. And as for the third race, the true originall thereof, was in that noble and so ancient house of Saxony, & of great Vuitichind, king of the Saxons, who made himselfe Christian with his people, & came to dwell in France, in the time of Charlemaigne. He was descended of Signardus,

Be hold the certain succession, Vuitichind the great had another Son cald Vuitichind, & that Vuitichind had another Vuitichind 3. who had to Sonne Rupert or Robert the Strong, Count of Auion, he being slain against the Normans, in the time of Charles the Bauld, king of France, and Emperor.

That Robert the Strong left his Son Otho or Eudo, who was Tutor to king Charles the Simple, and afterward crowned king; as also was his brother Rupert, Father to Hugh the Great, Count of Paris, Sonne in law to the Emperor Otho the first. And by this marriage of Hugh the Great, was born Hugh Capet, established king by the Nobility of France, through default in the legitimate line of Charlemaigne, in the year VCCCCLXXXVII. Since which time, the kingdom hath alwayes beene in the hand of that generous and flourishing Lineage, excelling still more and more, and reigning to perpetuity.

Next hereunto, there commeth also to our consideration, the admirable and heroyicall vertues of the kings of France, which hath mounted their glory vp vnto heauen, & made them known through all the Cantons of the earth. But to forbear the most ancient warriors, the affright & terror of the Romanes, Afcaricus, Gaisa, Marcomir, Sunnio, Mellaubodes, and Chlogion: what a warrior was Meroveus, the founder of that Monarchy in Gaule? This was the man, who (in despite of the Romanes, and such a mingle-mangle of barbarous people, scattered and dispersed by the Gauls) planted there his Standards, and made himselfe absolute Lord of one part. And as for Attila king of the Hunnes, that caused himselfe to be cald, The scourge of God: he came to rauage France, as hee had done all other Prouinces, where hee had past. The wife Actus, Governour to what then remained of the Romanes in Gaule, was perwaded, that he was not able, nor all the barbarous people releagued with him, to endure the furious and fearefull shock, of that huge thunderbolt of war. But made his recourfe to the vertue of the French, and to their great Meroveus, to fight against the furious entrance of the Hun. V. herin behad good success, for the pride of Attila was sooner rebat-

ted on the Cathalman plaines, by great Meroveus, who put to the edge of the sword, that dreaded masse and number of enemies.

Alas, there is no roome here, in a work of no larger circumference, to recount the goodly deeds, and actes heroyicall, well deseruing eternall memory, of all the kings that haue reigned in France: for many great volumes can hardly containe them. So high an ascending subiect, deferred to meete with such Writers, as can as worthily set down in writing, what these kings did boldly and vertuously performe. Beside, the abundance of matter, and dignity of the subiect, would afford them fearfull of ground, and trouble them with a thousand difficulties. It is a subiect much more great, then the wars and encounters of petty Townes and Villages in Greece, banded the one against the other: which neuertheless, by the learning & eloquence of such, as haue attempted to write thereof, are become so much celebrated, and thought worthy of immortality. But Frenchmen, who haue established this Monarchy, contenting themselves with the glory and honour of well doing, care little for any pride of the Pen, adding themselves rather, to execute high & hardy enterprises, the to set down in writing those of others, much lesse of themselves.

Neuertheless, though destitute of such exquisite meanes, whereby to mount to immortality: yet it hath so well falne out, that all their faire actions haue not bin verily buried, nor forgotten. But in stead of a worthy Histori, admiration hath thrust into the mowthes of all people, to know and speake of them; disfluering it so from hand to hand, euen to such as dwell in the remotest Climates, familiarly acquainting them with their manners. And in dedee, there are to be found more testimonies of French vertue, in the Histories, Memories, and Annals of strangers, then in their owne. I will therefore leaue that labour to others, that can better acquit themselves thereof, if I touch any thing, it shall bee but in my passage along, and onely to make a light demonstration.

It hath bin obserued for an ancient saying, That all the good kings might be enclodged within the Beazallor Collet of a small king. But this saying cannot hold in France, hath euermore met with good kings, most excellent and most vertuous: having bin alwayes happy therein, as in all other things. I will call then vnto you diuine spirits, & generous foules, who haue sometime swayed that Monarchy; to the ende, that being put on by your inspiration, I may, if not worthily sing your merites, yet (at least) figure forth to life some par of them.

Next to Great Meroneus, who first established himselfe in France, repulst the Hunnes, and ouercame King Attila, the horrore and the whippe of the world, account is to be made of that Chlovis or Lo-uis, who possessed himselfe throughly of the Gauls, and vterly exterminated the Romanes name. This was the quayer of the Romanes and Germanes, and he that expulst so quickly the Goths beyond the Pyrennean Mountaines, and made them thinke, that hardly could they get ground enough to flee away vpon, or where to hide themselves from his victorious arm. The Goths hauing offended him many times, and broken all agreements made: this Prince vnderooke war against them, to chastise them, and purge the Gauls of such a people, as eagerly followed the error of Arius, and laboured to plant it euery yeare.

When as the two Armies were met together, somewhat neere to Poitiers, the battaile was giuen, wherein the Goths were wholly ruined, and driuen away in rout. Historians do adde hereto, that the King of the Goths, being named Alarick, was met withall in the fight by King Chlovis, and fighting hand to hand, hee smote him downe dead to the ground. This is the selfe-same Prince, who (first of all the French) embraced Christian Religion, whereof both he and his successors were alwayes afterward true protectors and defenders. He was the most redoubted of all the kings in the world, and of whom the Emperor Anastatius, Theodorick the Ostrogothe, and the Visigoths of Spaine made no meane account; were it in admiration of his vertue, or were it for feare, they thought themselves very happy, to haue peace and friendship with him, seeking it by diuersity of Ambassadors, & by plenty of most exquisite gifts.

His Sonnes Childebert, Chlothaire, Chlodamire, and Thierry, as heires to his crowne, and likewise to his valour and piety, made themselves admirable & dreadful to strangers. Childebert, induced thereto, by horrible persecutions inflicted on the Orthodox Christians, as also by the bad and vnworthy viage offered to his Sister, by Almarick her husband, King of the Visigoths in Spaine, who seuerly maintained the Arrian heresie: passed with his Army into Spaine, quailed & ouercame the powers of the Goths, wonne diuers Cities by assault, and at length took Tolledo, cheefe of all, ruining it in ranged battaile, where also was slaine Almarick their king; returning triumphantly into France, hauing added to his Empire, the very greatest part of Spaine. Afterward the three Brethren together, wholly ouerthrew the estate of the Bourguignons. And soone after, the emperor Iustinian, making warre on the Goths of Italy, the Goths made recourse to Theodebert, king of Mett, and youngest Sonne to Chlovis, who defended them for a good space of time, giuing such prooffe to the Greekes, of vertue in the French, that Iustinian was constrained to compound with the french, as Historians (on his own side) do testifie.

In this first race, there was also Chlothaire, who by his victorious arms, wholly subdued Germany, and vanquished the vnconquerable Saxons. On a day, the two Armies being somewhat neere each to other, and the Riuer Vifurgis running betwene them, this Chlothaire being on horse-backe and well armed; espied Bertoldus, Duke of the Saxons, in like furnishment on the Riuers other side. Alone & without attending for any other troops, suddenly he crossed ouer the Riuer, to encounter and fight with his enemy; who betaking himselfe to flight, he pursued after with all possible speed, and hauing ouertooke him, fought with him, and left him dead on the ground. So returning victorious backe againe, bearing his enemies head in his hand, he found his people much offended, because they had neglected to follow him. He left Dagobert his Sonne to be his Successor, a worthy heire both to his estate and valour, as also excelling in piety and deuotion, as many Churches richly founded and builded by him can well testifie.

Hauing finished the first race, wee come to the second, wherein let vs consider first of all, the cheefe man thereof,

Charles Martel, Prince of the French; whose name remaineth engrauen (peculiarly) in memorie of all the people of Europe, for beeing their conseruator, in warranting them from the certaine yoke and seruitude of the Sarazins. It was then when the Arabian Sarazens (holding all Africa) passed into Spaine with very final troops: where finding but slender resistance, the Spaniards and Goths bequeathing themselves, as ingulft in all pleasures and delights, and no way addicted to the exercise of Armes, became immediately Masters of all Spaine. This victory and conquest drew on thither Millions of Moors and Sarazins, and in so great number, that Spaine being no longer able of comprehending them, they made account of pasing further on, euen to run thorow all Europe, and quite to exterminate Christian Religion.

Into France they entred with a most dreadfull Army, lacking and spoyling all that they met with, and passed on so farre as Tours, seeming, as if there were no force or power great enough, that could resist or stay the course of their conquests. All people and Christian Princes, were full of feare and terror, and (in a worde) Europe had vterly bene vndone: if this Charles Martel had not then bene present neere or before the City of Tours, making there a barre of his body and French forces. Hauing giuen them battell with so few French as then were with him: hee ouercame and merely hewed them in pieces, to the number of three hundred, threecore, and fiftene thousand Sarrazins. After this, being aduertised that there were yet other great troops, towards Aquibona and Auignon; hee went thither to finde them, & in another daies good successe, wholly ouercame them, & left not a man liuing. So that it appeareth by iust records, that there were slaine in all, seuen or eight hundred thousand: in regard whereof, the fir-name of Martel was giuen him. Thus did he dissipate this dangerous tempest, wherewith all Christendome was threatned, and ready to be confounded.

This also gaue good ease to the Spaniards, who were scattered in Spaine, fled & hidden in the Asturian mountains. So that he might wel be named, & in good right, the Buckler, Hammer, Sharpe sword and Rampier of Christendome. But for him, Europe had now bin the feate of Calixtus and Miramolines. In stead of adoration giuen to the true God, the name of prophane Mahomet, and his execrable Alcoran should haue bene here preached. The Saxons, who were Pagans then, and not capable, but to giue offence to a peaceable king, by their reuolts and wonted seditions; could they haue bin any hindrance? The Germanes, diuided into many small Principalties, and gouerned (for the most part) by the kings of France, could they haue resisted? In Italy there were but the Lombards, who in the space of a most two hundred yeares, could not become Masters of all Italy, neyther conquer any more but a part, which their first king Alboin obtained at a clap, euen when they first entred. The rest was so miserably tormented, by the courses and piracies of the Sarrazins: as the poore inhabitants knew not where to hide themselves. The Empire of Constantinople remained, hauing worke enough to do, to keepe herselfe within her owne small bounds and limits: beeing pursued by the Arabes and Mahometanes of the East. Questionlesse, the Christian name had bene extinct, had it not pleased God to serue himselfe with the victorious arme, and courage innumerable of this French Prince, to conserue his faithfull seruants to glorify his name.

This was the same Prince, of whom it was said, That hee affected rather to command Kings, then to bee a King himselfe; which was engrauen on his Toombe in these teames.

Non vult Regnare, sed Regibus imperat ipse.

Thus initiated by the Virgil of France.

This was Great Martel, Prince of the French, Not King in name, but a Master of Kings.

Much more to be esteemed heerein, then he that saide, Hee affected rather to command them that had Golde, then to haue any himselfe. Because the palseion and feruour which is borne to honor, and which seateth it selfe willingly in the souls of the most generous; is much more quaint, tickling and violent, then is the desire and thirst after riches. Christendome) being such, the Church hauing no other prop nor succour, every one fixing their eyes on him; Pope Gregory the third sent him the chaines of Saint Peter, and the keyes of the Sepulcher, committing himselfe and the whole Romane Church into his protection, to be warranted, not only against inuasion of Sarrazens, but also against the continual courses of the Lombards, wherewith hee had bene afflicted beyond all extremitie.

*Pepin, King of France, son to Charles Martell, wonne not a ior lesse glory by his haughty deeds of Armes. This was hee that danted the Aquitanians, and them of Bavaria, ouercoming them in diuers batailles, and likewise the reuolted Saxons. Soone after, being called for succor by Pope Stephen, to defend the Romane Church (vexed more then euer) and oppressed by Astolpho, King of the Lombards, he went with all diligence, & constrained Astolpho (who felt his power not equal to his) to flye, and shut himselfe vp in Pavia his Capitall City, where hee besegged him, and could not raise his siege vntill hee hadde made an aduantageable composition for the Pope, with whom he left many French souldiers for his further assurance. This composition being afterward broken by the perfidie of Astolpho, Pepin returned thither againe, and besiedged him the second time; compelling him to surrender the Exarquate of Rauenne, and many other places, which he gaue vp to the Romane Church. And returning home into France, hee found there the Ambassadors of Constantine, Emperor of Constantinople, who bringing him many goodly presents, came onely to request his alliance.*

But what can we speake of more admiration, then his sonne Charles, to whom (by good night, and for his high deserts) the whole Vniuersie, by one consent gaue the fir-name of Great? Hee attempted, maintained, conducted, and brought to end, ten or twelue seuerall warres, all of most great importance & difficulties in all kindes; as well in regard of the places, as for the great multitude and strength of the enemies, against whom hee warre to deate. First, against the Aquitaniens and Basques or Gascogons, a mercurious strong people; yet after many outrageous, hee ranged them vnder his obedience.

Next, another warre against the Lombards, who hauing violated the Articles of peace; which had bene couenanted with them by King Pepin, Father to this Charles; they infested and tormented the Romane Church, without the least breathing or respite. Which was the reason that this Prince, as pious and iust, as valiant, vnderooke (according to the ordinary vse of the French Kings) the defence of the holy See, ouercoming & ruinating the Lombards from the toppe to the bottom. He also besiedged Didier their king, tooke, and led him captiue into France, where ended the kingdom of the Lombards in Italy, and whereby he augmented and enlarged his owne estate. Thus hee purchased rest to the Pope, and beside enriched the Romane Church, giuing it no meane part of his Conquests, and increasing the patrimony of S. Peter.

Hee attempted warre also against the Sarrazins, passed into Spain to fight with them, where he soyled them in many encounters, enforcing them to hide themselves in Towns, which hee besiedged and wonne away from them, so that he conquered a great part of Spain, chasing the Sarrazins thence, and continued warre alwayes ther afterward against them, which gaue no small ease vnto the Spaniards, who were mightily oppressed and ouerburdened before.

Then he made an expedition into Italy, against the reuolted Lombards and Italians. Many the like into Germany, against the Bavarians, the Danes, Bohemians, Sclauonians, and Vuinides, all warlike people, and whom hee conquered. Also against the Hunnies, an vndaunted people, after they had gotten habitation in Pannonia, vnder the conduct of Attila their King: yet he vanquished them, and hewed them in peeces in many fought batailles, plucking out of their throats the spoiles of Europe, which they had enjoyed and triumphed ouer for so many yeares. And there he found such wealth and abundance of riches, as the very simplest souldiour in the Camp, was wonderfully rich for euer after.

Furthermore, he had no meane meddling with the Saxons, against whom hee had warre for the space of three and thirtie yeares: they being a people that could neuer

neuer liue nor abide in quiet, reuolting incessantly, especially when they knew this Prince to be farre off from them, & troubled in some other places. Hee added to his owne estate Gascogny, a great part of Spain, Saxony, and the Pannonias; restraining to powerfully the ordinary courses of the Sarrazins, as all Europe liued quietly vnder his reigne. Beside, hee was so redoubted, loued, and admired altogether by forraigne Kings, that Aaron, Califfe of the East, who held (well-neere) all Asia, and was feared by all the greatest Kings: sought for his friendship, and sent him rare presents at diuers times, auouching him to be the most worthy King in the whole world. And although this Califfe was rude and harsh vnto Christians, that dwelt in his countries; yet notwithstanding, he forbore to persecute them, in consideration of Charlemagne, to whom he gaue the City of Ierusalem, by sending him the keyes thereof, as also them of the holy Sepulcher.

The Emperours of Constantinople also did so esteeme, loue, and honor him, that oftentimes they lent him rich giftes by their Ambassadors, creding nothing more, then to haue any contending in warre against him. In like manner, Alphonse King of Gallicia, and of the Asturias, would call himselfe no other, but with this qualification towards Great Charles, His humble and faithfull Subject, wholly to him; Proprius suus in Latine, as Eginhard hath recorded.

But what can be thought more admirable, or tearmed to bee a matter more rare, then in a Prince that was so stout a warrior, all other ciuill vertues and most humane, should haue an equal meeting together? Singular clemency did euer more accompany his victorious arme. The same Eginhard reporteth, that hee could not be enforced to choller, by any occasion whatsoever. Nay, he would neuer yeeld, that one of them which had attempted against his life and State, should be put to death; but onely was contented with their safe keeping. In his victory against the Lombards, hee did not onely pardon Paulus Warnefridus, Deacon of Aquileia; but also kept him neere about his person, greatly honouring and gratifying him, for the esteeme of his erudition and knowledge.

This Lombard was vnworthy of so great grace, in conspiring afterward with other Rebels, and vling treason against his King and Benefactor. VWho neuertheles, after he had discovered the conspiracy, & surmounted all that the reuolts could do, againe hee pardoned this Paulus Warnefridus, being no way willing, that he should be punished for his perfidie and rebellion. Onely hee commanded his retirement, and banished him (for a while) to a certaine place. Afterward hee brake the bounds of his banishment, and fledde to Ragajus, Duke of Benevento, to excite him also to reuolt. An occasion, whereby the king was councelled, greediously to punish both the one and other for this double treason. Yet the good Prince would lend no care thereto, but iured & pardoned both their liues: onely hee charged Paulus Warnefridus, to write the History of the Lombards, the continuation of Europe, and some other works.

This was not only a light punishment, but honourable also to him that had the charge thereof: where, beside a most singular example of clemency, appeared an admirable affection vnto learning, for that onely respect, to loue and honor the man, who had so often falne into treason. Such was the loue & great account which he made of learning; and himselfe, albeit liuing in an age vngracious enough, & full of barbarisme, yet did hee speake Latine elegantly, and his mother tongue so readily, even with naturall eloquence and admirable perswasion: hee vnderstoode Greeke also, but spake it hardly. Beside, he was well seene in all the Sciences, hauing Alcinus to bee his Schoole-master. All dinner while, hee caused one to discourse, or reade ancient Histories: where in he tooke no meane pleasure, but moulded thereafter the forme of his owne life.

No lesse was he to bee commended for his iustice, careful for rendering it to his Subjects with all sincerity: himselfe taking knowledge of such causes as concerned any difficulty, vndertaking the defence and protection of VVidowes, Orphanes, and other miserable people, to warrant them against all oppressions of the mighty. Hauing also established many good Lawes and Ordinances, for the rooting vp of vices, and furtherance of iustice.

office. In regard of his piety and singular deuotion, hee made sufficient apparance thereof, as remaineth witnessed to this day in strange Countreys, by his wealthy foundation of Churches and Monasteries. He was ordinarily present at solemn prayers in the Church, and at all Canonick houres, euen in the night time. Great care had hee, that diuine seruice should be honourably celebrated, & the Churches well serued, despending great summes of money, to haue them fitted and furnished with all convenient rich Ornaments, and matters to them belonging.

Hee caused five Councells to be called & held for the good of the Church.

Moreouer, he was somewhat proud and curious, that the church should be beautified and shining by the probity, integritie, and sanctitie, expressed in the liues of the Ministers, and Ecclesiasticall persons to them appertayning. Being alwayes heerein fo carefull, and for establishment of the better order, that hee caused five Councelles to be called and holden, and collecting the Decrees of them, made the to be published & obserued: holding nothing in more great recommendation, then to see the Church honoured, and flourishing in all holines. He was liberrall vnto all men, especiallie to the poore, as well of his owne Kingdome, whom hee mercifully releued: as also in strange countreies, whereto hee sent rich Almes; alwayes coueting friendship with the Easterne Kinges, to asuage the persecutions of poore Christians.

Charlemaign

of Ambition.

But aboue all the rest, one thing seemeth very strange, that Ambition could neuer gette footing in the soule of this Prince, although it had bene, and is, a frequent and ordinary disease, in the very greatest courages, and most generous spirits. For, although hee was crowned Emperor of the East at Rome, by Pope Leo the third, vpon the cries and acclamations of the Roman people, who both desired and elected him: yet let mee tell ye, it was so farre from any feare or proceeding thereto in him, as hee knew nothing thereof, neither euer gaue his consent thereto. For Eginhard assureth, hauing heard himselfe to confirme it, that if hee had knowne the purpose of the Pope and people; he would not haue gone into the Church on Christmasse day, in the yeare VCCC. when that acclamation, election, and cotation was performed. It was a thing so much against his minde, and whereof hee made such slender reckoning. Hee dyed at the age of threescore and eleuen yeares, hauing reigned seuen and forty yeares. And, at his height of humane felicity, hee left his Sonne Lewes his successor, and heyre to his vertues, who for his exceeding great mildenesse and meekenesse, deturued the sur-name of Pious, or the Debonnaire.

The death of Charlemaign

In his yong yeares, his Father made him King of Aquitaine, where he carryed himselfe in such sort, gouerning so wisely and with such discretion, that such prudence and vertue was highly admyred, especially in those tender yeeres. Himselfe rendered iustice to his subiectes, attending thereon three dayes in euery weeke. Hee vied great iudgement for well choosing men of worth and merite, to vndergoe places of important charge, as Officers and Magistrates. Hee eased the people so much as pssibly hee could, in taking away harde Tributes and Subsidies, and moderating others, euen in the mildest manner.

Charles the Debonnaire
succeeded his Father Char-
lemaigne.

And yet notwithstanding, hee was a good Warriour, not onely in defending & safe keeping his owne Frontiers: but also proceeding very farre into Spain, to make warre vpon the inuading Sarrazins, whom hee foyled in many battels, encounters, & besiedgings of Citties conquered by him, hauing maintained and enlarged the lids of his Father Charlemaigne, which hee had wonne in Spain. So that by his Vertues, wise carriage and deportment, hee gaue a wonderful contentment to his Father. Hee succeeded him in the kingdome of France, and in the Empire of the East. He continued warre against the Sarrazins in Spain, & weakened them in such sort, that hee gaue good means to the Spanishe Christians, to defend themselves against them and to extend their territories farther off. Marinus Siculus, who wrote the historie of Spain, declareth the expeditions of this French Emperour, reporting moreouer, that he imposed a tribute on the people, which were conquered and subiected by him in Spain: where he was cald in the dayes of this Author Romanus Janos.

of the West towards Germany, and valiantly imbarred the courtes of the Northerly people, from their manifold inuasions. And neuer could any defect or vice be noted in him: but that he was too good, too humane and debonnaire. His piety, zeale, and deuotion towards God and his Church was such, as neuer in any man was obserued greater. Forty dayes before his decesse, hee tooke no other foode, but the blessed Communion onely, which hee receiued with wonderful humility, and extraordinary contrition: continuing alwayes in prayer, or causing to be sung in his presence and hearing the Ecclesiasticall offices.

Come we now to the third race, the cheefe whereof was Hugh Capet, yssued from the house of Saxony; who happily reigned, and wisely gouerned his Kingdome, with much piety and iustice. His Sonne Robert, with like piety and integrity of life, loued Learning, and was earnestly addicted thereto, that hee himselfe composed sundry Books: and among the rest, he wrote many goodly & pious Hymns, which were receiued, and are yet (at this present) sung in the Church. Of him it is thus credibly reported, & being (at a certain time) mockt by an ignorant Duke, because hee sung in the Church among Ecclesiasticall persons, hee made him this answer: That he better affected to see a King learned, then an Ass crowned, making his allusion vnto the Duke, who ware his Dukall Crowne on that solemn day.

Hee was very pittifull, and a great Almoner on the poores behalfe; so that when hee tooke his owne repast, great troopes of poore people were admitted to be about him, whom hee would suffer freely to come neere him, and gaue vnto them that foode which was left there before him, & many other things that they stood in neede of. Nor was hee a iotte lesse liberrall to Churches, in causing many to be builded, founded, and endowing them bountifullly, as also re-establishing and enriching others. There was no want in him likewise of all other royall vertues, maintaining and conferring his estate very wel, and making the people happy, that were vnder his obedience.

I am feigne to passe ouer others, to come to King Lewes the sixth, surnamed Le

Gras, a true imitator of his Auncestours vertues. Hee employed all his life time, to containe his people in peace and quietnesse, and (according to the durie of a good King) to shield them from oppression of the greatest & most potent Earles and Barons of France, who flood then vpon very peremptory termes. Which made him to attempt diuers ways against them vpon that occasion, and oftentimes expose his life to dangers, preferring the well-fare of his people, before all other considerations whatsoeuer, and so hee well witnessed from time to time.

After hee had chafished and raunged all such as had reuolted, flying from him vpon the like occasions, and was become feared, respected, and obeyed of all the Rebels, as also beloued of all his subiects, the Emperor Henry the fifth, being departed from Germany with a mighty & dreadful Army, to ouer-run him and his country, he went to meet him nere to Rhemes, hauing but a handfull of men with him. But he so affrighted the Emperor Henry, and all the potent Army with him, that fearing the valour and inuincible arme of the French, whose courage will giue way to nothing whatsoeuer: he thought it farr better for him to quit the place, & get him gone, then to hazard his estate against so valiant a King, though hee was attended but with so small a troope. And so this Emperor made his retreat, at the very noyle of the Kings comming, whose name (indeed) was very dreadful.

This Prince also excelled in Piety and Religion, vertues proper to the Kings of France: being the true props, supports, and Bulwarks to the Church. For we reade, that in his time, Pope Paschall the second came into France for refuge, and to consult with the Galllicane church, concerning those differences which hee hadde with the Emperor. And afterwards, the Popes Calixtus the second, Honorius the second, and Innocentius the second, being tormented and expelled by the Emperors of Germany, and brought to great misery, yet succoured in that kingdome, their ordinary retreat and refuge. Hee entertained them honourably, assisting them with riches, respecting them worthily & royally. In the end, hauing succoured them to his utmost power, hee tooke pains to pacify those discords and contentions.

Something more I may adde concerning his death, as it is let downe by Suggerus, Abbot of Saint Denis, his principall friend, and an eye-witnesse thereof. Feeling the end of his life approaching, & the holy Eucharist being brought to him, he arose out of his bed to meete it, falling downe on his knees, and receiving it with great deuotion. Hauing before taken order for al his affaires, and made both profession of his faith, and confession of his finnes, in the hearing of all there present. Afterward, being taken forth of his bed againe, & laid vpon akes dispersed abroad he gaue vp the ghost.

His Sonne Lewes the seuenth, called, The Youthfull, was a true resember of his Father, hauing ioyned piety and valiancy together. By the counsell of S. Bernard, he made a voyage into Palestine to helpe it with a puissant Army, against the inuasion of the Turkes. And hauing obtained many great victories against the enemies of the Christian Faith, he returned home to his Kingdome, pressed by the discomforts of Famine, where-with his Armie was very fore afflicted, thorough the disloyalty of the Emperor of Constantinople.

Philip Augustus, during the Conqueror, came to the Crown at 14. yeares of age.

VVho can sufficiently admire the valor and good guidance of Philip Augustus, who (by good right) also carried the surname of Conqueror? At the age of foure-teen years, he tooke into his hand the reines of the State, and in that tender age performed all exploits and actions, not onely of valiancy, but also of a great and perfect Captaine; watching & spending whole nights, to execute and accomplish his enterprizes. By which meanes, hee out-stept his enemies, tooke Towns and strong places, where himselfe would be seene in person at the scalado, yea, and at the assault at the breake of day, instead of addicting himselfe to pleasures, whereto his youth might rather haue induced him. He so vanquished his enemies, and chastised rebels in so tender yeares, as if hee had bin another Alexander.

The English
incited to armes, against Philip Augustus.

Afterwards, the English being prouoked against him, gaue the better and more worthy subiect to his victories: for he conquered and tooke from them all that they held in France, weakening them in diuers battailes, and famous encounters. Also this Conqueror, incited by the same piety of his Ancestors, made a voyage to the Holy Land; where he fought diuers times against the Turkes and Sarazins, and carryed many triumphes from them. Being returned home to France, he wonne that great day of Bouines, neere vnto Tournay, which I will touch a little more largely in this place, it being scarcely known, though (indeed) it was most signale and famous. For this king fought in that bartel, against the forces of the Emperour Otho the fift, the King of England, the Earles of Flanders, Hennault, and Bologne, all coniuured against his estate.

The great day of Bouines
neere Tournay.

Those Earles being reuoked and leagued with the King of England, had likewise caused the emperor Otho the fift, to come into France, with a very great and puissant army of Germanes and Saxons. VVith them were ioyned the Forces of Flanders, Hennault, and other French subiects and vassals, associated with the Earl of Bologne. The King went on before with his Army, and met the enemy somewhat neere to Tournay, where he had Lodged him aloft in a place for his best aduantage: which the King hauing well perceiued, & that he was frustrate of all meanes for coming at them on that side, resolved to fetch a further course about, and to assaile them on the other side.

The manner of the business proceeding

Emperour and confederates,
against the K.
of France.

Being withdrawne to effect this intent, the Emperor Otho taking it for a flight, did cause his army to march on with speed to ouertake the King, who was encamped in a village called Bouines. There he had intelligence how the enemy was come very neere, and the noyse of their armes gaue appearance, that they would fall in hande presently with them, and charge the reerguard: all which notwithstanding, before hee would doe any thing else, hee entred first into a Church, and there sayde his Prayers.

The English
about to lose his army in readines.

Afterward, being armed, hee mounted on horse-backe, giuing order for the Armies readinesse, riding thorough the ranks, for the better disposition of his people; yet nothing at all was done that day. On the morrow morning, hauing againe ranged his Army in battaile array, hee gaue his people a Kingly encouragement, by breecely acquainting them with these circumstances: That they were to fight with one, who was an enemy vnto God and Men, come to lend a strong hand hand to Rebels, leading an army that had no other wages then sacriledges, spoiles of the Churches goods, and the blood & teares of the poore. Therefore they were to consider, that God had brought them thither, to punish their iust deseruings, & had choosen the French for the instrument of his iustice. Hee further aduised his soldiers, that they should not labor to buckler the bodies one of another: but euerie man to do for himselfe the best he could, without any eye or respect to his friend and companion.

The King of France first marcheth his armie against the enemy.

Hauing animated them with such or the like speeches, he caused his Army first to march on, assailling and sharply leuing on that of the enemy. The French Chualiers, after they had broken their Lances, came to handy-blowes, fighting with all the heate and valour could be deuised: throwing themselves into the middell of the maine battell, piercing and paking through the thickest battalions, hewing in peeces, and ouerthrowing all that durst meete them. Great was the resistance, & wonderfull deeds of Armes performed on either side. The King was alwaies the most forward man, rushing into the greatest throngs; and where the fight was fiercest, to succour his people. Hee found himselfe enuironed with a huge battalion of enemies, where hee sharply layed about him on all sides, and cleared his passage still as he rode on. But in the end, his horse being slaine between his legges fell downe vpon him; yet he was quickly remounted againe by a French knight, called Sir Peter de Triflan, who gaue him his owne horse.

The King's horse being slaine, hee
was remounted by Sir Peter
de Triflan.

Now charged hee the enemy more fiercely then before, his strength & courage being redoubled at the indignation of his fall, nor ceased he with his French Lords, who neerely followed him, vntill he came to the very midd, where the Emperor Otho was, he being then very hucly assailed.

The Emperor enforced to turne his backe.

Heere did hee meet with many French Knights, who being on foot, some tooke hold on his bridle, others hung about the neck and maine of his horse to slay him, which compelled him to turne his backe. But the Count Reignald de Bologne, hee would not budge a foote from the field of battell, but continued there & his followers valiantly fighting, euen to all extremities, willing (by no means) to yeeld himselfe, till in the end, his horse being slaine vnder him, and hee fore wounded, his throate threatened to bee cut by a Villaine, he yeelded himselfe to Lorde Guarin, a Knight of Saint Johns of Ierusalem, and elected byshop of Senlis, one of the principall Captains for the King, saying, I had rather yeeld my selfe, and be iudged by the King and his Peeres, then to dye unworthily by the hand of a slaue.

The noble
wordes of Count Reignald of Bologne.

So the field of battaile remained vnto the King, as also the victorie full & wholly, all the enemies being broken and scattered, a great part of them slaine, and very many taken prisoners, euen of the chieffest men. The King would permit none to pursue the Emperor, who fledde with the Count of Brabant, and many Germanes further off then two or three Leagues. Among the prisoners, was Ferrand Earle of Hennault, Nephew to the Queen, Countesse of Flanders, and Daughter vnto the King of Portugall. Shee being a medler with Magical Sciences, would needes consult with her Diuiners, concerning the successe of this Battaille, and it vvas tolde her, That the King should be layde on the ground, without any Sepulcher: And that Ferrand Earle of Hennault, her Cosine, should enter Paris in Triumph. All vvhich was true, but farre off from her interpretation.

The Countesse of

gards.

It is also faithfully reported, that the King before the fight, in presence of all his Earles, Barons, and Lords (knowing full well that some were tottering and vncertaine, as being not thorowly affected to him) tooke the Crowne from off his head, and set it vpon an Altar, standing by him, saying in this manner. If there bee any man heere amongst yee, that thinke more capably and worthily of himselfe, then this day to fight for libertie, being in such danger, both to the Honour and Renowne of France: let him willingly leaue and forsake this Crowne, and that man (whosoever hee bee) let him boldly put this Crowne vpon his head. Wherat all of them standing amazed, and being moued with admiration and enflamed affections, threw themselves before his seete, saying; That they were all his humble seruants, and that they would cury one of them dye with him that day, rather then be commanded by any other.

Another victory won the same day against the English.

Lewes the 8. Sonne & Successor to Philip Augustus.

Lewes the 9. Sonne & Successor to Philip Augustus.

The victory at Taillebourg on the River Charante in Poitou.

His famous expedition against the Turkes and Sarrazins.

The selfe-same day of this great victory, Monseigneur Lewes de France, eldest Son to the King; wonne another against the English, in the Country of Amou, at La Roche du Mayne, against the King, called John without Land. For this double victory, obtayned both in one day, the King rendred thanks to God: and desiring that some mark might remain for a Trophie thereof to all posterity, hee caused an Abbey to be builded neere to Senlis, which (in that respect) he named, The Abbey of Victory, and endowd it with great revenues.

I can hardly stay at Lewes the eight, Son to this King, and Successor in his vertues, wherein he seconded him living, and partaked in many of his expeditions and enterprizes. But reigning so short a time after his Father; I must come to the King, called S. Lewes, whose piety, religion, and sanctity of life, hath sufficiently commended him to all men, & acknowledged him by quality, worthy the name of Saint. But that which is to be reckoned as a matter most rare, is, that he excelled no lesse in all other vertues, both Military & Politique. He brought about many warres, wherein still he had a finger, and performed worthy exploits of Armes: beeing most valiant of his person, & a very wise Capraine.

Hee toyled and droue in disorder a great Army, wherein was the King of England, and the Countes de la Marche, and de Lusignan, at Taillebourg, on the River Charante in Poitou. Where having gotten before, with very fewe people, to winne a Bridge, long time he endured all the stratagems of the enemies Army, which was in number a hundred to one: yet hee performed so much by his valiancy, that his Army had leysure for their passage, whereby the enemies were defeated, a great number slaine, many taken prisoners, some say foure thousand, and the rest were disperfed and driuen to flight.

No where can be found more famous deeds of Armes, or any actions more generouse, then his kingly expeditions against the Turkes and Sarrazins, where he wonne the best in many foughten batailles, hazarding his owne person, and exposing himselfe to all dangers, even in the cheefest heate of fight, running where he saw the enemy strongest, and his owne followers in any distresse. So that wherefoever he went, hee made all to giue him way, none being able to withstand him; but gave place to the greatnelle of his courage, and strength of his powerfull arme. The Lord of Jouinville, an eye-witnesse thereof, speaking of one day among others, vied these very words.

And bee you very certaine, that that day the King performed most high deedes of Armes, more then ever I saw in all the Batailles wherest I have bene present. And one side after the Bataille, that if it had not bene for his person, wee had all bene utterly lost and slaine that day. And surely, I can no other wise imagine, but at the very instant, his vertue and strength was doubled on him by the grace of God. For he feared not a tote to thrust himselfe into the dangers and perils of the battaile: and where he saw his people in any distresse, there he laide most about him to helpe them, deliuering so many blowes with his Sword and Battle-Axe, as none of the Turkes durst come neere him. The Lord of Courtney, and Messire John de Salony reported to me, that they saw sixe Turkes (the same day) preparing towards the King, and baddely forcibly laide hold on the bridle of his Horse, intending to leade him away. But the vertuous Prince, seeing the danger wherein hee was, strove with all his might, and (in meere height of courage) laide such loadning strokes upon the Turkes which ledde him, so that hee alone freed himselfe from them.

In another place the same Lord relateth, that the king vnderstanding how the Earl of Amou his Brother was engirt & hemd in with enemies, yea, and in such extremity, as hee had no meanes to get out from them; hee gallowed immediately to rescue him. And (saith he) without carrying for any man, gaue the Spurs to his horse, his Sword in his hand, & rushed mainly into the battaile, charging the Turkes and Sarrazins heavily, untill he came to the place where his Brother was. But at his arrivall, God knowes what paines he tooke, and how many worthy deeds of Armes hee did: for it is most certaine, that where hee saw the greatest danger, and presse, there he bestowed himselfe without any feare. So that by his admirable provesse, he brought his Brother out of danger, and droue the Sarrazins to flight, chasing them quite out of their owne Host of Army.

The King of France elected to be Soldan of Egypt.

In chap. 33. of his Booke.

Another day, speaking how the King was ready to assaile the enemy, & exhorted his followers to all forwardnesse; His Helme (saith he) was richly gilded, and in his hand he held a sword of Germanie, readily drawne. But let me tell yee, that I neuer saw a more goodly man then he was, for hee appeared above all the rest, by the height of his head and shoulder: and it is a thing hardly to be credited, how chearefully all the Soldiours were encouraged to the battaile, when they but looked on the King in that manner. So that many Knights, without attending for the King, mingled themselves amongst the Turkes, and there assayed them courageously. The King would alwayes be the foremost, and when he came neere to the Turkes, the battaile beganne so fiercely, as it was a matter marvellous to behold. And that verie day, there were far more worthy actions of Armes performed, as well on the one side, as the other, as neuer had bene observed in all the voyages beyond the Seas. For no man drew a Dart, an Arrow, nor other Artillery: but all of them fought manfully, hand to hand, alpel-mell, one with another, onely by strokes of Swords and Battle Axes. Further hee addeth; That the King did more then meruayles in fighting, and would alwayes bee in the verie strongest of the Battaille.

After the rout and flight of the Turkes, at his descent and taking of Damieta, and after the three great batailles in Egypt, betwene the Channels of Nilus, where he obtained full victory: if famine, and a certaine strange dis ease (extraordinarily contagious) had not falne amongst his people: it had bene Doomed day vnto the Turkes and Sarrazins, and doubtles, they had bene quite exterminated, both out of Egypt, and the Holy Land. The Infidels so admired the vertue of this Prince, that although he was contrary to them in Religion, and their very feuerer persecutor, yet after the death of their Soldan, it was offered to him, and they would haue elected him to be their Lord. And they had done it, as beeing a matter already resolved on among them: but that some labored to alter this deliberation, by alledging him to be the firmest, fiercest, and most determinate Christian that euer they did know. And they said among themselves; That if their Mahomet had suffered them to seele so many mischiefes as his God hadde let him (being a King) to taste: they would neuer more haue adored or belueued in him. And yet (neuertheless) some amongst them, onely by the example, and good Life of this holy King, receiued the Christian Faith.

Moreouer, he ordained so well for the state and policy of his Kingdome: that his subiects (beeing before mightily oppressed) liued in perfect peace and quietnes. He vied great wisdom and prouidence in all his affaires, hauing thereby quenched and qualified many troubles and commotions in his kingdome: and by taking away the causes thereof, constrained the Duke of Britaigne to acknowledge him, and render such satisfaction as himselfe desired. With very much iudgement also he pacified the differences with the English, and induced the king of England to such friendlinesse, as he became his Liege-man by faith, and one of the Barons of France: so that hee left not any war to his successors, which caused them to enjoy so long a peace.

About all other things, he loued Iustice especially, and was verie careful thereof in himselfe; correcting (by his owne example, and holy Ordinances) such Vices and Abuses as reigned among his Subiects. Hee was such a Louer of truth, that (as the Lord of Jouinville saith) He was neuer knowne to falsify his Word. For, it was reported vnto him, That the Sarrazins, in receiuing his Ransome, were discontented with tenne thousand pounds, hee caused more to bee giuen to them.

Neuer could any feare or misfortune disurinish him of reason; but euer more he was thankfull to God in all his aduersities. When he saw his army in danger, by no meanes in the world, or for safetie of his owne person, would hee part from it; but would alwayes abide by his people, and endure (with them) the latest hazards and euents of fortune. Neuer should hee make an end, I would recount the deeds (well deseruing immortality) of this good King. It shall suffice then to say; as the same Lord of Jouinville reports of this time. The common people called him true Father; the Nobility, iust Prince, and preseruer of the Lawes; France, her King of Truth; and the Church, her Tutor and defender from oppression.

A King careful for his kingdome, as well in his absence, as presence.

In the same Schoole was bred and no-rished Philip the third, to whom the good ly examples, and profitable instructions of this good King his Father, served as an absolute pattern and excellent institution, which he understood so well, and made profit of in such sort, as, although he got not so great a name, yet notwithstanding, he was the most worthy heire of his Fathers vertues. And albeit S. Lewes dyed at the siege of Thunis in Affrica, making warre the second time against the Infidels; yet this young Prince gaue
so good assurance to the Armie, much danted by the death of the King; that hee bare away many famous victories from his enemies, although they exceeded his strength in huge multitudes. In the end, he constrained the king of Thunis, to come humbly, and entreat for peace: rendering himselfe, and his Vnckle Charles king of Sicily tributaries to him.

Afterwards, returning home towards France, he passed thorow Italy, where he was entertained with such fauour and ap-plauses by all the inhabitants, as the most part came and entreated him, that hee would take the command ouer them, desiring (about all things else) to be governed by so good a King, so louing and re-spectiue of his people. Being returned into his owne kingdome, he maintayned
it in peace a long time; vntill being mollest by the King of Arragon, and the Count de Faix, hee vnderooke Armes.
Heereupon he entred into Spaine, where hauing made war very happily, by assault
he tooke many places reputed impregnable, conquered a great part of the kingdome of Arragon, ouerthrew the Arragonians in diuers encounters, and slew their King, so returning home-ward with Triumphall victory, he died at Paripnan.

But one thing may not bee omitted,
that this king most oftentimes did weare
sackcloth, and a shirt of haire, liuing so holily, and vying such abstinence, that the Authors of those times were enforced to confesse, that he rather resembled a good Religious man, then a King. Yet was hee a great Prince, & knew well enough how to gouerne his kingdome.

Charles the fift, deserueth also to be set
in this ranke of choyse men, being surnamed of his time, the Wife. Onely by his councell and good aduice, without stirring from his Chamber, he reconquered whatsoeuer his Predecessors had lost, by the Armies of the English. His prouident and well tempered wisdom, did diuers times rebate the keene edged sword

of valiant Edward the Prince of Wales,
and disappointed many of his forward purposes; so that, notwithstanding his high spirit, and well ordered Armies, he gained very little from him, nor yet the King of England his Father, but what they wonne one day, they lost againe in another.

Heere also I cannot omit Charles the seuenth, who comming to the Crowne, his kingdome (for the most part) was in the power of the English; but yet recou-ered it myraculously, as not onely hee regained what he had lost, but also (as some say) all that the Englishmen did hold in France, wishing them to rest contented with their owne Island. And heere methinkes it is very strange, what all Historians haue reported of those times, that this king, being toyled & wearied by the long warres of the English, to him much vn-profitable, and lesse pleasing: should yet bee excited by a poore Maide, dwelling in a village of Lorraine, named Joane d'Arc.
For she being brought before him, & being of great resolution, made him manie faire remonstrances, whereby to entice and kindle his courage, for the recouerie
of his kingdome, and expulsion of his enimies, which surely could not bee but by miracle. And it cannot be denied but that there was a Genius in this Maide, far surpassing the natural and ordinary condition of her sexe. And so much the more strange, because she served as a Captaine, conducted the Armies, and fought verie
valiantly, when as occasion serued.

with them. So that in lesse then fye mo-neths, he made himselfe Master of all Italy, Genewy, Florence, Pisa, Sienna and Li-burna; being all in his power. He recon-quered the whole kingdom of Naples, and expelled them of Arragon, who had vniustly vlsurped there.

The Great Turke Buzeth the second, feared nothing more then to meddle with him; & questionles, he would haue gon to assault him in Constantinople, wherein hee
had shut vp himselfe in meeke feare, if virgent occasions had not called him backe
to France, making full account to returne thither againe afterward, to attempt that great and honourable expedition against the Turkes, whereunto hee was induced and called on all sides, & for diuers good considerations. At his comming back for France, two maine impediments presented themselves to him, as well in regarde of difficult waies and mountaines, where (of necessity) hee was to passe his Artillery: as for daunger of enemies in such places, where they might worke vpon aduan-tage many wayes; his army being also much afflicted with famine.

Beside all this, a league was made against him, by the Venetians, the Duke of Mil-laine, and other Potentates, who had leui-ed an army of 40000. men, to cut him off quite; but yet hee surmounted all these difficulties, and passed through the daungers without any losse. The Armie of 40000. men was encamped on the Plaie of Fornoue, where it was most requisite for the King to passe, they purposing to lock him vpe in this passage, to the end, that they might consume his army, with Famine, necessity, and miserie, amongst the Mountaines where he was. The king with 7000 able fighting men onely, affronted
this great army, gaue them battell, passed ouer the bellies of all them that hindered his way; and there was slaine about foure thousand of them, the rest being driuen
to rout, or seized with feare, he sustaining
but very little losse, about thirtie French slaine, and some threecore Varlets. So not onely he rescued his army, which hee
led in safety with all his traine, baggage, Artille, and carriages; but also fought successefully, and hadde the victory ouer
his enemies, which was a much more honourable Retreate, then that of tenne thousand, so highly renowned by the Greekes.

An example of rare vertue is recorded of him. At the surprizall of a certaine place in Italy, a young Maid (of most exquisite beauty) flying from his Soldiours,
who would haue violated her honour:
came and threw her selfe at his feete, desiring him earnestly, to defend her from the force and outrage of his souldiers. As indeed he did; but yet himselfe fel into an amorous affection toward her, & hauing her priuate in his Chamber, with full intent to accomplish his pleasure, the Maid
all drowned in tears, humbly desired him
on our knees, supplicating and adiuiring him in the name of the blessed Virgin, the vntoucht mother of the worlds Saviour,
whose picture she saw hanging by his bed
that hee would take pity on her, and not compell her to that, for safety whereof she had escaped from his rauishing Soldiours,
and putter selfe wholly into his handes.
The King became moued in such sort,
that being transported with loue and passion, and in the braue gallantry of his youth, he made a Kingly conquest of himselfe, and bedewing his cheeks with tears,
as being much ashamed at his immodest
offer, he would not touch her in any vnciuill or vnchaste fashion, but gaue her most honourable freedome, with a verie liberall Dowrie to her marriage, setting
also at liberty both her Parents and Kindred, that were then (at that instant) his prisoners.

Surely, this was an aile verie strange and almost myraculous, if wee consider him to bee a King, in the very vigour & flower of his youth, victorious: yet nearly touched with the loue of a May-den, excelling, and no way inferiour vnto any in Beautie, and hauing her wholelie in his priuate power. His great wise-dome, singular iudgement, and infinite goodnesse heerein appeared; and being a familiar Prince, hee would oftentimes say to his Favourite; *That hee had made choyfe of them, and loved them more then any other, because he was perswaded of their honestie, and might safely trust them. Only, hee still feared one fault in them, that they would suffer him to bee taxed with Auarice,
in being easily solicited and tempted for what they asked. But if afterwards, any such matter came to his knowledge, they utterly lost his fauour for euer: for he often entreated them, to continue in the true profession of honour, the onely meanes to keep and preferue his good opinion of them.

The same King also vied to say, I could wish, that my Court were a Mirror for all my other Subiectes, to maintaine and continue them in doing well. The sweete smelling saour of this renown, attracted the souls of strangers vnto his loue and liking. So that by very iust reason, the sur-name might bee accommodated to this good Prince, Of the Lower and delight of Men: as it was attributed vnto the Emperor Tiberius.

His successor Lewis the twelfth, made himselfe likewise as famous, by his Conquests of Italy. In the beginning of his reigne, he attempted warre against Lodouico Sforza, who vsurped the Dukedome of Milaine, which belonged to him. In lesse space then a Moneth, he conquered all Lombardie, and expelled Sforza, who making a re-entry afterward, and causing the people to reuolt: the King went thither in person; where, after hee had vanquished Sforza (whom hee sent prisoner into France) hee reconquered Milaine, and receyued the most part of the Potentates Citties, and Common-weales of Italy, which ran (on heapes) to yeelde their obedience to him.

From thence he sent an Armie to the kingdome of Naples, which had reuolted after the departure of King Charles the 8. Then Fredericke, King of Aragon, seeing he could not resist him, and being offended at the perfidie of the Spaniards, who he had called to his ayde, and who (neuertheless) would possesse themselves of all: he submitted himselfe into the hands of the King, who vied him royally, and gratified him with the Dukedome of Anjou, beside thirty thousand Crownes of rent. Heere (me thinks) I should not endure the malignity of Paulus Iouius, who hath set downe, that the King gaue nothing to Fredericke, and that he dyed miserably in France. Afterward, war was alwaies continued at Naples against the Spaniards, where were performed many goodly exploits, famous combates of enemy to enemy, charges, skirmishes, encounters, af-faults, and fallies: and where the French had many victories, & the issue of all had succeeded happily, if the enemy had not diuers times abused the King, vnder colour of treaties of peace, appointments, and arrefts. He beleeuing their plighted faith and slender assurances, was sometime the more slacke in succouring his people; so that their perfidious dealing, raysed a Million of enemies, leagued and coniuured against this King, who found himselfe assailed on all sides. And yet notwithstanding, he went away, with honour, hauing astonished and filled with terror, all them that were thus bandyed against him.

He made war vpon the Venetians, in regard of that which they had detained & vsurped, during those wars. He entered into their countries, and with a small troop, & in a place of no aduantage, in the Giaradada neere to Agnadell, he gaue battell to Bartholmew & Aluiano, Generall for the Venetians, and wonne the victory: there being flaine about eight thousand of the enemy, many taken prisoners, & the very cheefest Commander himselfe.

Concerning that dayes seruice, two memorable sayings of his are recorded. The one was at his arriual there, when it had bin told him, that the enemy had taken vp Agnadell, and he came too late to haue any lodging there, hee returned this reply, I will lodge vpon their belly, or they shall lodge on mine. The other, was at his being so neere the enemies Artillery, as it might very easily play vpon the place; he was aduised to walke wanderingly, for feare he should thereby be offended, hee made answer; Neuer was King of France smitten by a Cannons bullet: And he that is afraid (quoth hee) let him come and stand behinde me.

Vpon the successe of this victory, those places in Lombardie, which appertained to the Venetians, were seized and made vse of by this King: but afterwards, they were manfully recovered by the Confederates, with whom Ferdinand, King of Castile, was a partaker, quite contrary to the contractes (not long before) passed by him vnto the French King. But the Lordes of Trimonille, of Chamouni, Trivulze, and other worthy French Captaines, rescued them backe againe so powerfully, that they continued alwayes Warriors. In the end, was giuen the bat-

taile of Rauenna, where the French vanquished a puissant Army of Italians and Spaniards ioyned together. And an entire victory had ensued on the taking of Rauenna; but that they lost their cheefe Capitaine Gaston de Foix, Duke of Nemours, & Nephew to the king, who was slaine by pursuing (ouer-earnestly) the enemies, broken and flying in confusion.

The excellency of this good king consisted not onely in greatnesse of courage and valiancy; but likewise in all other vertues. About all, he was most highly commendable, for loue to his people, to who (notwithstanding all his other serious affaires) he was a Royall ease and comfort: so that this famous name was deservfully giuen him: Father of his people, and a good King.

He had as his Successor, Great Francis the first, a Prince as valiant as euer the other had bin, and who in his very youth, and at the beginning of his raigne, ouercame the vnconquerable Nation of the Switzers, on the hot and dreadfull day at Marignano, an enterprize, which had neuer before, or at any time since, succeeded to any other King. A most remarkable thing in this battaile, was, that so young a Prince continued seuen & twenty houres in Armes, without receiuing any sustenance, and spent one whole night in the fildes of battaile, without lying downe or a nod of sleepe.

This was the man that made head against the great Emperour Charles the 5. who neuer met with a keener enemy, nor that more disappointed his designs, or euerie way more hindred him. And yet notwithstanding, it is hardly to be credited, with what honor, magnificence publicly and courtiesie in particular, hee entertained in his kingdome this Emperour, his principall aduersary. And although he with-held some of his estate vnwillly, yet would he not demand any reason for it, when he might well haue done it, hauing him in his owne power: but kept inuolubly the faith he had giuen him; and moreover, gaue him all the contentment hee could desire.

To speake no more then truth, hee was naturally generous & Royall, which evidently declared, that hee had no other ambition, then to excell all other men in vertue and well doing. He shall (for e-uer) liue commended to posterity, for the loue which he bare to Learning, and to learned men: whom hee sought for euerie where, entertained, honoured, and gratified in all kindes. By which means, he filled France with learning and erudition in all Sciences: but especially the Vniuersity of Paris, which neuer was so flourishing, as in his reigne. So that (by good right) he was fir-named, The Father of Learning.

Wee may confesse as much of his Sonne Henry the second, a Prince truly generous and valiant: who continued warre against the Emperour Charles the 5. hauing sustained all his efforts, and stood continually opposite to his greatest enterprizes. But not long after, Charles the fifth withdrew himselfe into a Monastery, fearing (as some supposed) the vertue and fortune of this young Prince, leauing the reignes of his Germane Empire, to Ferdinand of Austria, being his brother, and the kingdome of Spaine to Philip the second: who soone after made warre vpon the Pope, Paulet the fourth, and then this King sent succour to his Holinesse, defended him, & reconquered the places which the King of Spaine had taken from him. And in the end, by his entremise, the Pope and the King of Spaine were accorded & reconciled.

Occasion now carrieth me, to speake of Great Henry the fourth, miracle of the world: who gaue place (in nothing) to the vertue of his Predecessours, nor to the glory of all the greatest Princes and Monarches that euer were, if he did not surpassse them. But my Pen is too feeble, to take so high a flight, it is a subiect ouerworthy, which ought to be referred for the choiest spirits of this age, or of posterity, if any man conceiue themselves capable to vndertake it. For there hath bin some, the very best and skilfullest writers, who being thereto zealously affected, began to attempt the labour: but were constrained to giue ouer and leaue it, becing ouercome with the immense greatnesse of so many high and admirable actions, acknowledging and confessing, that they could not let downe any thing, to equall or come neere so famous merit.

Two ancient words sayings.

Plato in lib. 3. De Legib.

No cruelty observed in him towards his greatest enemies.

one) so many fights and diversity of encounters? Who can figure him, shining in his glittering Armes, in the fiercest and hottest brunts of so many sharpe onsets, combates, ranged batailles, assaults, sieges, and surprisals, making himselfe way wheresoever he went? A true Commander and Capitaine, for counsell and conduct; a most valiant Souldiour, to giue example for effect and execution. Finding all France troubled, the people moued and diuided in parts, by the deuices and fictions of strangers, all Europe (to speake truly) banded & coniuured against him, in very deplorable affaires; he yet gotte the vpper hand of all, dissipated all storms and tempests, saved and preserved France from that ruine, which euery one supposed certaine. All the enterprizes of his enemies, serued but as matter for his Trophies. Looke how many enemies, see how many Triumphs, and as many Laurels in his Helmet, to make his vertue the more illustrious, and fill the soules of his owne people and strangers, with terror, amazement, and admiration, such as cannot bee sufficiently spoken off.

He guided all his intentions with such wisdom, and executed them with so high a courage, that they could haue no other issue but happinesse: and it plainly appeared, that his vertued Fortune by the hand: making truly knowne the ancient saying; That the wise man disposeth of Fortune; and on the contrary; It is to slender purpose, to impute that to accident, which proues to be a mans owne error. Neuer did any Prince finde an estate so confused and hurried; and neuer could any reduce it to more peaceable calmnes, than he did merely by his vertue, he not only danted his enemies, but (of enemies) they became his principall friends: A sovereign degree, is the sole perfection of a great Statesman, according to Plato. His valiancy, height of courage, and addresse to actions of Armes were such, as admitted no comparison therewith: matchlesse clemency even towards such as were his most determinate enemies. No acte of cruelty, neither of reuenge, in the very fiercest fury of warre: neuer was his sword scene vntheathered, but in the hot extremity of fights. His singular prudence, appeared not onely in the managing of war, and when hee was therein very seriously employed; but also in affaires of peace, whē he gaue him selfe wholly for the good and quiet of his people, shewing at all times, and in all places, that he was an admirable, good and wise king, exquisitely enabled with all perfections. Qualities in such fort incompatible by nature, as since the beginning of the world, they could hardly meet in any one man: in regard whereof, it hath bene sometime said & desired, that two should be taken to make one of.

In breefe, all things were so great and gracefull in him, as scarcely could any one spirit comprehend them: so that (to speake truly) the best that men could do, was to sit downe, and admire them with silence. This was the man, whom not only France acknowledged, & adored as her Conferuator: but likewise on whom the whole world cast an eye, as the true Arbitrator, Author, and Moderator of her quietnes. His right to the crown yielded him to be the cheefest king: but his owne vertues made him confessed, to be the most worthy among all other Princes.

In that then which is said to be the dignity of the French kings, for their rare vertues and great merits; no other people are thought to equall or come neere this. There are certaine vertues, which are termed heroycall or diuine, because they surpass that which is common in men, or of humane vnderstanding, euen as an excessive and hyperbole of vertue. So in Homer, Priamus being desirous to commend the vertue of his Son He Tor, said; He seemed to be issued not of a mortall man, but rather of some God. In like manner the Lacedaemonians, when they admired any rare or excellent vertue in any one, they would say, That he was a diuine man. Such great personages haue bene noted among our Ancients, whose vertues were so extraordinary: that their extraction was attributed to the Gods, as Alexander the great, and Scipio Africanus: and the very fame heroycall vertues haue bene carraied in the soules of French Kings, euen as being proper and particular to them.

It is a matter as common, as natural, for a man to take Armes in his owne defence, or for his owne private profite, and to reuenge his vnjust wrongs and iniuries. But a man to arme himselfe for another that is offended, to reuenge his cause in zeale of Iustice, without any

any other hope, and to re-establish him where he had bin formerly expelled; questionlesse is a character of vertue truly heroycall, and sweetly fauouring of the diuinity; which euermore hath bene natural to the French. Strabo saith; That they would willingly grow into choller, and undertake Armes; for such as they saw to be vnjustly wronged, and manifest shames done vnto them.

The Kings of France haue bene accounted admirable for Iustice, and by an extraordinary affection in them thereto: they haue taken care and paines, to exercise and render it in their owne persons, declaring themselues alwayes equitable Iudges, not onely betweene particulars, but also in their owne proper causes, whē in a doubtfull case, they haue layde the iudgement on themselues, rather then to iniury any other. The Kings of France euer did so, as well when they rendred Iustice in their owne person, as by their Soueraigne Courts, and commendation of very ancient Iustice.

This report and praise of their Iustice is very ancient, for Agathias the Greeke Historian admireth them herein, and seemed to say with great iudgment, or rather by a Prophetical spirit: That living so, & carrying themselves in the like behaviour to their actions; hee was not able to come to any otherwise, but that their Estate would be alwayes stable & inuincible, & impregnable from enemies; being sustained with so sound bases and foundations, as Iustice and the desire of Honour are. Among them most recent, Baldus, a famous Italian Doctor, about the year M C C C L. maketh especial reckoning of the Kings of France: which (for most certaine) long time they deliuered in their owne person.

But the multitude of affaires encrescing, and they vnable to bee absent from rendering Iustice to particular persons, except the State should receiue some endamage, distraites, either by the war, or other important charges of the kingdom; they were feigne to establish Parliaments to that effect, and therefore appointed ordinary and sedentary Officers. Before that time, the Estates made their meeting but four times every year, termed in the ancient Annals Conuentus Generales: wherein assisted the principall Lords of France, and Officers of the Crowne, as well to discerne and aduise, in what was to be done for the general Estate, as to decide the greatest and most notable differences, happening betweene particulars.

Hauiug then decreed and resolved on their ordinary Parliament at Paris, there was the appointed place for rendering soueraigne Iustice: so that the arrefts and iudgements there concluded, were as if they had bene pronounced by the Kings owne mouth, and thereupon inscribed & entitiled in his Name. They were likewise verified and published, as also Registered by Letters of especial prouision, in the Offices and Dignities of the Crown, with solempne & publike reception of the greater part.

It is also auouched, (that oftentimes) Lords and Princes, being strangers, submitted their differences to the iudgment of that Court, in regard of the great opinion they held of their Iustice. The Emperour Frederick the second, referred himselfe vnto the Parliament of the King of France; in the debate and contention betweene him, & Pope Innocent the fourth, concerning the kingdom of Naples, in the year M C C C L I I I I. The Earles of Nemours, in the year M C C C X I I. disputed there the cause of his Earldome, against Charles de Valois, Brother to Philip le Bel, & won the day. Likewise the Prince of Tarante, in the year M C C C X X. gained there a suite against the Duke of Bourgongne, concerning the charges & expences layde out, for the conquest and recovery of Constatinople.

In the year M C C C X L I I. the Duke of Lorraine and Guy de Chastillon debated there their partages. In like manner the Dauphine and the Count of Savoye, hauiug proccesse together, entered for their Iudges the Court of Parliament, in the year M C C C X C. The kings of Spaine made such account of Iustice in the kings of France, and integrity of their Parliament, that they sent their suites to be considered there. The kings of Castile and Portugall, hauiug made peace together in the year M C C C C I I I. sent their difference to the Parliament, to be there verified, for the more solid and sound assurance: and there it was fully confirmed at their request, and published at the open doores.

The place for Parliaments appointed at Paris.

Differences of Princes being strangers, decided by the Parliament of Paris, and worthily ended to their contentment.

The Kings of Spaine esteemed the Iustice of the Kings & Parliament of France.

The familiarity and mansuetude of the Kings of France in talking with their subjects plain and openly.

We may also account among the fauours and prerogatives of the Kings of France, as an especiall marke of their greatnesse and Maiesty: one thing which is found in few of the Kings & Monarchs of other Nations. Which is, that they themselves doe ordinarily conferre with their subiects, suffering themselves to be seene daily, not onely in publike, but also in particular, vsing privacy, granting easie access to any one: and yet notwithstanding, they are not a iote the lesse reuerenced, obeyed, honoured, and respected, nay, rather much more then some other kings, who by artificiall trickes and mysteries, seeke to haue themselves honoured of their people. Neyther doth this facility in communication, and friendly familiarity, beget any contempt towards them, or diminish the least part of their Maiesty: but rather maketh an addition thereto, causing them to be the more esteemed, in venerable and most happy manner.

The subiect-like affection of the French to their kings and Princes.

This is that which attracteth, & (most of all) winneth the hearts of the French, rendering themselves wholly affectionate, yea, vowed and deuote to their Prince; whom they loue, feare, and honour altogether, each with an entire and cordiall affection, and not by any force or constraint. A matter truly as admirable, as rare, and which the Lord Suriano an honourable Venetian, and other strangers hauing well obserued, stand not a little amazed thereat, it appearing (naturally) almost impossible & incompatible. Wherein it is no easie matter to say, which is the greatest honour and aduantage, eyther to such kings, or to their subiects: but bee it howsoeuer, it is a great happinesse both to the one and other.

In Italy, the cause of the grandeur of the Kings.

Most part of the kings in this world, at all times haue fought many exterior meanes, by different habites, extraordinary fashions, crafts, secrets, and diuersity of inventions, to maintaine their Maiesty, to make themselves feared and respected by their subiects, and yet notwithstanding, could not compasse it. The ancient Dei, beinge elected king by the Medes, first a particular man as hee was before, changed into all manner of behauiour. Hee would build a great magnificent Castle, enuironed with many walles, the very sight wherof procured amazement. There would he thus vpe himselfe, cloathed in garments of no visuell wearing, neuer shewing himselfe to the people, but very sildome and rarely: deliuering Iustice by written papers, & by interposed persons, and likewise all his answers, expeditions, and affayres, euen as if they came from an Oracle.

The kings of the Persians did visually weare a Tiaras on theyr heads, a Diadem or royall Head-band, all glistering with Pearles and precious stones, causing themselves to be adored by such as shall see them. And now adayes, most part of the Kings and Lords in diuers countreys, obserue the very same order. The great Duke of Moscovia will neuer be seene, but cloathed with a rich Sacerdottall habite, vnder a precious Paullian, accompanied with a small choyse number of his Domestiques, so sumptuously appparelled, as one would say, they were an assembly of Gods. The great king of the Abyssines, or Ethiopiens, is neuer seene at all, he speaketh to Ambassadors, with a Curtaine drawne betweene them, no other sight haue they of him. But when he pleaseth to shew himselfe, hee weares a Crowne richly fashioned, exalted or rayed very curiously, a garment all of beaten gold, thickly beautified with precious stones; hauing his face couered with a veyle of Taffata, for feare lest any should see his face. It is also a rare, and no accustomed fauour, when he lifts the Taffata neuer so little, that any part of his visage may be seene.

The great Duke of Moscovia.

The king of China.

The great Seigneur of the Turke.

The King of Monomatapa.

The king of China neuer commeth abroad, but keeps himselfe continually enclosed in a Pallace, round engirt with very strong fortifications, and causeth his very Pictures to be adored. The great Seigneur of the Turkes is neuer seene, but in a habite wholly different from any other, both for the fashion, as also the vnspokeable riches on him: he dazeleth the eyes of all such as looke on him, in regard of the glorious stones shining on his head, and causeth himselfe to be serued with such Maiesty, respect, & ceremonies, as is most wonderful. The king of Monomatapa, is not serued but by men on their knees. There are other, who cause themselves to be serued with strange fashions, and very seruile submissions: shewing themselves sildome or neuer, and speake not a word, but it is accounted as an especiall fauour. But the Kings of France haue no meddling with these apperences, and exquisite cunning, whereby to support their greatnesse, authority, and Royall dignity: because they differ in nothing (for the most part) neyther in habites, food and fashions, from their subiects, maintaining themselves without any subtilty. And the more they are seene, the more are they honoured, and not only honoured, but also loued of the French: as being borne to reigne, carrying Maiesty in their Fronts naturally, which maketh them venerable, raiseth the people with obedience to them, and crowneth them with continual respect. And although it is no matter rare or difficult for the French, to see their King, because it is so ordinary and common to them: yet as learned Fudens hath discreetly obserued, the people runne on heapes, when they heare that the King passeth to any place, reputing it as a happinesse, to haue so fauourable a sight of him.

And in lib. 1. cap. 7.

Natural born Princes, primitive and successiue.

Onuphrius Ital. in lib. 4. Imp. 16.

To this great and immense loue of the French towards theyr naturall Prince, may well be attributed the long continuance of that Monarchy, one of her other excellences, that hath subsisted twelue hundred yeares, when few kingdomes esse can say beside. And that which is most admirable of all is, that the kings haue bin of the same race and extraction, without any change but twice, & yet in changing, still it came to proximity and kindred, as we haue already declared. One thing also maketh it commendable, that it neuer bare command of a strange Prince, nor so much as desired it: but alwayes hath bin gouerned by her naturall Princes, originaries, and of the most noble blood, not onely in Europe, but in all the rest of the world.

Learned Onuphrius, a famous Italian, obserued it as a matter worth maruaile, saying, that in no other Estate, can be obserued the like felicity. I will set downe his owne words. Mirum illud obseruandum est, quod cum nulla gens unquam fuit, qua aut externos Principes non admiserit, aut assumptos interdum non expulerit, saepe etiam per summum scelus non occiderit, solis Franci peculiare hoc est ac proprium, nullos unquam externos Reges pati, suos autem usque adeo amare & colere, ut pro eorum dignitate & Maiestate tuenda non operantur sed vitam profundius soleant. Hinc enensis credendum est, ut per mille & ducentorum fere annorum internallum non misceat tribus familiis Reges sortiri sint. Wee must account (saith he) that this is meruailous, albeit there hardly hath bin any other Nation, but hath receiued strange Kings, and after receipt of them, hath expelled them againe, yea, many times massacred them, through some extreme mischiefe. Yet notwithstanding, it is proper and particular to the French, to haue endured no Kings strangers, and therefore haue so loued and reuerenced their Princes, that they not onely employed all their goods and meanes, but likewise laide downe their liues, for the defence of their Dignity and Maiesty. And this may be thought to be the cause, that for the space of about twelue hundred yeares, there hath bene but three families, from whence haue proceeded all their Kings.

A Funerall Oration, written vpon the most naturall and continually death of Great Henry the fourth, Father to the King now reigning.

THE Egyptians, hauing sufficiently tasted the fauours of Harpocrates theyr God; did consecrate the Peach-Tree vnto him, in thankfull retribution of his infinite benefits. The leaves of this Tree are shaped like to tongues, and the fruite doth carry a resemblance of hearts: whereby they would seeme to say, that their hearts should thenceforward ferue that Harpocrates, and their tongues be continually buied in celebrating his prayes. O France! wilt thou be lesse thankfull then those people? So many choise benefis receiued fro the cheefest thy Monarchs, can they well escape thy memory, or glide into the depth of bottomlesse obliuion? No, no, wee will not only consecrate the Peach-tree vnto him, but our hearts and tongues ioynntly together, because this is the best offering, remaining in our power to giue him.

Telemachus, the youngest Son of Ulysses, sporting himselfe (on a day) childe-like vpon the Sea-shore, by accident fell into the water: but a Dolphin happily came, who receiuing him vpon his backe, did set him safe and dry vpon the land againe. The Father, not knowing how to expresse his gratitude to the Fish, that quickly was carried farre off from him by the nimble waues; to auoyd the foule blemish of vnthankfulness, caused all his Gates to be painted with Dolphins, engraued them vpon his Sword, yea, hee honoured his Seale with a Dolphins Image.

Henry, great Henry, a most Christian, Potent, and Royall King, succourd France in a Sea of seditions & dreadfull tumults, and like a gracious Dolphin, receiued her on his shoulders, and set her vp in safety, euen on the shore of a most happy peace, whereof as yet shee enioyeth the benefit. His name shall not onely bee written on our Gates and Wallis, but his greaines, his victories, his mildnesse and paternall bounties, shall bee engrauen on an euerdure Piramide of thankfull acknowledgement, neuer to depart out of our memories. Our eyes, hitherto buied in teares, granting no liberty to our sighing hearts, to let our mouthes memorize his Trophees, and tell the world his counties Triumphs; we do now begin to open the, and now wee would breake the doores of some sad Funerall discourse, in remembrance of his great Maiesty, and excellent vertues.

If Calisthenes durst make refusal to Alexander, who commanded him to commend the Macedonians, alledging for his excuse, that their vertues were so well knowne, and their meritis so great, as hee should not gaine the least honour or reputation (whatsoever) thereby. How dare I then appeare in publike, and in this common habite of mourning, to commend the eldest Sonne of the Church, the Father and Patrone of Soldiours; especially in these dull times, when that diuine fire of Eloquence, sometime stolne from the Gods by Tantalus, seemes to haue taken her returne to heauen, from whence she came at the first.

There are now no Cicerones, nor a Demosthenes to be found, no, nor an Hortensius. And albeit they were all aliue againe, to ioine their best abilities together in well speaking; yet could they not speake in such sort of that famous Prince, but their elegancy would fall farre short, and infinite goodly things would neuer come neere them, which are no more then due to his happy memory. If then I speake, it is but by appointment, and as feeling a certaine combat within me, between bathfulness and nature. Bathfulness taxing me with shame, to be silent when the whole world cries and complaines; ashamed also, that I cannot ioine my sighes & teares to yours. Nature likewise tels me, that by an indissoluable obligation, I ought to render this duty and seruice, to the eternall memory of my King, my Lord & my Prince. This then may serue for my discharge. The Epizephyrian Laurence, in former times, not hauing the commoditie to performe any solemne sacrifice to Hercules, according to their vow (because there were not any Oxen, Sheepe, or other Beasts for oblation left in their City, through the length of a greeneous pestilence, which had consumed them all) when their Elders aduised them to take Cowcumbes, Mellons, and some other kindes of fruites, fitting them with short stickes in forme of steere, and then calling them Oxen, Sheepe, and such like Beasts, they threw them into the fire, & so made their sacrifices. Among their neighbours, there was not any but commended their inuention, and gaue cheerefull applause vnto this acte of theirs.

If I haue not wherewith (worthily) to answer the admirable vertues of that Monarch; let me accuse my necessity, and giue you what I can, which (I hope) will be acceptable to you. Or else (if you better affect it) I will imitate those Sauiages of Florida, who repuing the Sunne to be their their God, and seeing him so highly exalted ouer their heads, as it is impossible for them to come neere him: in looking on him, they hold vp their hinds at him, which bringing backe to their mouthes, they kis, deliuering testimony (by this meanes) of the reuerence, honour, and respect they beare vnto him. If I cannot touch (dazzled with his beams) the Sun of so bright a Maiesty, or my tongue shal this day seeme dumbe, in the infinity of his glory: I will yet essay by signes, and shew some what that way, when other helps fayle me.

Concerning the rest, my aime hath no other end, then that of Casars, in the Funerall Oration he made for his Daughter Iulia: Præstantes admonerentur quanta iactura ex illa morte facta esset: That the bystanders might be admonished, how great a losse ensued by her death. For what losse can be greater the ours? A losse which neuer had his like, a losse springing out of our iniquities, which made vs altogether vnworthy to enioy so great, so happy and so dreaded a Prince.

O desiderabilis terra Israel! in excelsis tuis conuerteris est. Quomodo ceciderunt potentates? Quomodo abiit us est Clypeus fortium? Thus did Dauid bemoane the death of Saul, King of Israel. Thus was a King extolled by a King, being filled with the spirit of Prophecie. Thus did the annointed of God streame forth his teares, in a Funerall Oration for a Prince, slaine vpon the mountaines of Gilboa, which he wished might (for euer) continue barren like Rocks, listen the effect of his diuine maledictions. Nec ros neque pluuia descendat super vos, quia proiectus est Clypeus fortium. Let neither dew nor raine descend vpon yee; because there the shield of the mighty is cast downe. Behold, how he would haue some sad and lamentable monument to remain there, answerable to an acte so sad & dismal. Monuments ought to agree in resemblance with the things which they signify. What thing could be more horrible then the murder of an Israelite Prince? The Monument then ought to be euerie way as yrekefome and horrible.

In Funerall pompes, wee vie to goe in blacke garments. Dewes doe make the Mountaines verdant, and raine drunk vp by the Vallies, enammels the with a thousand flowers, and giues them such a garment of greene, as is both faire to see, and maruailous pleasing. Therefore Dauid would haue nothing to grow vpon Gilboa; but thornes and brambles, that is (among rude Rocks) nothing might appeare but rough thorny passages: to the ende, that such places might bee condemned, as of deeds of horror and darknesse; so likewise to sterility, and wofull perpetuall deuastation. But are not dewes the gift of God? Doth not raine come from the hand of him that is almighty? This, not to receiue these, is a dreadfull malediction. It should seeme then, that Dauid inuoked the wrath of heauen vpon that Gilboa, the land being subiect to many curses, for the finnes that were there committed. Let neither dew nor raine descend vpon yee, because the shield of the mighty is there cast downe.

Alas! what greater Shield of strength, more generous and mighty, then Great Henry the fourth? Henry, the Rampier of his people, the Shield of his Souldiers, & the Buckler that defended the heads and hearts of his Princes? He couered them against all their enemies attempts and encounters. Hee serued as an Armour of proote to the French Monarchy, vnder which defence they continually raunged themselves, yea, the Seigneurs and Principalties of many strangers, sheltered themselves vnder that Sunny Banck. Therefore of him may now be said, as sometimes was of Dauid: The Lord sought him a man after his owne heart, and commanded him to be a Governour over his people. For if Dauid declared himselfe courageous, in the greatest heate of Alarmes and fights; Henry, great Henry, hath not hee bene (euer where) a true Mars, and a true thunderbolt of warre? If Dauid were still crowned with victory, because his clemency was acceptable to the God of Armies, & therefore elected him among thousand, to be the Ruler of his people: then may we say, that (after his fights) neuer was found a kinder Prince then great Henry the fourth, to whom this Elogium rightly appertained. Qui in acie compexit superatus est, qui in pace nihil timuit: Euermore a Conquerour, both in warre and peace, deriuing his victories no lesse from loue, then from power. Vnder which (as Ennodius spake in the Panegyrique of Thierry, King of the Gothes) Vidimus euentus optimos de aduersitate generari, so may wee say; That out of greatest extremities, we haue beheld the birth of highest and fairest fortunes.

For in conquering the Rampiers of our Cities, at the very same time he won our hearts also, and (by a foueraigne am- plitude of kindnesse) sweetly insinuated himselfe into all our soules, that behelde him so brightly shining in Armes. So that saying was verified in him, which Agape- tus spake to the Emperour Iustinian. Im- perium exornant superiores Imperatores, su- perior praestantissime illud illustrare reddidit: That which Empires (in former times) gave to their Emperours; thou thy selfe (O great Prince) hast given to thine, to wit, lustre and splendour. Thou didst finde it full of quar- rels, seditions, and tumults, thy vnciuill subiects made mad (by what new Circes I know not) became enemies to thy crown. But by the right hand of God, & strength of thy martiall arme, thou didst displant their Fortresses, peopled with Spaniards, expelling both the one and other; and from the limits of thy French Empire, thou didst exterminate that proud Bello- na, that (without all pity) did cruelly la- bour to teare her in peeces, and quite deu- oure her.

Oh what a goodly day was that, when we beheld bright victory to defend vpon his head, euen glorious and celestiall vic- tory, holding in her hand a thousand Laurels, dispersing them in the fields of so many faire Provinces? Victory was figu- red by the Romans, with a gracious coun- tenance, and two great wings displayed on her shoulders. The Athenians made a mockery thereat, and portraied their vic- tory quite contrary, without wings or any feathers, to the ende, she should neuer flye from them, but alwayes keepe within the girdle of their City walles. Victory (Companion to the merits of this great Prince) was of the Athenian nature. In former times she had bene full of incon- stancy, first on one side, then on another, neuer long continuing in any one Pro- vince. But at length, she seated herselfe on the Louvre of this onely Mars, where (first of all) she threw off her wings, neuer to start thence all the time of his Reigne. This was she, that not only made him be- loved of his owne people, but so feared & reuerenced of strangers beside, that they had and held him alwaies in admiration.

Pliny tells vs, that there is found in Af-

frica a certaine precious stone, called Li- paris, which hath so faire a looke, that all eyes are at a stand to gaze vpon it. Hun- ters there haue no need of sculking bounds for their game, or any Arrowes to kill it, because this stone, laide open in the midst of any field, all wilde beasts (getting but a glimpse thereof) gather together about it, and as amorous of the stones beauty, doe nothing else but looke vpon it. Our Monarch, our great Monarch, was as a Liparis in the midst of his French world, the Ger- mane, Italian, Spaniard, English, Swethen, yea, the very Turkes, were all drawne hi- ther by the fame of his vertues, & renown of his Armes, euery one stood at gaze to behold him, nor any one but wished his presence, each one loued & admired him, as a new miracle, or prodigy of valour and greatnesse in the world. In so much, that his presence serued not onely as an orna- ment to this State: but it was also here as an horne of abundance, out of which, all kinds of goodnesse that could flow from a sacred peace, were in a most plentifull affluence deriued from him. The poysons of diffentions could heere no more pro- duce their Gangrenats; the high vnder- standing of the King was too present an Antidote. And as the dried body of a Ba- siliske, hung with a golden thred in the midst of Apollus Temple (saith Geoner) kept it alwayes cleane, restraining (by an hid- den vertue) Spiders from working cob- webs along the pillars and walles: Euen so great Henry, liuing in our France, kept it cleane from all the infolences of ene- mies, and suffered no strange Spiders to come weaue their webs of discord within his Provinces. So auailable to this Mo- narchy was his long experience & promp- titude, that he held the affaires (in cyther condition) both of church and common- wealth, in an vpright sway of policy, were it in peace or warre. And so profitable did this people finde their subiection & obe- dience to him, that in all & quite through the body of France, they reuerenced him as their Lord, their Pastor, and Father.

Doe you not know the great vnty which Nature hath planted betwene the Pinnother and the Pinna? Haue yee not read of the benefit ensuing to them both, by their mutuall concord & intelligence? France hath bene as the Pinna, and the King her Pinnother. The Pinna is that great kinde of Cockle, which we vie to call a Naker or Scallop. The Pinnother is a little creature, in the kinde of a Crabbe or Creuise, that continually stands as a Porter, awayting the opening of the Cockle; which he keeps still wide gaping, vntill such time as he perceiueth some prey to enter, which may be beneficiall to them both. For then hee pricks or bytes the Naker shut her shell, nor euer (without the liking of this her Gouernor) will shee admit any strange creature to come nere her.

Euen so France, referring herselfe to the managing of the King her Pinnother, and neuer receiuing any impression but his; she liued with that foode which was apt and natural for her, and by this rea- son, she neuer felt in any of her parts and members, those intemperate vile diseases, that heere tofore bred her to many warres and troubles. A great misfortune is it the, when such a precious Jewell is taken from forth the midst of our Temple, where such a Master and Gouernor is carried away from his people. O decus Israelis in excelsis tuis vulneratus est. O France, the ho- nor of Israel, glory of the Militant church! O Paris, the very fairest among the Gauls, or in the world, Metropolitane of the goodliest state in Christendome: thou hast scene him wounded in thy streets, flame in thy bosome, and particed inhu- manely in excelsis tuis, in thy places most frequented. O vspeakable mishap! Quomodo proiectus est Cypreus fortium? How is the shield of the mighty cast downe?

* Timanthes, a most famous Painter among the Grecians, being desirous to portraie a Soldier full of courage, spright- ly in valour, and as fiery as Mars: gaue him all the grace that Arte could deuise vpon his cloth. But afterward, setting it before his doore to bee seene, hee caused foure Trumpets to sound before the Pi- cture, that the person might appeare the more furious and dreadfull. O deare peo- ple, if I could worthily, and (according to the providence, wisdom, and happines of counsell, that remained in this Prince; I should then set before yee (one after ano- ther) euen all the great and serious affenblies, of the cheefest Heads and Captains of war, and of all other states wherein hee preiided. Then shold you see him not like a filly * Neilor by Agamemnon, but Agamemnon himselfe, and (in him) a million of Neilors. If you would see his vigilan- cy, & the care he had of his State affairs; I should then set before yee (in grosse) the Ambassadors of the greatest Princes, the Courtiers and Possillions flying from all parts, their packets open, their Secreta- ries standing by, & that magnificent King in the midst, spending many nights to- gether, for the conseruation of them, that soundly slept in their beds at ease. If you would haue a picture from mee, of his mildenesse & clemency; then must I paint a thousand potent enemies, not humbled at his presence, or crowding to his seate, but seated in safety by him, at one and the same Table, in one and the same Caroch, yea, in one and the same bed.

In breife, if it were in me to shew you his valour & Non-pareill courage; I shold the here instantly let before yee 50 ranged battailes, with their Squadrons of armed horse, and Regiments of foote, their Pikes aptly placed, the flame and smok inou- dring from Canons, the noyle of Drums, the found of Trumpets, and at the maine of euery battailon, this king encouraging his followers to the fight; and then him- selfe to giue the onser, & (like a true Mars) beating downe his enemies about him. Then would you say, that you saw a God armed, the terror of the world, the honour of valiancy, euen where Casars and Alex- anders might well crowd in, there to learn warlike lessons of him. But oh insignifi- cant disaster! he being dead: Quomodo cecide- runt potentes? Proiectus est Cypreus for- tium? How are the mighty ouerthrowne? And the shield of the very strongest cast downe?

Rich and poore might eate their bread (fearelesse) with their families, might console themselves with God, and offer the sacrifice of their hearts (at ease) in his Church. Weepe then, weepe then rich and poore, great & small, the inhumane death of this common Father, vnder whom you receyued such infinity of pleasures.

Saul & Ionathas amabiles, Aquilis leui-ores fuerunt Leonibus fortiores. Saul and Ionathan were lowely; they were swifter then Eagles, and stronger then Lyons. Swiftnesse onely in any one subiect is vnprofitable, and strength without swiftnesse is as great a maime, as lazinesse or neglece. Both these were ioyned together in our Prince. What legerity was that, when in lesse then two Moneths, like to a flash of lightening, hee made himselfe feene through the Prouinces of Picardy, Normandy, Champagne, le Perche, Anjou, and Maine? Trayling after him a weighty Army, great store of weapons, Canons, Chariots, and great abundance of other Arilleries. O good God! in how short a time did hee winne more the 160 Leagues of ground, and subiected vnto him (euen in passing along) fiftene or sixtene strong Towns. In diuers other places, what power and magnanimity did appeare in him, euen in his very greatest difficulties, withdrawing the lighted fires from all the parts of his kingdome. There did he shew himselfe like to another Hercules, being fouled in the skin of his constancy and high valour, his most tedious trauailes (which seemed to him but as Dwarfes and Pigmeis) hee strangled and crushed them all, euen as if they had beene so many Mice or Mithrums, that haue no vertue or resistance whosoever. Wherefore O France, we may well say of thee, as it was sometime spoken of the people of Israel. Quia Rex graditur ante vos, & pugnabit bella vestra. Thou hast now a King that walketh before thee. He spared not himselfe in marching before thee, and this was the man, ordained to terminate the fights and battailes.

Oh, how many meruailes do I behold, meeting in him all together. Let vs take him in his originall. Albeit he descended fro the loynes of the most happy S. Lewis, by a long extended Genealogy, wherein there is not any but Kings; yet had he nothing (in his kinde) more abiect and contemptible, then to be shut vp in the Pyrenean Dens or Grottes, badly followed by his owne, threatened and pursued by extreme accidents, throwne out of his Cradle, and the armes of his Nurse, into the Forge of Mars; wrapt vp in partiality of opinions, which held a high fayle in his time, and yet doth the like in many places of this Realme. They that fed his hopes, to preuaile thereby, deceiued him: others that thought (by such instruments) to ouerthrow him, did the higher exalt him. And perforce must I (in this case) without looking on the pointes of his conscience, commend his morall vertues.

Achilles, the sonne of Aecacus, who was to conclude the Trojans greatnelle, & to ouerthrow their Illium from the top to the bottome, was long time hid vnder the garment of a woman, among the daughters of Lyncomedes. And our great Henry (who was to be a terror to Spain) the prop and support of our French Commonweale, was (in his younger yeares) euen as hidden vnder the habite of a poore & disinherited Prince, in the solitude of the Bearnish Lands and Mountains. But yet notwithstanding, God had (euen then) destined him to be a subiect of his wonders, yea, to the cheefest dignities, & very greatest powers of this Land. God I say, the great God of hosts, Per quē Reges regnant, & hath his hands full of crowns, & bestoweth them where himselfe best pleaseth.

Reade what Job speaks of the Ostrich, & there shall you see this Prince naturally, euen according as description is ther made of her. That Bird (being deprived of wisdom & loue) without couering her eggs, leaues them in the dust, and so loseth all remembrance of them. The world would be quite bereft of Ostriches, if God did not play the part of a mother, and by the beames of his bright shining Sun, make the dust warme about the eggs, and so cause the yong to be hatched, to marryal- lous layre and goodly forme. In like manner, our great Henry was not he forsaken? Left in the dust of disfauour, and neglected all the time of his childhood? God had a care of him, notwithstanding, as purposing to make him an Atlas, for the support of his Church, and defence of this State. So that by beholding him so much abased in his beginning, and afterward so highly exalted: we haue great reason to say with the same Job, Lampas contempta ad tempus statutum. A Lampe, whereof no account at all was made; yet ordained for honour, and to be honoured at the time appointed. God would bring him by the paths of aduersity, to the highest place of prosperity, and made his trauailes seeme as Mallets, to harden him for such paynes as hee was to endure, for the re-establishment of peace and vnity, in all the diuided Prouinces of France.

In euery estate, afflictions do make the greatest persons, where contrariwise, in the midst of highest prosperities (as standing vpon an ouer-slippy place) oftentimes they soonest lose themselves. We may deduct an example heereof, from a Glasse, vpon whose Christall, Flies can get no footing (saith Plutarch) & yet stand firmly on the borderings about it, because they are more rough and apprehensiu.

Labastur uisida, fabrique tractus barret. Soothe paths are slippery, rougher wayes haue hold.

And from the same ground, it seemeth that Homer fetch his Moly, the rootes whereof were blacke, but it bare fruit of most fine gold. So the life of this French Atlas, did shew it selfe (euery where) to be very blacke in the bud, and wholly obscured with aduersity: but therest thereof (euen to his vntimely ending) carryed three Flourers of true gold, in an Azure field of heavenly beauty. Afflictions in him, serued as an apt subiect to * Polydorus and Miron, & hereby to mould, carue & forme the true shape of Vertue; which was the very fayrest and most goodly Statue, that euer could (by Arte) be imagined.

Let vs instantly conceite that happy houre, when we beheld heaueus prouidence to call him from Bearne, and the Banicks of * Garona and (with goodly Ensignes) to shew him the Loire. He being (not long before) sharply pursued, was then sought for in the Grottes, many ray- all Armies (euen then) trusting to his arme: but sent for (soone after) by the K. his brother, Henry the third, whom hee would not forsake at a time of need. Then was it, when France couered ouer with rebellions and Armies against her selfe, was constrained (more then euer before) to approue the spirit, wife dome, and hand of him, who quickly became her Halcye, to appeale and calme those furious tem- pels.

The blowes began at Tours and at Blois, but within few daies the fiery furie of those Soldiers proceeded through Beaufie, euen to the engirting of Paris: where the execrable and bloody parricide committed on the person of the king, opened him the doore to the whole State. The Princes and French Nobility, both proclaimed and acknowledged him to be their king. Meane while, the troubles en- creasing, and the Armies rent (as it were) in many peeces, behold him (neere hand) as soone shut vp in Dieppe. But like the Steele that strikes on the Flint, to extort thence the liuely sparkes of fire: euen so, the neerer a warriour is pursued, the more splendour is added to his glory.

There liueth a certaine monster in the Sea, vulgarly called the Scia or Sawe of the Sea; in regard of a horne he hath, ser- uing him in stead of a snoute, carrying no meane resemblance with a Sawe. This creature, meeting with a Ship vnder full saile, by diuers times of attempting, doth grow angry thereat, and seemeth to make open warre against it. He passeth and repasseth many times vnderneath it, im- ploying his horne (with his vttermost strength) to sawe, as he thinks, and cut in twaine the keele of the Ship. But in vaine doth he torment himselfe, for so long hee vseth the teeth or razors of his snout, till beating himselfe out of breath in the conflict: at length hee floates on the water with his belly vpward, remaining at the mercy and laughter of the Pilote.

And what great ayt (I pray ye) did so many Armies, as quite couered the plaines of France? They employed all their endcours and weapons in vaine, hoping to sawe in sunder and diuide this State. After all their malicious wrastling with this Soueraigne holy Ship, did they not become ennerued and broken in pieces, by the power of this great King her Pilote? Wherefore we may well say, as Velleius Paterculus said of Cato. Virtuti quam simillimus, & per omnia ingenio Djs quam hominibus propior; qui non recte fecit ut facere uideretur, sed quia aliter facere non poterat.

It is not for any ambition, or desire of glory that I will leaue them to our Histories. & to tell ye, that his clemency appearing about his other vertues, did make him vnuerſally both beloued and admired. O good God! how ready was he alwayes in helpe and subuention to the oppressed?

How diligent, in finding out for our mis-eases, both foueraigne, peculiar, & conuenable remedies? When I cast mine eyes on the gaffly Theater of our France,
me thinks I doe there behold that terrible fight betwene Brutus and the * Kan-thians, the very cheefest Inhabitants of Lycia, when they (being besiedged, the fire getting mischeuously into the crannies of their walles, threatening their neighbours houses, and the whole City together with a generall destruction) in a deperate rage and fury, threw on fresh Fa-gots, made of dried Reedes, the more to nourish and augment the flame, whereas Brutus (being their enemy) employed the vitermost endeouour, both of himselfe & all his Soldiers, to flake and quench it. He sate on horse-backe, full of compassion, effaying by all possible meanes, to take some good order; and turning him round about, hee held out his hands to the vn-happy Inhabitants, desiring them to spare
their owne City, and to saue themselves.

How many of our blinded French (desperately madded in our last wars) did the very like? What intended those Armes, and hostile preparations in the greater number, but only the ruine of themselves, and the whole State together? And what was laboured (on the contrary part) by this great King our Brutus?

Nothing else, but to preferre his people, and sild the fires, furiously flaming in the four corners of his kingdome; yea, to keepe his people from destroying themselves. This was euer (doubtlesse) the full butt and aime of all his warres, during which time, and euen
in the very fiercest broyles, hee was heard to cry aloud in the thickest throngs: O
Frenchmen, Frenchmen, saue your selues.
And the blood of them, although they were in Armes against him, hee did value
at a dearer rate then his owne. An acte truly generous, and which (afterwards) made him so much admired, that they who refused to accept him as their Lord;
threw themselves at his feete, and (in endeared loue) called him their gracious Tutor and Father.

Let Paris (onely) stand as a witnesse of my words, which was seene (almost) without Subburbs, without Pallace, with-whatsoever. The Field of the slothfull man, and the Vineyard of the mil-vnder-

broken downe, might be compared with it.
Our buildings beautified with Porphyry

his Louures; his Tuilleries; his new Bridges; his Arſenall; the streetes newly redecked, and adorned with so many new deuices of Silke and Tapistrie; the new foundations of publike Readings: these are as so many Trumpets, to publish the loue and vigilancy of this King. Very true is it then, that his life, so obscured and trauerſed in the beginning, did well resemble a fire, which in the making, and before it attaineth to any light, doth cast forth very grosse and thicke smokes: but being fully kindled, it yeldeth a bright flame, & giueth no meane delight to the beholder.
We haue seene his originall to be dimly obscured and darkened with the clouds of enuy. Afterward wee beheld him, not like Iubas: despised Lampe, but shining as the Sunne in brightest splendour.

among the stones in a Quarry, if hee per-earthy, misshapen, and that hath not (as yet) felt the Hammer and Chizell, hee doth appoint that stone to some important place in his edifice. Euen so God, proclaiming (long time) the building of his Church, did not forget this Prince: but at the time appointed by his eternall pre-science, hee took him out of the Quarrie

of darknesse, to make him shine as bright day, and serue as the Master-pillar to the whole frame. Behold him then (O myracle) in midst of so many victories and fauours from heauen, prostrated at the feete of the Church, and no other cryes were among the people, but God saue the King.

Deare people, from the beginning of my Oration, I haue feared to fall short, & my feare is very iust. handling so high a subject, and so full of meruailes. Yet notwithstanding, that great goodnes of his furnished me with courage, and hath hitherto vpheld me, in the plenifull field of his flowing vertues. Wherein I feele so great a consolation, and such a boundles liberty of spirit, that my tongue (without impeachment) hath (in some weak manner)
expressed those things which I conceyued of his praises. But now I feele my senses arrested by an accident, alas, as nouell, as it strange and lamentable.

The Poets make mention of certayne trees, that sometime did grow about the Tombe of Proteſilauus, and they haue attained to such height, that (with their tops)
they could couer the ruine of olde Troy;
withered in an instant, and lost all their leaves. Euen so my discourse could entertaine it selfe vnto this point; but when I see this great Prince (alas) setting from his Louure in his Caroch, a smal traine, indeed, without traine; my whole heart is frozen, my discourse withereth, and there remaineth no verdure in my words.
A mischeuous assassinate, let loose from Acheron, created of the stilly driuell fall-
ling from the foule chappes of Cerberus, (to bury our whole France) followes hastily after him. I see the Caroch stayed;
O Paris! haplesse City of Paris! in excessi-uis, in one of thy cheefest foure cornered streets, I see the murtherer likewise stay
there with it.

O God! what issue depends vpon his boldnesse? Gracious Heauen, thou didst preferre this great King (before) so many times; as against Barriere at Melun, against Chastell in his Louure, and agaynst

an infinite number more of most perniti-ous coniuurations. Thy goodnesse (O Lord) shall it sleepe at this blow? Behold (deare people) it was our sins that weighed downe the ballance of eternall Iustice,
for one chastisement. *Auferetur ab impijs
lux sua, & brachium excelſum confringetur.*
The light that shined vpon those Nations, rebellious against my Edicts, shall be take from them, and the strong Arme that defended them, shall be broken. Yea, and so farre it proceedeth, that our great God seemeth weary of further aduancing the Name of the glorious French.

O Fury! O barbarous wretch! in structed in the schoole of Sathan; and enchanted with a diuellish Doctrine, that (vnder the suborned name of a tyrant) would approoue and maintaine the Massacre of Kinges. O Deuill, and no man, thy parricide hand is not hindered, but dares boldly imploy the vse of that hellish liberty, in a most detestable sacrilege, against God, against his Anointed, and against thy natural Prince. O Suaine, thou bright day-bringer, that heretofore vailed thy golden Tresses, and didst with-hold thy heauently lookes, from the infamous house of the Pelopides, and the enraged abiding of Buphalus that vnworthy Romane Citizen, because thou wouldst behold no Butcheries and massacres: how couldest thou keep thy Chariot in his ordinary way, but with one touch of thy hand turned it som way else, that this day might haue bin co-uered with darknesse?

Among infect or iniured Creatures, Bees (sayth Pliny) do so much honor their head and King; as they will not lue after the losse of him. And among other Animals, haue wee not (almost) an infinite number, that haue consecrated their liues
for the defence of their Masters? Quintus Curtius, as one of the fairest ornaments of his History, brings in the Elephant of *K.
Porus*, which Elephant seeing his Master
on the ground, in the bloody battel giuen him by Alexander: with his trunk drew him softly out of the crowde (as fearing to hurte him) notwithstanding all the points and stauers of Lances, being thrust into his breist and sides.

The offering of king Clovis on the Altar of S. Peter

The Scythians also do eternize the memory of a Horse, who seeing his Master slaine, became the revenger of his murder, neuer ceasing, till (with his heels) he had instantly beaten out the braines of the murderer. The Dog of Hesiodus is also remembered, because he attained the children of Ganius, for the murder committed on the person of his Master.

But that which our owne Fathers haue seene, is much more memorable, of a worthy Dog, belonging to a Groomer of the Chamber, attending on King Frances the first. Which Dog, not satisfied with the apprehension of him that had slaine his Master, in the Forrest of Fontaine-belleau; but being present (by command of the Prince) he rent him in peeces, before the face of the whole Court, that then were gathered together, to behold this spectacle. O most strange case, that brute beasts shall loue, respect, and reuerence their Kings and Masters, and creatures reasonable (yet without all reason) contrary to Nature, or any instinct of her, shall soyle their felonious hands in the sacred & venerable blood of their Prince.

Tertullian, speaking of Kings; Secundus sancti post Deum (saith he) inter quos & Deum optimum maximum nullum est medium. They are next after God, between whom and the greatest God, there is no mean. Homer, by a name more proper, doth call them, The children of the great God; as they that do very neere participate in the beames of his diuinity. The Greekes were wont to call them, Basilides of Bazis, which significeth a Foundation. As in the holy Scripture, one of them is called Femur, the Thigh, he being as the Thigh, base and foundation, whereupon the repose of the State and people is supported. But to what end are all these Epithites, both sublime and diuine, in comparison of The most Christian King, the eldest Sonne of the Church, which Titles our kings attained vnto by infinite merits, euen from the Cradle of Christian Religion.

If Emperours haue done any good to the Apostolical See, what deuotion can compare with that of our Kings? Clovis, the first Crown-bearer among so many kings, offered a Diadem of inestimable value, called Regnum, vpon the Altar of S. Peter: the which Diadem, according as some of our Historians haue written, terued for the Tiaras to the holy Fathers presiding in the Church. What shall I say of Charles Martell, who received from Gregory the third, the keyes of the Sepulcher, and the Chaines wherewith S. Peter was bound? was not this done, as acknowledging him the Churches Protector, and yielding him an honourable summation, for defending that holy Toombe, and excellent prerogatives therto belonging, against the fury and inuasions of the Lombards? Against whom, this Prince began to arme himselfe, when at the very first report of his preparation, the Lombards yielded, and submitted himselfe to the holy See.

I cannot let sleepe in silence, the piety of king Pepin, who went twice vnder the Alpes, to check the insolences of the said Lombards, against Stephen, then sitting in the sacred seate. There remaineth (yet to this day) an ancient inscription, engrauen vpon one of the Towers of Ruenna; Pipinus plus primus amplificanda Ecclesiam aperuit, &c. Deliuering testimony to all Christendome, of that Princes gift and liberality to the Church. Charlemagne, Philip Augustus, S. Lewis, many Kings among them, & many others since then, euen vnto our time, haue no way degenerated from this affection, in piety & succour answerable to the former Kings; and their enterprizes were most commendable & perilous, to maintaine the truth, and to confound the Sarrasins, Mahumetists, and other sects of Infidels. VVhereof matter sufficient is given to our Historians, to make their volumes the more copious, and to Innocentius the third, a worthy subject of writing, in an Epistle which he directed Archiepiscopus & Episcopus per Galliam constitutus, Exaltatio regni Francorum est sedis Apostolica sublimata. And if that execrable and diuellish murderer, had not impeached the course of the great designs, and holy intentions of this King (O France, for whom thou now so iustly lamentest) he had shaken the Scepter of the Turke, and we might well haue hoped, to haue seene our faire Lillies glister in the Church of the Easterne Empire, & once more to haue made the true God worshipped in Palestine.

Then, O unhappy Realme of France, redouble thy sorrowes, and reuieue the course of thy teares, as often as thou thinkest remember the death of this Prince. A Prince? yea, thy Shield, and the Shield of the mighty, proditoriously ouerthrowne in the Capitall of his Prouinces. Oh that I could (in this case) according to the manner of a Pegasus, strike with one foote into a fountaine of eloquence, or that the Muses and the Graces meeting together, would giue new motion, or rather new life to my languishing Oration, that I might reach to the point first propoed to my selfe, which was, either to lay open before you the praises of my King, or to let you see his life and heroicall vertues, and how much we are interested in his losse. These two attempts were very great, and if I feele my selfe to shrink vnder the weight of the first, I must needs fall flat the with the charge of the second. Because the wretchednesse of a priuation can neuer be really understood, but by knowing the excellency of the thing whereof we are deprived, so said (long agoe) a learned Philosopher.

For as a Play of Comedies, may easily bring forth vpon his Stage, a man of goodly fiew, in shape of Hercules, couered with a Lyons skinne, and bearing a long great Club on his shoulder, but yet made light and hollow within, and at this dreadfull appearance, comes nothing neere the vertues and incomparable strength of the true Alcides: Euen so an Oratour may easily produce some grosse description of great Henry, that most inuincible Prince, giuing him golden Armour, mounted on a gallant Courser, attended with Drums and Trumpets, in midst of a confusion of armed men, a thorny wood of Pikes and Lances about him, and as the last ornament of renown, writing with an Eagles quill (yet lagging weary with circling the world) to make knowne to the two Poles, the admirable battailes wonne by this Monarch, and all this nothing indeed to great Henry the 4. This were no other then a meere phantasma, because his inward man, with his principall vertues, remained still hidden the viaticities of his spirit, the heates of his generous courage, and that true countenance of Maiesty, which carried on his brow the loue of his subjects, and terrour of his enemies: these are things that strike dumbe all tongues, and are not any way to be declared. The interest and the damage then, which the whole world endu-reth by his death, can neuer be sufficiently declared. Euery man by himselfe (from the least to the greatest) may frame out his owne discourse, and finde himselfe immeasurably offended; yet all this is nothing else, but as if each man should point with his finger at his owne heart, and no iudgment to be made, whose paine is the most greenous?

Synganbis, the Mother of Darius, her Nieces and other Persian Ladies wept more extremely for the death of Alexander (saith the History) then did the Greeks and other Macedonians. For he was the common bond of peace, and hee being broken, they found themselves (among all them which he had left) the very weakest, furthest off from succour, and most subiect to the iniuries of warre. Without all question, our sorrow hath bin common through the whole State, for this unhappy accident, false vpon the common and publicke head. Our Princes pierced through with griefe, haue (to the whole world) sufficiently witnessed their affections. But great men stand safest on the boord, the lesser serue as poore Pawnes, & they haue the greatest cause to complaine. That great chaine or bond of peace, which vnited together so many kindes of spirits, is broken in the midst; yet peace and vniety (God be thanked for it) doth still remaine among vs.

As an Arrow shot from a good strong arme, flyeth farre through the ayre, not in regard of his owne proper or naturall wings, but by the Archers vertue who (in the loofe) gaue it the vigor of aduantage; euen so our peace as yet continueth by that strength and vertue, which the high understanding and credite of our deceased king gaue vnto her. If we war against abuses, if vices may be cut off, and vertues replanted; wherefore should not this strong bond be new knit againe? But if they encrease, as they do, look then (deare people) for your danger to be nere. The mighty can daily maintaine themselves; but the weak and feeble, they altogether vndergoe the worst, especially when disorders continue.

In this case, the body of a Common-wealth, and that of a beast do carry some resemblance. For as the members (which are found) doe not finde themselves so subiect to rheumes or deflections, but so Plutarch, in vit. Alexander.

Common affections doe not so neerely touch great men, as they do the meaner sort.

Compassion of a Common wealth into the body of a Beast.

soone

soone as they present themselves, do send them to the diseased parts: Euen fo, in a body politike, those great ouerflowings that engender discords, do not so neerely touch the strongest in the State. Noblemen, as being more robust & powerful, know how to hurle such annoyances behinde them, and then their weight falls vpon the vulgar, who are compoled of slenderest resistance. Who seeth not then that the principall interest is ours? It is vpon vs that this blow is faile. That fatal knife hath ript open our breasts, and hath sucked forth our blood, euen so farre as the very furthest Nations; who wholly affrighted at so damnable an attente, haue testified, that this disaster was in common to them, communicating likewise in our fighes and teares.

But now wee sacrifice ouer much vnto griefe. O France! thou must giue a breathing time to thy sorrowes; thy great Henry yet liueth, God hath not left him after so many victories; he hath rather snatch him from beneath the armes of a temporal peace, to lodge him in his euertlasting rest, & made him change the Scutcheon of his Lillies for an eternal Diademe, the flowers whereof are without number and value, and the glory void of any date or limitation. This life hath nothing in propriety; what any man holds here, it is but as a deposit or pawne, it is but for a shortuallance, and a present of slender continuance. Spumæ grauelis, quæ a procellis dispersitur, facit the wise man: Fumus qui a vento diffusus est. It is a highway common to kings & subiects alike; to the haughty, and to the humble. Omne capax mouet vna nomen. Death (notwithstanding he is familiar to vs) yet in his passage along, if he hit his foot against a shepherds cottage only, or if a poore labouring man meet with his sickle, these are blowes that moue no terror. But contrariwise, when he smites the greatest into the bottom of a tomb, when he shiuers Crowns in peeces, and breaks royal Scepters with a touch of his Biere, this is that which moueth astonishment in men; this is that wherein they see themselves, euen as in the clearest Chry stall, best representing to the life, the defects of their fraile and wretched nature.

They that haue contemned God at their life time, may take example by Entelidas, lost in the loue of his owne peculiar excellencies: who afterward becoming a knight of Athens, tooke a Grasshopper in the fields of Egretum, whereby he learned and came to acknowledgment of his lifes thornes. Whereupon he builded a house of piety, in contempt of himselfe; where, in bequeathing all his hopes to God only, hee founded life and saluation for his soule. For, as a goodly Rose in rainy weather (being prickt with a pinne) will send forth a marvellous pleasing fauour: euen so, al the degrees of a great State, being prickt in the death of their King, by the intolerable piercing thornes of bemoaning, do then send vp to heauen the most sweete Odors of infinite prayers, whereby they procure Diuine blessings to descend downe vpon their heads.

This is also the benefite, which (among our teares and laments) we ought to seeke for in our losse, because euen therein God himself hath giuen vs matter, whereby to comfort our selues. Set before your conceits, that great deluge of waters, which (in the time of Noah) drowned the whole world. Neuer did heauen before, or since, deliuer so great a sign of anger against the sins of men. And yet notwithstanding, among all the billows and floating of dead bodies aloft on the waters: the height of top of an oliue tree did shew it self, whereof the Doue brought a pretentation to the good old man, as a symbol of grace, carrying an assured testimony, that the ouerflow should soone cease, & the Ark be deliuered from all perils whatsoeuer.

Euen so, in the frightfull deluge of tears, which appeared to swallow vs al vp in the waues, wee haue a sacred Oliue plant, a branch of that royall tree, every way answerable to that holy Doue, verily raised to this purpose by the holy ghost, to bring this aged French State a thirteenth Lewes, the liuely image of the great Henry, so lately taken from vs. Lewes I say, the true Oliue branch sent from heauen, to preface our great mercy; vnder who we are to expect the increasing of al those choise vertues and felicities that wee felt vnder the flourishing reigne of his Father. In behalfe of whom, I may wel (O France) addresse those speeches to thee, deliuered by the wise King Salomon. Beatus in terra, Rex tuus filius est Nobilium: Blessed art thou (O Land) when thy King is the sonne of Nobles. Happy art thou O France, for thy King

All degrees in a State are wonderfully the death of their King.

In the midst of most violent extremities, God is then ready with his diuine helps.

The Battell of Rauenna: Which was fought in Italy, in Anno, 1512. betwene Gaston du Foix, Duke of Nemours, General for Lewis the xij. King of France, on the one party: and Raymond de Cardonna, Viceroy of Naples, General for the King of Spaine, and Pope Iulio, on the other.

HE Generall of the French Army in Italy, being named Gaston du Foix, for Lewis King of France, against the Pope and King of Spaine, being giuen to vnderstand that the opposit powers for the Pope and Spaniards were marching onward (according to a former passed promise) for giuing assistance vnto Marco Antonio of Cardonna, who was besieged by him in the Citie of Rauenna; misdoubting some sodaine interruption in his politike enemy, brake vp the sledge, making a retreat for the space of some three miles from Rauenna, as it were to meete with the leagued army. That night they made a bridge ouer the riuer of Rouco, and leuelled the highest banks equall with the Riuer, for the easie passage of the Souldiers in all places. Afterward the 11. day of Aprill, being then Easter day, the Germane foote souldiers made their passage ouer this made Bridge of the Riuer: but the souldiers appointed for the vaw-ward and middle battell, they went thorow the Foord. As for the reer-ward, being led by Don Iuo de Alegres, and consisting of foure hundred bolde resolute men, they remained still on the riuer bank towards Rauenna, for better assisting the maine army when neede required, and curbing the Garrison of Rauenna, if they should presume to fall forth. But for keeping a Bridge (formerly made vpon Montano) hee left a valiant Gentleman, named Paris Scot, with a thousand foote vnder his charge.

All things being ordered in this manner, his battailes were ranged in this order. The vant-gard, that had the great Artillery before them, consisting of 700. horse, beside King is the son of Nobles. For the Father of thy King, descending from so many kings, was no lesse adorned with Vertues, then Crowns: And his Mother on the other side) being issued from so many great Dukes of Tuscany, the very beautifull seat of all Italy from the illustrious blood of that great Cosimo de Medicis, that afforded so many Fathers to the Church, and floures to thy Diademe, witnesseth the height of thy good fortune, hauing brought forth this young, yet great Prince, who truly Filius est Nobilium.

The Isle of Delphos was sometime most wretched, and yielded it self to the greedy appetite of the waisting billowes of the sea; till Apollo was borne there, who made it immouable, and constantly confirmed it against all tempests. O France! if heerefore thou hast bin beaten with stormes and the rude windes of discord, agitated by the flux and reflux of some vnhappy partialities, what needest thou now to feare, Cum Rex tuus filius est Nobilium? Thy totterings are already past, and I see thee (for euer) settled in the Bay of a most blessed peace, euen in the armes of thy King, so Noble in extraction both by Father and Mother. These are the wishes which wee yeelde thee, euen from all Orders and estates, vnited both in hearts and wils, to submit our selues in a perfect obedience: As we also protest, neuer to be ingrateful to the most happy memorie of that Great Henrie, from whom so manie blessings hath continually fallen vpon vs.

In elder times, the Graces were figured holding handes together, teaching men thereby, that a benefite receiued with one hand, ought immediately to be requited with the other: But Kings are ouer-great to attend the returne of such benefites, as they poure out vpon their people. And as for vs, wee are not able to acknowledge them, which haue beene receiued from our good Prince; except in seruing him loyally both with hearts and hands, as becometh most faithfull & obedient subiects. If that the hand (to our great griefe) hence-forward can do nothing, yet let the heart (as being more powerfull) continue that office, in waiting, vntill it shal please the heauenly Maiesty, to make vs blessedly see him againe, in the Celestiall repose of his glory.

The Author doth not let downe the reason why this battell.

The passage of this people ouer the riuer.

In what manner he ordered and ranged his severall battailes, in expedition of the eremie beside Germane foote, led by the Duke of Ferrara, and the Seneschall of Normandy, this power was placed on the bank of the river, being then on the right hand, whereby the foot troopes flanked the left wing of the horse. Somewhat nere to the vanguard, the foot appointed for the mid battalion, being partly Gascoignes, and the rest of other Prouinces in France, tooke their charge, and Don Iuo de Alegres was their Commander. Further remote from the River bank, the reregarde had their place, being in number five thousand foot and all Italians, vnder the conduct of Federico de Bozzolo: and this battel was flanked by all the Archers mounted on horsebacke, and other light horsemen, amounting to three thousand.

These battalles were not ordered to erre one another, but in the shape of a Cressant or halfe Moon, and directly behinde them were marshalled six hundred well appointed horse, conducted by Seigneur de la Palice, and the Cardinall Sanslerino, Legate for the Councell of Pisa, who bent their intentions against the Pope. He was a man of no meane constitution, full of heate and courage, armed Cap a pie in faire bright glittering Armor, and meeter (in dede) for the office of a Commander in field, then to supply the place of a Cardinall. As for Gaston du Foix, zyming onely at honour and victory, he would not betake himselfe to any particular charge in the Campe; but selecting som thirty choise Gentlemen, such as he thought fit to share with him in his best fortune of the day; wandered at liberty, as to bee prouident in all places, and for the readier helpe, where neede should require.

He was the man of best marke amongst them all, not onely in regard of his splendid Armes, but likewise for his sprightly countenance, dreadfull carriage, & resolution no way to be daunted. Hauing ranged his battalions into such due form, as nothing wanted but the signal for fight aduancing himselfe on the bay of the River, where best he might haue attention, and animate his army with boldest spirit, more eloquently then Souldier-like (as some suppose, thus he spake.

The Oration of Gaston du Foix, before the fight, to his whole Armie.

MY Fellow-Souldiers, the thing which you haue so long coveted & desired, to wit, to encounter the enemy in an open champaigne you doe behold how Fortune hath this day blest ye withall, as not forgetting her former Motherly care of ye, in many a famous and well-known victory. See what a gracious opportunity is here presented to ye, such as precedent times, nor memory of man hath ever acknowledged, victory hovering ouer your heades, embracing ye within the very winges of her bounty, not onely for Rauenna itselfe, fully and meerey prostrated to your power: but likewise all the Townes and Cities of Romania, though but slender attributes of recompence to your high deserts, yet as an earnest of her further intended fauour vnto ye. For, finding Italy naked and empty, not a man left to stand or encounter with ye: what shall hinder your marching on to Rome it selfe? Seeme as if (euen now) you saw your entrance into it; and consider withall, the boundlesse wealth of that gripple and greedie Court (for many ages together) bled & violently torne, euen out of the bowelles of poore abused people, and iustly ordained now to be at your mercie as pillage and spoile. Proud Ornaments, Silver, Gold, precious Stones, all in heapes, and numberlesse summes, beside most rich and sumptuous prisoners: you may already plead full possession of the wide world standing amazed at your fortunes. And Rome thus being yours, Naples lies fairly before ye, inuaiting ye to comethier with the same successe, and there to reuenge your manifold iniuries.

When I consider your valour, fortune, & famous victories, woon within the compass of so few dayes; when your manly looks, and more then many actions, do quicken my memory, that there is hardly one among ye, but hath made good proofe of his courage, by apparant and pregnant testimony of his great spirit: there is not any objection whatsoever, to foretell the assured felicitie of victory. What are our enemies, but the vaine same Spaniards, that (merely upon our coming) led by night out of Bologna: Nay more, they are the same white-liver'd men that (not many daies since) escape'd our swordes by bawling away, skulking within the walls of Amola and Faenza, or the neighbouring mountains. They are a nation that neuer durst fight with our armies in the Neapolitan kingdom in any place of indifference or easie access, but euermore upon aduantage, being supplied with manitions, riuers, and ditches, as relying more on close hid ambushes & treacheries, then on any sort of manhood or valor.

And yet let mee further tell ye concerning these Spaniards, that they are not those tried and ancient well-skild seruitors in the Neapolitan wars, but meere fresh-water Souldiers, utterly without skill or experience, neuer fighting against other weapons of resistance, but Bowes, Arrows, & the blunted Lawces of the Moors. And yet notwithstanding, by that timorous people, weak in body, worfe in spirit, wanting knowledge in armes and military actions, they were (with great shame) overthrown the last year in the Isle of Gerba. And there this very man, Don Pedro de Nauarro, one of so great note & name among them, that by taking himselfe to his heeles, bee deliuered a notorious testimony of the difference betweene the beating downe walls with shot and powder, & fighting with true fortitude & hardiment. See how they are shut up within a ditch, made this last night, euen in meere trembling feare, & how their foot are covered with a rampier, consisting of Carriages & hooked waggones, as meaning to try the battel with those childish instruments, & not with the Marrow, Muscles, and Arteries of men, or with the chearfull viuacity of spirit.

Make no doubt (deare hearts) but our great Ordinance shall drive them out of their holes, and beate them to the open field: where they shall plainly perceiue, that the power of the French, the courage of the Germanes, and unconquerable resolution of the Italians, doth go far beyond the cunning subtilities of the Spaniards. The greatest obscuring of our glory, is that we ouermatch them in number being (every nere) twice as many as they. Neuertheless, seeing fortune hath bin so bountifull to vs, it were indiscretion not to make use of so happy a benefit, which will rather be imputed to temerity and improuidence in them, then to any comarall aduantage in vs. Nor doth courage or valour incite them on, but the authority of Fabritio de Colonna, in his rash promise made to Marco Antonio; or rather the instice of heauen hath thus provoked them, to the end, that the pride and conflagrant heinous actions of Iulius, that false and counterfeite Pope, as also the deceitfull treacheries of the King of Arragon, may haue condigne and worthy punishment.

But why wast I time in so many wordes? Or why should this victory be so long kept from ye, by circumstantiall speeches in a skilfulle oration, whereby needlesse for Souldiers of undaunted spirit? March on then, my valiant fellows in armes, with full assurance, that this day I shall giue the whole Empire of Italy to my King, & the wealthy spoile among you all. To your Capitaine and Commander, will be present with you in every place; and, as I euer haue done, so this day more especially will I oppose my life vnto all perils, rather then a win of ye shall miscarry. Nay, I shall repute my selfe for the most fortunate Capitaine, that euer was seeing that by this dayes victory, I shall not onely make my soldiers most glorious, but the richest of all other Armies, within the compass of three hundred yeares.

This Oration ended, and the aire echoing the noise of Drums & Trumpets, the Spaniards espying the French past the river, in this manner they ranged their battalies. The vanguard, consisting of 800. horse, and conducted by Don Fabritio de Colonna, stood placed along the banke of the river, wherto was added 600. foot on the right hand. Likewise along the River, stood the middle battel of 600. horse, being flanked with 4000. foot, the Victory being the Leader thereof, & with him the Marquesse of Palada, as also Iohn de Medicis, Legat to the Pope. Moreover, along the same river bank stood the rereward, conducted by Carual a Spaniard; & in that battell were 4000. horse, and 4000. foot. All the light horsemen (whose General was Daualos, Marques of Pescara, a very yong Gentleman, but of exceeding great hope guarded the right side of the foot behind, for succoring any part that fainted. The great Ordinance was placed in the front of the horse, & Don Pedro de Nauarro General of the Spanish foote, accompanied with 500. horse, had not any place of certainty, but had planted at the ditch in the front of the foot, 30. waggones, like to the crooked Chariots vsed in ancient time. Whereon he had placed field pieces, and very long Boares speares for easier inflaming the furious feaze and charge of the French.

battell.

In this order they expected the assault & charge of their enemies strong army, with in the munition of the ditch, but this counsel, as it profited nothing in the end, so in the very beginning it appeared to be pernicious. For it was the mind of Fabritio de Colonna, to invade the enemies, so soon as they began to come over the River; as thinking it more commodious to encounter with one only part of the enemies, than to abide in the camp, defended but with a single ditch. But when Don Pedro de Navarra (whose counsel the Viceroy followed as Oracles) repugned this advice: it was decreed (though nothing providently) that they should be suffered to pass over the river. The French being come within 200 paces of the ditch, stayed; perceiving that their enemies kept themselves within their camp, not stirring any further, least they should give their enemies such advantage, as themselves desired to have.

Much harme done by the great Orde-
nance on either side.

For more then two houres, both the armies were thus at a stand, but no meane store of shot came from the great Ordinance all that while on either side, where by the French foote endured great detriment. For Nauarro had planted his artillery in such a place, as he might at his pleasure hurt them; but the Duke of Ferrara made great halt, & brought his Artillery in the rear of the army, to another wing of the French, where the archers on horse back were planted, which wing, in regard that the army stood in the form of a crescent, was (we neere) on the rear of the enemies; from whence he beganne cruelly to flank their sides, especially of the horse, for the Spanish foote being brought by Nauarro, into a low place along the rampier of the river, & (by his command) laid flat on the ground, could no way be injured by the shot. Fabritio called out aloud, and urged the Viceroy by messengers often sent to begin the battell, before they were torn in pieces by the great Ordinance. But Nauarro being guided by peruerse ambition would not agree thereto. For, in regard he had promised himselfe victory, only throw the valor of the Spanish foote, yea, & although all the rest of the army were slain, yet he imagined, that his glory would be the more augmented, the more y harmes were heaped on the rest of the army.

The wilfull
obstinacie of Don Pedro
de Nauarro.

By this time, the men of armes and light horse, had endured so great a slaughter, as it could be no longer borne: and as a most miserable & dreadful spectacle, here horses, there men from off those horses, fell down dead, and heads & arms being torn from the rest of the body, were seen flying aloft in the aire, whereat Fabritio beganne thus to exclaime. And must we all (quoth he) day here shamefully, by the wilful perjuries of one Marano? Must this army be utterly lost, and not one enemy slaine by us? Here are our many Trophies over the French? Must the honor of Spaine and Italy perish for one only Nauarro? No sooner had he spoken these words, but without staying for the signal, or any command from the Viceroy, he droue his horsemen over the ditch where the rest of the horse following, Nauarro was forced presently to give the signal to his Regiment, & they rising with violent fury, encountered the Germans, who were by this time come verie neere them. So the battells being met pelmei on all sides together, it was wonderful to behold; & surely this battell was the greatest that euer Italy had scene in many yeares: because that at Torre was hardly any thing else, but a strong encounter of horse. And the battells in the kingdom of Naples were rather disorderings of array, or rash attempts, the deserviedly to be termed battells. And at Giaradaedda, the smallest part of the Venetians power had fought: but here two potent armies fought with harts firmly combined, either to vanquish or dy. Being enflamed, not only by perill, glory, and hope; but also mutual hatred, which y several nations bare each other.

In the encounter of the German foote with the Spaniards two Colonels of great fame the one named Jacob Emser, a German, & Zamudo a Spaniard, fought as if it had bin by way of challenge, before the fronts of the battailles: in which fight, the Spaniard killing his enemy, became the conqueror. The horsemen of the Confederates, were not comparable to them of France; beside that day they had bene so endangered, and meerey torne by the great Ordinance, that they were thereby made farre inferiour. So that, after they had a while sustayned the force of their enemies, rather by stoutnes of stomacke, then strength of body, and Alegres sending for Palice with the rereward, and the thousand foote also left at Montona; they were charged on all sides. Fabritio de Colonna fighting very valiantly, had bin taken by the Duke of Ferrara Soldiers. Wherefore, seeing themselves no longer able to hold out against the enemies fury, & entrusted also by the example of their Captaines, turned their backs likewise. For the Viceroy and Carniiall, neuer tarrying the uttermost triall of valour in their Souldiers, fled; leading away with the rereward, almost whole and vntoucht. With them also fled Antonio de Leua, a man (as then) of mean condition; but afterward being exercised in all degrees of martiall seruices, became a very famous Generall.

Now all the light horsemen were overthrowne, and Pescara their Captaine, weltring in blood & wounds, was taken also, and so was the Marquisse of Paluda, who brought the second battail into the fight, through a field of ditches, bushes, & bryars, which much disordered the array. Beside, the field was couered wholly (as it were) with the mangled bodies of men & horses, which proved no small hinderance to them. But yet the Spanish foote being forsaken of the horsemen, fought with incredible fiercenes. And although they had bin somewhat repulied, at their first encounting with the Germans, by reason of the strong ranks of Pikes: yet after they came within the reach of their Swords, many of the Spaniards (being couered with their Targets) got between the legs of the Germans, wounding them in those disarmed parts with their Daggers, and so committing a very great slaughter among them, attayned (almost) to the midle of the battaile. Among whom the Gascoigne foote, hauing won the way betweene the River and the Rampier, had sharply charged the Italian foote, who although they had sustained great losse by the Ordinance playing hotly vpon them, yet they had vterly expelled them, if Alegres had not giuen a fresh and violent charge on them with his horsemen, & with greater force the good footes. For when he saw his Son Pruerros slaine in his sight, and almost at the very first encounter, he, vnwilling to surmount, after a losse so great and greuous, ranne in with his horse, euen among the thickest of his enemies, and fighting like a most valiant Captaine, after hee had slaine many, was slaine himselfe.

The Italian foote, when they could no longer hold out against so great a multitude, began to shrink; but part of the Spaniards comming to their succor, they kept still in the battaile, and the German foote, oppressed by the other part of the Spaniards, could scarcely stand vp any longer. But now, all the Spanish troopes of horse being put to flight, Gaston du Foix, with a great multitude of his horsemen, set freshly on the Spaniards, and they, retiring rather, then driuen out of the field, marching in good array, and in no part broken, took the way lying betweene the River & the high bank, going in an equall pace, with their front very thicke of men, and repelling the French with the strength thereof, began to retire, and orderly depart out of the field. Which Nauarro beholding, was more desirous of death then life: & therefore not departing out of the battaile, was take prisoner. But high-minded du Foix, not brooking to see the Spanish foote march thus away safely, & (Victors-like) with their whole ranks vnbroken, perceiving also, that the victory was imperfect, unless they were broken as well as the rest; with a vehement fury, he charged on their rear with a troop of horse. But heeing immediately enclosed in among horsemen, and throwne off from his horse, or (as others say) oppressed with the flundering of his owne horse, was slaine with a Pike thrust into his side. And doubtlesse, if they ought to wish for death (according as common opinion is) that haue attained to the highest degree of felicity, then assuredly, the death of this noble Gentleman was most unfortunate, hauing gotten so glorious & eminent a victory. He dyed a very yong man, hauing now won (among all men) immortal fame, because within the space of 3 Moneths, (being a Generall, almost before he was a Soldier) with incredible celerity & good successe, he had gotten so many glorious victories. The Lord Lautrech (his Cousin german) hauing receiued wety greuous wounds, lay beside him, well neere dead; but being carried to Ferrara, was faued, by the diligent care and cure of good Chyrurgions. Thus through the death of noble du Foix, the Spanish foote were suffered to march away without impeachment. The rest of the Army was put to flight, all the bag and baggage taken, together with their Ensigns & Ordinance: as also the

The number of them that were slaine in this battell, is altogether vncertaine, yet among the variety of many reports, most do affirme, that (on both sides) there were slaine ten thousand at the least, whereof the third part were French, and the rest made vp among their enemies. But without all controuersie, the losse on the victors side was farre the greater, by reason of the death of Du Foix, Algerres, and many of the French Nobility, as also of Jacob Emper. and other the valiantest Captaines of the German foot, to whose valour and manhood this victory (bought with such a deere effusion of blood) was chiefly attributed.

Moreouer, many Captains of the Gascognes and Piccards (which Nations lost that day all their glory among the French) were slaine with Monsieur Molard: but the death of Du Foix surpassed all other losses, with whom the courage, strength, life, and fiercenes of that army was viterly extinguished. The greatest part of the vanquished, that escaped from the battell, fled to Cesena*, & from thence to further places: neither did the Viceroy stay any where, vntill he came to Ancona, whether he brought but very few of his followers. For, the Duke of Vrbine, not onely raysed vp the Countreimen against them, but also sent souldiers to doe the like in Pesaro; onely they escaped safe, that passed thorough the Florentines Dominions.

And although after this battell, the victor Army tooke and sacked Rauenna, yet within very short time after, when the courteous Treasurer of Normandie (to saue charges) had dismissed the Italian Soldiers; and part of the men of Armes were returned for France, and the Emperor had reuoked the Germanes: they were (by a new Army of Switzers that came in the Popes ayde, and with whom also ioyned the Venetians) quite dispossessed of the whole Dukedome of Millaine, and all that cuer the French King had beside in Italy.

What they were whom the world esteemed by the name of the Sibyllae; Of their Prophetes: but more principally of those things which they spake concerning Christian Religion.

THE History of the Sibills, is generally held to be very certaine, because euery one (almost) knoweth, that they foretold and prophesied many things. Neuerthelesse, to know when, whence and what they were, what they did, & at what times they wrote and prophesied, is most familiar to him that hath read ancient and authentick bookes. It made me therefore the more willing, to make a Collection of their history, and so much the rather, because it is a matter of no meane marvel, to contemplate the gift of Prophety, which God gaue to those women in diuers manners. But particularly to prophesie of the coming of Christ, of his life, of his passion, and other great mysteries of our holy faith: these we do purpose to speake of briefly, to the end, & the Ethnick Pagan may not any way excuse himself (although he will read but his owne bookes onely) no more then the Jew in reading his, and will not accept nor beleue our faith. I write this the rather, because (by common consent) those bookes were receyued among all the Gentiles, and the Sibyllae credited, especially by the Romanes, who in all their affayres and necessities had still their recourse to the Sibylline bookes, and tooke their best and most serious counsels from them.

All Historians, both Greeke & Latine haue written of them: our intent then shal best fit it selfe, without selecting to greet a number, to make choise of the cheefest, the better to auoide prolixity, & set them down in some orderly manner. Diodorus Siculus, Pliny, Solinus, Seruius, Martianus Capellus, Lactantius Firmianus, Eliaius, Suetas, Strabo, Marcus Varro, Virgil, with the foundest part of all the Poets. S. Augustin, Eusebius, Orosius, and the more part of all our Historians, largely writeth on them.

Diodorus saith, that the word Sibil or Sibills, implieth so much, as if a man should say, A woman Prophetesse, & filled or inspired

The prophesie of Sibilla Persica concerning christ

red by God. Seruius on the fourth of the Æneides, and Lactantius in his first Booke of Diuine Institutions, nameth them, The Council of Gods. Suidas termeth it Prophetesse. These Authors doe not agree how many there were of these women, neither consent at what times; because some determine more, and others lesse. Martianus Capellus makes mention but of two, others remember foure, as Eliaius doth in his variable histories. Marcus Varro recordeth ten, whereof Lactantius Firmianus speaketh in his first booke, & him I meane to follow.

The first was of Persica, named Samber, 14, of whom Nicanor maketh great mention, euen he that wrote the actions of great Alexander. Others say, that shee was of Chaldeia, & others, that shee was a Iewe, borne in a town seated nere to the red sea, called Nos. Her father was named Berofus and her mother Erimutha: shee composed 24 bookes in verse, wherein she recounted wonderful things, concerning the coming of Christ, his life, and miracles. But yet they were vnder concealment, and deliuered with an artificiall obcuritie, which was not to be vnderstood of euery one: whereunto all the other Sibyllae conformed themselves. So that Lactantius Firmianus without particularizing any one of them, denieth their particular Prophetes of Christ. Saint Augustine maketh a summary of some things, which this woman and the rest said of Christ, and (among other) these very wordes.

I shall be taken by the wicked handes of vnbelievers, and they shall giue him blows on the face with their sacrilegious hands, & spee on him with their foul polluted mouths: And he shall giue them his shoulders, suffering the to be whipped, and he holding his peace, without speaking any word, they shall thereby not know whence his words came. He shall likewise be crowned with thorns, giuing him gall to eat, & vinegar to drink. Behold him that fasting they shal make for him, so that thou blind and ignorant people, thou shalt not know thy God, conuersing among men. But shalt crown him with thornes, providing for him vinegar & gall againe, the veile of the Temple shall be rent, & the plaine bright day at noone, shall be like night, obscured or darkened for the space of three houres. And when he hath bin in hel, he shal returne to life, and rise againe.

These wordes are so pregnant, that they are the very proper tearnes of the Evangelists writing on Christ, and the verie same that the Prophets prophesied, especially Esay, whereunto our holy Church giueth absolute beleefe. Beside, these Prophetes of the Sibills, are deriued from the writings of Lactantius, S. Augustine, and Cicero, from Marcus Varro, & other Authors of the Gentiles, who dyed before the birth of Christ, as Lactantius approueth. And say moreouer (of the felues) that they said, That he shall raise the dead, The lame & impotent shall walke and runne soundly; the deafe shall heare, the blind shall see; the dumbe shall speake plainly. A little farther is added, With five loanes & two fishes, hee shall feede five thousand men in the mildernesse: and that which remaineth, shal serue for satisfaction to the hope of manie. Thus farre for the first Sibilla.

The second, they say, was a Native of Libia, and therefore named Sibilla Libica. Of her is large mention by Enripides in his Prologue called Lamia.

The third named her selfe Themis, and was surnamed Delphica, in regard that she was borne at Delphos. Other speaketh Chrysippus, in his booke of Diuination: & this woman (according to Pliny) the Romans made a Statue vnto, and shee liued before the destruction of Troy: so that Homere hath set downe in his workes, manie verses concerning her. Piodorus Siculus saith, that she was called Daphne, and was daughter to Titeius, and that the Argiues hauing subdued Thebes, they sent her to Delphos, where afterward shee became a Prophetesse in the oracle of Apollos, so that (according to his relation) in that respect she was called Delphica.

The fourth was named Cumana, or Italiانا, & not Cumana Amaleica, of whom we shall haue cause to speake anon. She was a native of Cimeria, a City of Campania, nere to Cuma. Her learned and iudicious Prophetes, are written by Nequius in the Punicke Bookes, and by Pisanius in his Annales, and referred by Lactantius, and by Virgil in his Eglogue, which beginneth Sicelides musa, &c.

The fift was that so famously remembred Sibilla Erythraea, who so clearly (by Gods assistance) prophesied the greater part of our Religion. V wherefore as Lactantius sayeth 3, In times lowe since, those Gentiles reputed as folly, & a defect of braine,

Her words agree with the Prophets and Evangelists.

to take of the Sibillaes verses: because they under stood not how it might bee, that a virgin should haue a child; and other supernatural things which they wrote, being declared in Bookes of ancient Historians and Poets. Appollodorus writeth of this Sibilla, that the Greekes going to besiege Troy, there prophesied to them that Troy should be destroyed. Wherefore, all those that speake of her, make her more ancient then the destruction of Troy: yet Eusebius maketh her more nouell, for hee would haue her liue at such time as Romulus lyued in Rome. And Strabo saith, that she liued in the time of Alexander the Great. The Verses of this Sibilla Erythraea, are recited by Eusebius; the first words whereof, being traduced into our language, are thus: Iesus Christ, Son of God, the Saviour: which is a most admirable thing to think on. The consideration of those verses, and their further addition, are set downe by S. Augustine, in his 18. Booke of the City of God, deliuering it in these expresse words.

The earth shall sweate, a signe of iudgement from Heauen shall come a King, who shall be king for euer: and further, known in humane flesh, to the end, that by his presence he shall iudge the world. By which means, the incredulous, as well as the faithfull shall see God with their eyes, exalted among his Saints. And in the end of the world, the souls of men shall appeare in their owne flesh, and hee shall iudge them himselfe, when the rounditie of the inhabited earth, shall be full of clouds of dust and grasse. Then shall cast away Idols and Images, and all their Jewels and riches. Hee shall penetrate the inferiour parts, and breake the gates of the darkest hell. Then shall fyre and cleare light be giuen to the Saints, & the flame of eternal fire shall burne the Wicked. All secrets shall be discovered, every man shall be knowne of his companion: and God shall discover the Consciences and hearts of all. There shall be weeping and gnawing of teeth, and the Sunne and the Starres shall bee darkened; the heauens shall breake, and the Moone lose her light; the mountains shall be humbled, and the valleys made equal with the hills. There shall not be any thing in the world that shall be higher or lower one the another: mountains and valleys shall be euen and plain, & all things shall siml. The earth shall be dried, and conuered to dust, Wells, springs, and riuers shall burne, and with the same fire shall the earth, sea, and ayre, be burned all. Then from heauen shall sound a Trumpet, with a dreadfull and horrible sound, and the earth in opening, shall discover the darkenesse and confusion of hell, and the paines & torments of the miserable damned.

These things, and many more besides, are spoken of this Sibilla in those Verses, declaring clearly Christ God incarnate, with the last iudgement, and resurrection of the dead. Now these things, before they came to passe, were no way intelligible; & that was the reason, why the Ethnicks and Gentiles might holde them to be follies and mockeries. In like manner, this Sibilla Erythraea, knowing well that which should happen, concerning her owne selfe, spake these words: They will repute me for a blind & mocking prophesse, Neuerthelesse, when those things which I speak shall be accomplished and verified, they will remember me, and no more tearme me a liar, but a Prophetes of the Great God.

The Romans had great store of the verses written by this Sibilla Erythraea, whereof Fenestella speaketh more at large, and saith: That by a decree of the Senate, they sent Ambassadors vnto her, in regard of her Prophetes: and that they brought backe great store of her verses, which they laid up in the Capitoll, with them which they had before. She was borne in Erythraea in Ionia, a Prouince of the lesser Asia, and abutting vpon Caria: this I relate the rather, because there are found many other Cities to be of that name; as one in Lybia, another in Babylonia, another in Laecia, and another in the Isle of Cyprus. But that shee was of that Erythraea in Ionia, Strabo is my Author, and saith, That it hath a Port on the sea, nere to a Mountaine.

Another Sibilla, being the sixte, was borne in a place named Phiton, in the Isle of Samos, which is in the Aegean sea nere to Thrace: or else in the other Isle of Samos in the same sea, and opposite against Ephesus, for which cause, shee was called Sibilla Samia, of whom further mention is made by Erastus.

The seauenth in order, is Sibilla Cumana, named Amalthaea; others call her Demophila; and Suidas tearmeth her Hierophila. Shee was called Cumana, because shee dwelt and prophesied in the Citie of Cuma in Italy, a Prouince of Campania, nere vnto * Bulla. Of this woman man writeth Dionysius Halicarnassensis, Solinus, Aulus Gellius, and Seruius. This Sibilla brought to sell to Tarquinius, the proud King of Rome, nine funeral bookes; neuerthelesse, Suidas saith, that it was to Tarquinius Priscus. For which Bookes, he demanded three hundred peeces of gold, more then of great value: but because the price seemed excessive to the king, he would not buy them. Whereupon, she burned three of them in his presence, and yet demanded the same summe for the six that remained. Then the King thought her motion to be more impertinent then the former, and seemed to mocke her: whereupon he burned three more of the sixe, and told him, that she had but three left of the nine, and yet he should giue her as much for those three, as if hee had bought them all. The King being amazed at this her confident determination, and conceiuing (by good aduice) that those Bookes must needs containe some extraordinary great mysteries; bought the three at that price, which formerly she demanded for them all, and those Bookes were placed in the Capitoll, where they were held in foueraigne reuerence & veneration.

Pliny saith, that she had but 3 Bookes in all, and that she burned two of them, & yet would haue as much for that one, as for all the three. But it sufficeth, that those Bookes were kept in great reputation, with them that the Romanes had of the other Sibillaes. For as Marcus Varro reporteth from Lactantius; the Romanes bestowed great cost and paines, in searching all Cities and Townes of Greece, Asia, and Italy, and brought to Rome all the Verses & Prophetes, that could bee recovered of the Sibillaes; especially those of Sibilla Erythraea, for the care and safe keeping of which Bookes, fifteene men were particularly appointed, and none other but they might touch them. Fenestella sayeth, that when the Capitoll was burnt, the Senate sent againe to entreate Sibilla Erythraea, to helpe them in those Bookes. In which respect it is to bee presumed, that they had not at Rome the Bookes of Sibilla Cumana only, but likewise al the rest. And that Sibilla, whereof Virgill maketh mention in the beginning of his 6 Booke, who kept herselfe at Cuma, where (he sayeth) Aeneas tooke shipping; must needs be the other Cumana, whereof we haue already spoken. For it can be no way likely; that Virgill should suppose a Sibilla, at such times as Aeneas entred into Italy, nor that she liued till the fift King of Rome. Beside, Seruius interprets the same passage, saying, Or else it must needs be, that shee who sold the Bookes, was named Cumana, although it was not her name, and yet notwithstanding, she dyed in that City.

The eight Sibilla, is said to be a native in the Territory of Troy, in a place named Marmisa, and this woman is reputed to be very ancient. For * Heracles Ponticus saith, that she liued in the time of Solon the Philosopher, and of the great King Cyrus.

The ninth Sibilla, diuers Authors doe report to be of the Country of Phrygia, and that shee prophesied in the City of Angora; of which name were two Cities, one in Phrygia, and the other in Galatia.

The tenth Sibilla, named herselfe Albunea, and was borne in the City of * Tibur, which standing sixteene miles distant from Rome, shee therefore was tearmed Sibilla Tiburtina.

Now, all these Sibillaes left many Bookes and Verses, wherein they prophesied of things that were to come, & principally of the fortunes of Rome, were they good or bad: so that in all important affairs, the Romanes would diligently search, and turne ouer the leaues of the Sibillaes Bookes, and order their government wholly by them. And in the same manner, as when wee would haue our speeches credited, wee to say, this is Gospel: so would they say, these are the words of Sibilla; such was their credite & account among them. And for this cause Iuuenall saith, Credite me vobis solum recitare Sibilla.

Heereupon some said, that the Sibillaes gaue their answers, written vpon leaues of Trees, as Virgill winneseth in his first Booke. Cicero speaketh of those Sibillaes with great reuerence, saying: As wee haue formerly done, euen so from the capital Letters of their Verses, we may deriue great, good, and gracious sentences.

Among many other things, they haue spoken much of Christian Religion, concerning the birth, life, and death of Iesus Christ, as we haue already declared. Sibilla

As such as men having but one Language, some of them shall build a very high Tower, as if thereby they would mount up to Heaven: God shall (even then) send great windes to destroy it, and divers Languages shall happen among the workmen, and therefore is the Tower named Babylon.*

These things, and others such like, were written by the Sibilles, and acknowledged both by Christians, Jewes, and Gentiles, which the Gentiles (for their finnes) scarcely understood. But it fell out well for christians afterward, into whose hands these Bookes came, as Lactantius, Eusebius, Augustine: the knowledge of which Bookes, or the least part of their Prophecies greatly confirmed the Christian, and quite confounded the Pagane and Gentile. There is report made of some other, who were also named Sibilles, because they were reputed to be Diviners and Prophetesses: as Cassandra, the daughter of King Priamus, and Campusia Celophonis, the daughter of Calcas, and Manka Ierusalonica, daughter to Tirefius the Theban; neuertheless, Historians speake onely but of these ten.

CHAP. VII.

Concerning the seven Maruailes and Wonders of the World, what they were; also in what severall parts and places of the World they are remembered to bee by greatest Writers.

Such as have read ancient Historians, Orators, and Poets, do finde, that they make mention in many of their Bookes, of 7 Maruailes or VVonders of the World, and that they were in divers places. All they that have written, do consent to six, but concerning the seventh, there are variable opinions, and likewise a great difference, in placing one before another. Notwithstanding, I purpose to speake first of the walles of Babylon, which are ranked in the number of these VVonders, & upon good reason, because the greatnesse of the place, as also the situation thereof, seemeth incredible.

In our former Volume, and in the Chapter of the diversity of Languages, we have sufficiently declared, that they were founded in the same place, whereas Nimrod builded the Tower of Babel, and whereof the City tooke name. Concerning those walles, according to the foudest opinions, namely Iustine, and also as Trogus Pompeius saith, they were founded by the famous Queene Semiramis, Mother to Ninus. Diodorus Siculus, Antoninus Marcellinus, and Paulus Oroginus doe maintain the same, with the greater part of our Gentile Authors. Neuertheless, S. Augustine, and Iosephus in his Antiquities say, that they were builded by Nimrod, assisted by the proud Gyants then living. But bee it, that the foundation or reparation of them was done by Semiramis; it is sufficient, that they were greatly ennobled by her.

The situation of the City was with a Plaine on the one side, and on the other ran the River of Euphrates. The modelle & figure of this City, was in a quadrangle, and the walles wonderfully high, as also wrought with marvellous cunning. The matter was of stone, toynd with Lime & Cement, growing in the Mines of that Country; but especially in the great Lake of Indica, where sometime flood Sodome & Gomorrhæa, named Alphalidia, which yieldeth such a kinde of slime or mud, as bindeth like Pitch or Glue, the very strongest that is to be found. Historians do disagree about the height and largenes of the circuit, which might happen, through the diversity of the measures they then used. Pliny saith, that the circuit of those walles was threecore thousand paces, so that one of the squares was fiftene thousand. He also saith, that they were two hundred foote in height, which foote exceeded by three fingers breadth, the measure of the Romane foote: and the thicknesse was fifty foote of the same measure, which was (indeed) a matter very admirable.

Diodorus Siculus saith, that the wals contained in all round about 360 Stades, and that that they were so broad and wide, as fixe Chariots might easily be trained in front together, without offending one another. The Bridges, the Mounts, the Towers, & the Gardens, Semiramis caused to bee made, which were works of great astonishment. It is credibly set downe in Records, that shee kept daily at this worke, three hundred thousand men, out of all the kingdoms which were subiect to her. Quintus Curtius addeth thereto eight Stades more in length, and saith, that they were an hundred cubites high: but Paulus Oroginus saith, that they were 480 Stades in length, which amount (taking six score & five paces in every Stade) to threecore thousand paces, as Pliny said. Strabo saith and affirmeth, that they contained three hundred, eighty five Stades, and also that they were so broad, as the former named Chariots might in that manner goe on them, and yet not hurt or hinder one another, in their passing along together.

Moreover, Authors doe report marvellous things, of Gardens made vpon the Arches and Towers, wherein grew Trees of vne measurable height. Julius Solinus confirms the same with Pliny. Some among the Authors do avouch, that the walles without, were engirt with Ditches full of water, as large and deepe as an indifferent wide River. In this City there were an hundred Gates of mettall, very admirable. And for conclusion, all that is written of the greatnesse and height of the walles, may well be credited, because (in truth) this City was the proudest in the whole world, and long time held the vniuersall Monarchy, which is an especial argument of her greatnesse. And the same is also described by Aristotle, when he saith: That being once taken with enemies, they that dwell at the one end or side of the City, had no advertisement thereof, till three whole daies space after.

The second place of the worlds wonders, we giue to the Colossus of the Sun, which was at Rhodes. It was a Statue or Figure of a man, offered by the Gentiles, and dedicated to the Sunne, and some say to Iupiter. It was made of mettall, of an incredible greatnesse, and in height also like a huge Tower: so that it could hardly be imagined, how it was made and raised in that manner. Pliny, who discouereth all things, saith, that it contained three score and ten cubites in height, and although at the making of it, there were many good workmen continually labouring, yet were they twelve years before it could be perfected, and it cost three hundred Talents. He that vnderooke the workmanship thereof, was named Cares, an Indian by birth, and Scholler to Lysippus.

This Statue was so immeasurably great, as it seemed, that the earth could not any longer sustaine it, because according to Pliny and Paulus Oroginus, it stood not above fixe and fifty yeares: at the end of which time it fell, by reason of a great quaking and rembling of the earth. After which fall, and namely in the time of Pliny, many went to see it as a thing to wonder at. For, saith he, there were few men found, that could embrace the great fingers of this Statue: so that the very least of his fingers, was greater then any other Statues, how great soever. And yet he speaketh of an hundred other Colosses of meaner stature, which were also at Rhodes. But that is nothing to our purpose, except some one be desirous to say, that in regard of this great one, and the other lesser, the Rhodiens thereon were called Colosenses or Colossians. But that opinion is not approved by Erasmus, for he saith: That those Colossians to whom S. Paul wrote, were people of a City in Phrygia, named Colossa.

Returning then againe to our wonderfull Colossus, I say that it lay there ruined a very long time, even till the dayes of Pope Martin the first, which was in the yeare fixe hundred, when the Infidels, and the Soldane of Egypt their Captaine, came vpon the Rhodiens, and according as Platina writeth in the life of Pope Martin, and Antoninus Sabellicus, in the third part of his Booke: they carried away that which they found of the reliques of this Colossus, and they finde nine hundred Camels to be laden with the mettall. Of other Colosses that were at Rhodes, and in other places, nothing so great, we purpose not to speake, because our present aime is at the seven Wonders of the world onely.

In the third place, we determine the Piramides of Egypt, and vndoubtedly, if that be true which Historians have written of them, they are things deferring admiration.

miration. These Piramids were certaine buildings, which began beneath in quadrangle forme, and so rose vp (in a diminishing manner) a huge height, in the shape of a painted Diamond. And yet notwithstanding, they were of such greatnesse and taulneffe, consisting of such and so many stones, as also wrought with such perfection, as it is no easie matter to describe them, neyther to winne credible opinion of them. And yet (me-thinks) things so sufficiently authorized, by Authors both Christians and Gentiles, men well esteemed and approued; their credence is no rashly to be slighted or denied. These Piramids then are as very high towers, finishing in a spire or sharp point, and the etimology of the word cometh of Pyri in Greeke, as much to say, as fire, because it seemeth, that the height cometh to lessen and faile, like as a flame of fire doth.

The Piramids
as they are

Among all other Piramids, Historians make particular mention of 3 which were in Egypt, betwene the City of Mompis, which is now the Cayro, and the Ile that maketh or createth Nilus, named Delta, one of which is ranked among the seuen wonders. For it is said, that to the making thereof, there were continually employed three hundred and three score thousand men, and the work lasted twenty whole yeares. Many do affirme it, and particularly Pliny in speaking more amply, alledging twelve authors for his warrant, as Nestor, Siculus, Strabo, Pomponius Atella, Herodotus, Ammianus Marcellinus, and many more, whereof some say, that the foundation and ground-work of this Piramid, covered and contained eight dayes journey of ground: others say leauen, and most agree on fixe, and as many (little more or lesse) in the height. Pliny saith, that each quadrangle or square contained 883 foote in breadth. The stones were of Marble, brought out of Arabia, and Pomponius Mela maintaineth, that the most part of them were thirty foote in largenesse. Whereby may be gathered, that so many thousand men must needs be busied, some in cutting and squaring those stones, others in bringing and carrying them, and other in laying them, beside the mighty multitudes, employed for fetching them so far off, and about other necessary occasions.

Of the other Piramids the like is spoken, at least of the other two fore-named, one whereof was made by the vanity of the Kings of Egypt, who were the very richest in all the world: as well by the fruitfulness of the earth, as in regard also, that no man possessed any thing in proper, but only the King. Beside, after such time as Ioseph the Sonne of Isaac, aduised Pharaoh, to preferre the Corne in seuen yeares abundance, as provision for the time of famine: during which space, by means of that Corne he had all the Lands of his people. Thus you see how the Kings became rich, and were serued by their subjects, even as if they had bene their slaves. And Historians do faithfully report, that the Kings caused those Piramids to be builded, only to feed their people that labored about the, and because they should leaue no wealth to their successors. For they affected rather, to dispense in this manner with their people, then that any of their heyres should attaine the means to exceed the decaified by their goods and money.

I finde it recorded also, that those Piramids serued for Sepulchers to their Kings. And whosoever doth well consider the multitude of hebrew people that serued in Egypt, and by whom the Kings made their Cities and Fortresses to be builded, will not be much amazed hereat, in regard that it is very certaine, that fixe hundred thousand men on foote, beside a great multitude of womyn & small children, departed out of that seruitude, and that all of them were employed, and serued in those wonderfull works. Whereby it is no meruaile at all, that such buildings should be made; for good Authors do auouch, that in Rootes, Garlike, and Onions, to sustaine the multitude of workers, there were dispensed 18 hundred Talents, which at the rate (now addayes viced) is a million and foure-score thousand Crownes. Diodorus saith that round about it, and a large compass also somewhat farre off, there was not to be seene the very smallest stone, neyther apparence that any man had trodden there, nor any signe of a foundation; but only Sand, as small as the finest Sale. Whereby it seemeth, as if that Piramid had bene planted there by Gods owne hand, or to haue growne so naturally, and the top appeared red to touch heauen.

If we set aside those ancient Bookes, we shal yet finde testimonies of our owne times. Peter Martyr of Millaine, a very learned man, who was Ambassadour for the Kings Catholique, Don Ferdinand, & Dame Isabella, the Soldane of Egypt, in the year 1501. wrote a Booke of what he had seene and done in his Ambassage. There he declareth, (as he did the like by word of mouth) that hee had seene those Piramids, & agreed with that which those ancient Authours had written of them. Particularly, he speaketh of two seene by him, which were of incredible height, and saith, that he measured the square of one, finding it to be 315. paces, so that it contained about thirteen hundred in circuit, and on each side very huge stones made vp the buildings. Moreouer he saith, that certaine men in his company, ascended vp one of them, with very great labour, & long space of time, and they declared to him, that on the toppe of all (as we vieto say) there was one stone wholly of it selfe, so great, as thirty men might easily stand vpon it. And when they were about, they said, they seemed as if they had lost their sight, and only with looking downward, and tooke themselves to bee in a Cloud, such was the extremity of height, their braines being much troubled, and turned vpside-downe. So that (saith hee) there neede no doubt at all be made, concerning the great number of people employed, and the expences spoken of, in doing those works.

Tomb.

The fourth Meruaile or VVonder, was the Mauiolus. Artemisia was wife to Mauiolus, King of Caria, a Province in the greater Asia. This woman (according to Aulus Gellius, and other historians) so dearly affected her husband, as it was generally recorded for a most notable example. Her husband the king dying first, she lamented his death with teares and complaints, more then were of ordinary custome. Needs would she erect a Toombe or Sepulcher for him, answerable to the extraordinary loue shee bare him; and such (indeede) it proved to be, that it was recorded among the seuen wonders of the world. The stone of the whole construction, was of a most excellent Marble, consisting of foure hundred and eleuen foote in circuit about, and fise and twenty cubites in height: it had also about it, fixe and twenty Colombs of admirable stone, and likewise of as famous sculpture.

The building was open on all sides, with Arches of seuentie three foote in widenesse: and it was framed by the hands of the most exquisite workmen then to be found. The part towards the East, was made & engrauen by Scopas; that on the North, by Briax; the South side by Timotheus, and that on the West, by Leochares. The perfection of the work was such, and that on the whole body so sumptuous & beautifull, as partly it was therefore called Mauiolus, and in regard also of the king, for whom it was made: so that euen to this very day, when any Toombes of such superficiall Arte are made, they are called Mauiolus. Of these things mentioned is made by Pliny, Pomponius Atella, Herodotus: Strabo also remembreth them, so doth Aulus Gellius, and many other historians. It is found written, that Artemisia, after the death of her husband, liued in continuall teares and mourning, and that she dyed before the worke could be fully finished: having drunke the bones of her husband, beate into powder, which she burned and buried in her owne body, that it might be the Sepulcher for his.

THE fift Edifice of these VVonders, was the Temple of Diana, whom the Gentiles adored as a Goddess, and it was builded in the City of Ephesus in Asia, in the Province of Ionis. Of this Temple, great speech was made throughout the world: so that one named Demetrius, wrote a particular Booke thereof. Pliny writing of this Temple, saith that the Amazones caused it to be builded, and that it contained foure hundred and fise and twenty foote in length, and two hundred and twenty in largenesse. The worke was so admirably artificiall, that it had 220 yeares to the perfecting. It was built in a Lake, to prevent the peril of earthquakes; and it is said withall, that on the foundation was laide great store of coale-dust, & wooll thereupon, the better to make firm and sure the moist and marshy place. It had an hundred and seuen Colombs or Pillars of most excellent Marble, & each of them was made by all the Kings of Asia:

sis: thirty seven of them were of most curious cunning and sculpture, and all the other of the choysell Marble.

The principall Masters of this worke, according to Pliny, was Dreiphon: but beleeving Strabo, it was Archiphron. Notwithstanding, this diuersity of opinion is sufferable, considering, what length of time the businesse lasted: and therefore there must needs be more then one Master, especially for so many performances & varieties, in the diuersity of such times and intelligence.

Solinus and Pomponius Mela say, that the Amazons builded & dedicated this Temple: and yet Solinus affirmeth, that when the mighty King Xerxes went to the conquest of Greece, & that he burned all the Temples; yet hee referred this only still standing. All Historians do consent with one accord, that the Pillars of this Temple supported the planked feeling of wood, the most excellently wrought that could be deuised, and that this whole covering was of Cedar, and all the doores and wainscotted works were of Cipres.

Yet afterward, a villaine seeing this solemne and ioueraigne building, conceived a lewd desire to burne it, as (indeed) he did. And being taken for the fact, confessed, that he did it to no other end, but to leave a famous renoune of his deed to the world. Wherefore Valerius Maximus, in his titles of desire of renoune, and Julius Gellius affirmeth also, that it was prohibited (vnder greuous penalty) that any man should doe so much as write his name, because he should vterly lose the fame and renoune, which he so earnestly affected. Yet all this serued to slender purpose, for Solinus and Strabo both say, that he was named Herostratus, and that of him came vp the vniual Prouerbe, that when any man would strue to be famous for some vicious deed; people would commonly say; This is the renoune of Herostratus.

To speake yet of some other memorable matters to this purpose, it deserueth some respect to remember, that the very same day as the Temple was burning, Alexander the Great was borne, the Conquerour of all Asia; hereof aie Authors, Plutarch in the life of Alexander, and Cicero, in his second booke of the Gods nature, where he speaketh it in two places, and likewise in his booke of divination. Further he saith, that while the Temple burned, the Sages prognosticated the destruction of all Asia; even as afterward it was overcome by Alexander. Some do write, that this Temple was built againe afterward, in much more great and excellent manner then before, and that the Master of the worke was named Democritus.

THE sixt Wonder, was the Idoll or Image of Jupiter Olympus, which was in his Temple in Achaia, betwene the Cities of Elis and Pisa: and the place was named Olympus, as also the Temple, in regard of Jupiter Olympus, of whom write both Strabo and Pomponius Mela. They maintaine, that this Statue or Image, which stood in the Temple, was much renowned, as well for arteificial perfection and admirable workmanship, as also for the greatnesse thereof. It was made of Porphyry, some say of Ivory, and by the hand of Phidias, the most excellent Carver and Engraver for Imagery (in Gold or Luory) that euer was; albeit Pliny nameth diuers other. Strabo saith, that the excellency thereof consisted in the greatnes, and yet the matter which made it more admirable, was in being wrought of Porphyry, knit and vnited together of infinite small peeces.

Some say, that Phidias was taxed with one onely imperfection, to wit, that hee had not proportioned the Image to the capacity of the Temple, because hee had made it sitting, and so great, as when due consideration was made, what the height thereof would haue bene, if he had made him standing vpright on his feet, the temple had no way bene able to haue contained him.

Neuertheless, the renoune of this Image did most highly illustrate the place, and made the Temple more knowne, then otherwise it would haue bene, although it was formerly held in great esteeme, by reason that in the very same place, were kept the sports and wrastlings called Olympian. And thence it came, that the yeares were counted by Olympiades, which they made from five yeares to five yeares: which pastimes were first instituted by Hercules, and afterward being left off, they were againe re-established by Aemilius, but (according to some Authours) by Sphiron, foure or five yeares after the destruction of Troy, especially according to Eusebius, and then began the yeare of the first Olympiade.

Now concerning the seventh Wonder, some say, that it was a Tower which stood in the Isle of Pharos, neere to the City of Alexandria in Egypt. Pharos was a small Island, long and narrow, seated on the coast of Egypt, ouer against the mouth of Nilus, which in former time (according to Pomponius Mela and Pliny) was wholly (as it were) enuirt with firme Land, and afterward in the times of these Authors, the Sea embraced this firm land, excepting only a Bridge, whereby men went from the one place to the other. In the firme land is the great City of Alexandria, builded by Alexander the Great; which City was afterward a Colony of Iulius Caesar. In this Isle (named Pharos, after the name of a great Pilot, which belonged to Menelaus; and was there buried) the Kings of Egypt erected a Tower of Marble, maruallous in height and cunning workmanship, vpon a Mountain enuironed with water: the arteificial performance of which Tower was such, that it cost 800. Talents, which value foure hundred and fourescore thousand Crownes, after the computation of Budaus. And it was builded for no other purpose, but to set vp (in the night time) a lighted fire thereon, Beacon-wise, to guide and direct such Ships as came to take landing there: and this Tower, according to the greatest opinions, was erected by King Ptolemaeus Philadelphus, and the Master Architect that made it, was named Sistratus, which is confirmed to vs by Pliny.

Caesar in his Commentaries, highly praiseth the height and workmanship of this Tower; and saith, that it was also called Pharos; as taking name of the Island. As much saith Ammianus Marcellinus, declaring the history of this Tower. Also Solinus in his Polihistor, in the end of his 34 Chapter saith, that all the Towers which were afterward made, and for the like occasion, each of them was named Pharos, after the name of this, as was the Pharos of Messina, and in other places. And I am of the minde, that the kindled fires or lights, which are ordinarily carried in Ships, as guides to other in the night, vpon pon this occasion are called Pharoses.

Thus this Tower is the last of the wonders, although (by diuers) it is not named in their number, but in stead thereof, the hanging gardens of Babylon are reckoned, wherof we haue already spoken. Lactantius Firmianus confirmeth it, and saith, that these gardens were vpon Arches & Towers, yet sheluing downward, admirable for great Trees in no meane abundance, and great store of Fountains the forme of this building is amply described by Diodorus Siculus. Caelius Rhodiginus, discoursing on the seven VVonders of the world, doth not inferre this Tower of Pharos; but the Obelisque of Semiramis, which was made after the same structure and forme of a Pyramid, for it began so in a quadrangle, and finished vpward in a point, and there was no difference betwene an Obeliske and a Pyramid; but that the Obeliske was all of one entire peece, and therefore of no such height as the Pyramids. I finde it written, that some of them haue bin great, like Towers, and of a very goodly stone. There is one now at Rome, named a Needle, which was brought out of Egypt; and it is admirable, to see the greatnes thereof, as also to iudge how it was brought thither. Concerning the Obeliske of Semiramis, wherof Caelius reporteth, and nameth it in the number of the 7 VVonders: he findeth it credibly auouched, that it was an 10. foor in height, and 24. foote square in a quadrangle, so that the whole circuite was 90 foote, and this Stone was so taken whole, out of the Mountaines of Armenia; & by the command of Semiramis, brought into Chaldean Babylon. But in truth, when due consideration is made, how it should be taken out of the Quarry, brought thence, and erected vp on end: it might appeare a matter incredible, if Antiquity had not yielded things as strange, and certified to vs by Authors, well deseruing beleefe, yea, and of other great Obelisks, made by the Kings of Egypt. Pliny describeth how they are fetcht forth of their Quarries. Of the Pyramids, Obelisks, Starnes, & Colosses, mention is made by Polybius, in y beginning of his Booke, cald Hypne-ratomachia. Therefore I need not to make any further relation of them, fearing I haue offended already, by presuming ouer-farre vpon your patience, in what hath bin said, concerning these 7 VVonders of the world.

CHAP. VIII. The Oration of Antipater, the Father to Herod, which he made before Cæsar, standing accused, for following Pompeies part.

THE ARGUMENT.

After that Pompey had bin vanquished by Cæsar, he was massacred in Egypt, by them whose lives he had sometime saved. Antigonus the Jew, aspiring to the Royalty, accused (before Cæsar) Antipater the Idumæan, to have served and favoured Pompey in his enterprises. And that he had done no matter of service in Egypt, which could be interpreted for Cæsar, but rather for the succour of Mithridates, and to cover his fault committed in following Pompey. But Antipater, for the better appearance of his good services, renting off his garments, shewed what wounds he had received in the service of Cæsar, and suddenly accompanied this scarry testimony, with these words ensuing.

The effect of the accusation obtruded by Antigonus against Antipater.

Wounds are a Soldiers speaking witness, when himself is silent.

BEhold heere assured and certain witnesses, of my hatred against Cæsar, these wounds so apparent, and which are shining markes of my foules conceptions, to speak & defend the poore accused criminal. I offer to thee (Lord Cæsar) these wounds, aspledges of that affection which lies hidden in my heart, and wherof I make you a liberrall present. These are the gages of my faith, and this is an obligation written in my heart, and which will remaine engraven heere all my life time. If you will not please to credite my fellowes in Armes, nor to listen to the of my Nation; let it be demanded of mine enemies, and know from them, for whose sake I have received all these wounds. And what is the reason that I am thus persued; but because I have bin noted loyally affected, in offering you my faithfull service.

I vnderstand and perceiue, that mine enemy reprocheth me with friendship to Pompey, and fixeth before his owne eyes, that I have fauoured his cause. I confesse (Lord Cæsar) I confesse, that I haue bin a friend, not to men, but to the Romane name; and that neuer my desires were elsewhere addicted, nor my duty & diligence any way applied, but onely in doing my most humble seruice to the Senate and people of Rome. I haue then borne Arms, not for a Romane, neither for his particular profite, but for the seruice of all. And let the case be admitted, that Pompey was acceptable to me, that I carried his cause, and maintained his quarrell; wherein am I therefore to be blamed? Hee was long time (before) my friend, that hee had war with you, or any discord grew betwene him and Cæsar. Moreouer (my Lord) he was your Kinsman, and you were his Father in law. He being in Iudea, there was not any particular affection (whatsoever) that made me follow him: for I assisted him, as being General of the Roman Army. And yet notwithstanding, I neuer hazarded my selfe so far for him, neither did he ever finde such kinde knowledge of affection in me; as (for his sake) to take so many wounds, as I haue received in serving you. It is for you that I gave the pledges of death, and for whom I became an enemy to mine owne body, exposing it to the Darts, Arrows, and Weapons of your enemies.

But is it any matter of amazement, if a slave, nursed vp in seruitude, do not know what wounds are, nor the hazards happening in warre? Or should it offend any man, if a disloyall fugitive should be ignorant what the worth of faith is, and what honesty remains among good minded men? Who can reprove me, but this my perpetuall enemy and yours, for saying in loue and affection to the people of Rome? I am astonish'd, how Antigonus should be so hardy, as daring to blame or accuse any man before the Romans, against who it is his custome to make war, and that he should be so impudent, to make complaint before them, as if his Realme were fratched or rauisht from him. If it were so, yet his power should not bee exercised for his greatness or aduancement: but onely to seize on you, to assaile the Romane Legions, & to practise vengeance against you for his father and brother. It much amazeth me, that such a wretch, & so vnthankfull as he is, feareth not the throne of the Romane Emperour, but dare (euen there) oppose and pursue innocents: without remembering, that a Kinsman of his, and a companion in the crime, hath there beene punished for felony, treason, and reuolt.

A Soldier stands oblig'd to follow his General.

The Coward cannot usage of libeity, nor the duty, altho' faithfull.

THE EFFECT.

Reson appearing (in Cæsars iudgement) to be vpon Antipaters side, he iudged also for him, and gaue him the gouernment of Iudea. By this meanes hee opened him the way, to giue the Iewish king done to the children of the said Antipater, and disseized them that were of the blood Royall, and of the true seed of Dauid.

CHAP. IX. The Oration of Herod to his Martiall troopes, being vpon the point of fighting with the Arabes.

THE ARGUMENT.

Herod seeing that his Army stood like men amazed, as fearing a disadvantageable success of the warre, through (I know not what) superstitious conceits, grounded vpon prodiges and tremblings of the earth, which at that time had happened, vnder regard whereof, his Soldiers shewed themselves very unwilling to fight against the Arabes: Hee laboured by this Oration to perswade them, that all such things are naturall, exhorting them, not to leave the victory to their enemies, for any distrust in them; and these were his words.

Fond prodigies and superstitious conceits in mens braines, make them cowards to waite at tempests.

HE forces of the enemy hauing bin enfeebled and abated by many of our aduantageable encounters, full of fortune to vs, and transporting them with furious despaire, yea, making them to massacre our Legates and Ambassadors: I cannot chule but merruall, how you should be thus affrighted without any occasion. At leastwise, it were reasonable and dreadlesse, without some good foundation, to preferre accidental occasions to any euident successe, when men are assured of their owne vertue and forwardnesse. We haue had some encountering with the enemy, where the Arabes did not turne their backs vpon vs, & yet dealt but fraudulently (as they can well do) not to vanquish, but to delay vs from the victory: which matters, as they ought to encourage ye to the fight, so you should withall consider, that as you haue felt (I know not what) weakening of hart, by some earthquakes hapning, they should be no terrors at all to vs, no more then to the, who stand with vs to endure this war.

And if we would but respect, on whom the damage of this persecution is false, you should perceiue, that it is vpon the Arabes, constraining them to keepe themselves in the field, because they should be still before them, that far go beyond them in courage and valiancy. For I see, that they distrust their owne strength & manhood, and yet taking heart, on the hopefull ruine of our troopes, they will needs adventure to endure the war. But alas, that is a feeble hope, which proceedeth not from his owne proper vertue and valour, but rather dependeth vpon others misery: inso much, as there is nothing more fraile nor mutable, then are felicities and aduersities hapning to men. For the estate & condition of humane occasions, whatsoeuer ouerthrowes they chace to feele, relieth vpon a very little time, & as felicity is neuer durable, euen so aduersity can neuer bee perpetuall, and a man continueth no longer miserable, then hee had a precedent time to bee fortunate. And of all these I can giue you a goodly and most manifest example.

In the first fights, wee had the victory ouer the Arabes, but war taking his course and altering the lot and fortune thereof; we were vanquished by them whom (not long before) wee surmounted and overthrew. Vvich therefore yeeldeth reason to beleue, that we shall againe conquer them which vanquished vs: considering, that presumption is alwayes guided by indiscretion and want of fore-sight, whereas aduised feare armeth men with prouidence, to fit themselves for following successes, and thereby to learne duty and diligence. It neuer is otherwise in the state of felicity, but that boldnesse and temerity are equal companions, and want of discretion in Soldiers, neuer carries for the wise aduice & counsell of their Captaines; in briefe, they rush into the warre, without their leaue or commission. But I see that you are indiciouly fearefull, which makes mee to hold the victory so much the more assured. Courage then (deare friends and companions) take hart and hardiment, by advancing the glorious and ancient magnanimity of the Iewes your Predecessours.

The vncertainty of mens felicities and aduersities.

Presumption maketh a man impouident, but discreete feare maketh him wile.

And

Ordinary and natural occurrences should never breed dismay in Soldiers.

And let not the mouings of insensible things, breed any terror in you, neither carry any conceite, that earthquakes can be any argument or preface, of any other disaster or mishap, then what hath already happened. For the Elements haue their defects as well as we, and no other harme or danger is to be doubted, then what en- sueth to themselves: considering, that neither tremblings of the earth, nor mortality of creatures are but their owne iniuries, and signifie no other penill or pre- iudice at all.

And yet we should not feare to suffer matter of greefe, in regard that (already) we haue endured most affliction and in- supportablenecessities: he that hath pun- ished vs, will bee appealed, and become againe as milde vnto vs, as if hee had not chastised vs. For what can we expect from him, after this irksome penitence, but on- ly his holy fauour and mercy, seeing for two offences, he hath bin pleased to afflict and punish vs? For the rest, as concer- ning that which belongeth to this war, all is in his entire condition; because the plague hath ended them that were not in the Campe, and our victory hath taken them from the enemy, euē those men that were the cheetell for his battailes. If our Flocks or Herds of Cattell are dead, the enemy hath had a losse of much better things, being bereft both of wit and fence, when (contrary to all right and equity) he slew our Ambassadors. The Arabes haue broken the law common to all Nations: for no people are so cruell and barbarous, but Ambassadors ought to be inuicibly respected of them.

Let them therefore expect from God, a iust vengeance for such crimes, to cha- stise their euill doings, for the finnes of our aduersaries are of such importance, as there is not any law, be it humane or di- uine, that will leaue them unpunished. Let vs go forth then, yea, let vs go to fight; not to get their spoiles, or conquer their lands; but for the glory of God, and the defence of his honour. Let not the loue of your wives and children spur ye on to the war; but only the diuine fauor, which you know to be present with you. So go- ing on this manner to the fight, our de- sires shall not be thereby effected, but our obedience to God, for doing vengeance on them, whom the Law forbiddeth any man to touch. Beside Ambassadors are they, who (among the furies of armed e- nemies) onely mediate peace, & such men are neuer numbered or ranked with aduer- saries; because their blood being shedde, cryeth incessantly for iust vengeance in our soules. Haste wee then in going to the fight, in regard that God is hee, which offereth himselfe to reuenge our friends slaine. The very murdered Ambassadors will fight for vs more furiously, and better then our selues: and ringed round with a squadron of Angels, let vs on to the bat- tle, and vnder confusion of our enemies.

An Ambassa- dor is hee be- respected of the people, how barbarous it euen.

Ambassadors are neuer ac- counted or ranked among other enemies.

THE EFFECT.

By these words of the General, the Jewish Soldiers recovered heart, and seeking occasion to affront the enemy, at length assailed them with such fury, as the Arabes were enforced to fight, and had a great losse of men. Beside, such as fled, retired into the Mountaines; except a part of them, which yielded themselves to the Iewes. The rest, affecting rather to die like ho- nest men, then submit themselves basely self to handi blowes againe, where they were slaine and behead in peeces, yet not without leaving sufficient testimony to the Iewes, of their valour.

CHAP. X. The Oration of Herod before Augustus Caesar, who had conceived anger against him, because he had taken part, and followed Marke Anthony.

THE ARGUMENT.

Augustus Caesar, having vanquished Marke Anthony in Egypt, it seemeth he was ad- iudged, that except he chastised Herod also, he was not fully possesse of the victory. He- rod tasting the euill affection of this Prince, went to him to Rhodes, where presenting him- selfe, and vowing the generosity of an invincible spirit, he declared to Augustus; that if he did not helpe Anthony, it was not through want of any good will, but because he had no means to do it. Affecting much rather, to confesse that he had bene an enemy to Caesar, then show himselfe ingratefull to his friend. And although he presented himselfe before him, without a Kingly Crowne on his head, and clothed like a man that had no dignity: yet his words expre- ssed the Majesty of a great Prince, and these were they.

Discreet hard measures were offered to Herod, which made him rather goe to Augustus, then to send for him.

I Confesse (O mighty Monarch Augustus) that I haue bene a loyall com- panion to Marke Anthony in his af- faires, as to the man, from whom I recei- ued the kingdom of Iudea. And I will not deny, but that I was very highly be- holding to him, as I would more plainly haue exprest by Armes, if the enuy of Cleopatra had not given mee hinderance, and if the Arabes had not broken my de- signs and enterprizes. For which cause, and constrained by such necessities, I came not against you (in his assistance) with weapons in my hand: because I had no desire at all to forgoe my deare friend, and much lesse was I affraid to enter bat- tle against you in his behalfe; but onely in this respect, that I was busied in defend- ing mine owne Countries. And albeit that I assisted him not personally in the battails, yet Anthony found mee not vn- thankfull to him; for I furnished him with men and victuals, for the succouring and refreshing of his Army, and I am well as- sured (Great Augustus) that you would not haue thought me ingratefull to Marke Anthony, if you had bene in the battaile at Actium.

You see Sir, that I hide not my selfe, fearing more to be reputed ingratefull on your aduersaries behalfe, then doubting that any one should imagine me your e- nemy. I make more account of your iudgement, then of all the successes of warre: because before you, the merits of vertue are not in any penill, in regard you know how to purchase honor, and punish mis-behaviours and vices. Consider (gentle Prince) that as I neuer forsooke Anthony, so long as Fortune spake fairly to him: euen so, all disasters, and dead as he is, cannot yet make mee to forget and leaue him. You haue vanquished (O Caesar) you haue vanquished Marke An- thony, by power, and by a great number of your Legions; you haue surmounted him by the wisdom of your Councils: the strength of the Empire hath cast him downe, from which hee was farre gone, and whereof he made not any reckoning;

your vertues haue ouerthorne him, or rather he hath bene ruined by his owne vices. For an Egyptian woman charmed and enchanted him; the delights of Eg- ypt made him too soft and delicate, yea, he was wholly effeminately drowned in the Alexandrian luxuries. In briefe, hee hath bene conquered, because he better affected to be cast downe with Cleopatra, then to conquer without her: and so to be delected by a woman, was more gree- uous and insupportable to his friends, the- euer it could be to his enemies.

I aduised him, to vntwine himselfe from that wretched woman, and to bee the death of a beast so dangerous; I pro- mised him succour in his affaires, and for- sooke to preuaile by in his fight: yea, I offered to beare him company in this warre. But the miserable man, was so doating on the beauties of that woman, and meere- ly enchanted by Cleopatra, as hee is brought to be iust nothing, by reason that he wold not beleue me. I confesse (Great Ce- sar) that I am also conquered with him, but yet my offence is not so great. for al- though Cleopatra quite quailed, and made a dishonourable prey of poore Anthony, yet he had not the like power ouer mee: And as hee would not abandon that bar- barous wanton woman, euen so could not I forgoe my great friend in his aduer- sities. It was hee that did crowne a Royall Crowne on my head, neuertheless, I would not bee so bold to appeare in your presence, with the ornaments I recei- ued from so loyall a friend, fearing to offend you by those fauours which hee did to me: & yet, although I haue left off my known lueries of dignity, I haue not lost a iote of my gracefull in courage. You may iudge therefore as it shall seeme best to your selfe; for what euer sentence you pronounce on me, yet I am sure to carry this reputation with mee, and to my no meane contentment; that I was good and perfect in mine affections; that I left not my friend in life nor death, and neither good or bad fortune had power to ouer- throw me,

Monstrous is therefore, when a man le- ues a loyall friend, and leaues to the bea- st all the ornaments of a laudable woman.

There is no- thing compa- rable to the mis- ere affliction of one man to another; it is much far be- yond the loue of women.

If Princes would banish flatterers, they being about them, their Mischief would be the more glorious and glorious.

CHAP. XI. The magnanimous answer of Augustus to Herod, confirming him in his dignity, whereby is demonstrated, that a Prince ought rather to affect truth spoken by his friend, then feigned flattery, coming from the mouth of a dissembling counterfeiter. And therefore Augustus perceiving how feely Herod had spoken to him, confiding himselfe rather his enemy, then ingratefull towards Marke Anthony, and taking delight in his libertie of speech, as proceeding from a generous and royall heart, returned him this answer following.

Heuuen protect thee Herod, and enjoy at this instant (better then euer before) the honour of thy Kingdome. For we enuy not thy virtues, neither doth it dispelase vs, that thou shouldst be such a man as thou art: but rather it is to vs most high contentment. And truly, thou art well worthy to rule & command, seeing thou hast so loyally kept thy faith giuen to a man onely, and being put in distresse, and assailed with aduerstities; yet thou art not ashamed to confesse thy selfe the friend to Marke Anthony, and such as thou wast to him in his prosperitie, such diddest thou continue still to him when his fortune fell contrary. Now, albeit I haue conquered Anthony, yet I neuer thought to overcome thee: for thy friendship remaining so entire, placeth thee in ranke with them that haue wonne the victory. Which is the reason, that I no lesse wish thee for my friend, then I praise and commend thy stedfast loyalty, because no changes of Fortune, haue power to alter thy minde and desires.

Thou neuer didst abandon Anthony, but it was he that estranged himselfe from thee: for he better affected to follow the counsels of Cleopatra, then them of so deare and true a friend as Herod. The ignorance of Anthony is the reason of my winning thee: for hee made choise of a pernicious and foolish woman, and rejected a most worthy loyall friend. And yet it is no matter of meruaile, that Anthony should be vanquished by Cleopatra, and keepe himselfe wholly with her: seeing that being victorious, yet hee would needs become a voluntary slave. Could you account it strange, that Cleopatra should turne Anthony from your counsels, seeing she could separate him from me, and of being my fellow-Companion in the Empire, caule him to become my mortall enemy? Seeing therefore, that with mee you haue lost Marke Anthony; with mee I purpose you shall liue and raigne.

And trust me, your commendable and insigne enterprize deserveth great recompence, and is worthy (by vs) to bee highly guerdoned: considering that while wee were busied in the late pasted warres, you haue overcome and subiected the Barbarians, although they seemed to be unconquerable. For we reputed them to bee our enemies, and so we do make account of all those that are aduerser to the Iewish Nation, and such as molest them, must know that they make warre with vs. You haue therefore fought for vs, and for vs you haue wonne the victory; in which respect, we permit you to reigne, and grant you the kingdome which you possesse: Commanding, that by our donation it shall be confirmed to you, and established durable, your merite being not little, because you haue made no diminution thereof. Also in further recompence, I will deale in such sort with you, as you shall haue no cause to wish for the presence of Marke Anthony: esteeming it altogether vnbecoming vs, if hauing (while hee liued) overcome him in warre, being now dead, we should not go beyond him in acknowledgement and friendship.

THE EFFECT.

Caesar and Herod hauing thus discorsed together, Augustus, to shew what account he made of this great Warriour Herod: did set a Royall Crowne vpon his head, and confirmed him in his authority, with hope to enlarge the limas of his kingdome. As likewise hee did afterward, hauing obserued, how Herod acknowledged the benefits of his Maestie, when as he furnished him with water and victualles, at such time as a great dearth and scarcity was in the Romane Army. From whence Caesar being returned, hee gaue Townes and Castles on the Sea to Herod, and accepted him as one of his best friends, which he had in the East.

CHAP. XIII. The Oration of Herod to the Iewes, vpon the partage or diuiding of his Seigneuries, to be made to his children.

THE ARGUMENT.

Like as Herod was happy in his warlike enterprizes, so did bad fortune follow him in the domestike Affaires of his house, for hauing children of diuers beds, the humors also of them being as diuers: caused the Palace Royall to bee daily filled with quarrels and dissensions, according as flatterers were heard, and fauoured by Herod. Now, the matters grew so farre, that the King and one of his sonnes, named Antipater (who was his eldest) must go to Rome to declare their grieuances; where Antipater behaued himselfe so well, that hee wonne the Emperour, and qualified the anger of his Father, who recued him into grace againe. Nevertheless, Caesar ordained, that children should be obedient to their fathers; or that it should be lawfull for Fathers, to declare him for King (after his decesse) that it stood best in his liking; because Antipater had accused his younger brethren, being issued of blood Royall on all sides, euen as well as he was borne: Herod not being as then in authority, but aspiring to the Crowne. So soone as the king was returned from Rome, he caused an assembly of the people of Ierusalem, to whom he declared what he had done in this voyage, saying these very Words.

When men become extremely unkind, all man's countenance turns to them.

Contention, quarrell, and dissidence in children, are no meane notices of griefe to their parents.

NOt without great occasion, and that very beneficiall to my selfe (you Hebrew Citizens) did I make my voyage vnto Rome, to the end that Caesar might iudge, concerning the quarrell betwene me and my children. To him I went, because my selfe knew not how, neither would I take vpon me to censure a cause, wherein I might easily faile, by being transported with choller: & therefore he that gaue me the Kingdome, I thought fittest to ordaine, concerning the succession, and to bestow it on such a one of my sonnes, whom he should conceiue to be the worthiest. Now, among so many benefices as I received from him, this he added to them, that in a great difficulty, he did so facilitate the matter, that he gaue me my sonne againe, whom I had well-nere lost, and accorded the brethren together, vpon the difference growing betwene them, touching succession in the kingdome. You see mee then returned, farre richer then before I went; for I haue learned to be a better Father, then formerly I haue bene; and my children also are tutor'd to beare themselves in better manner to me, and all this hath happened through the grace and mildnes of Great Augustus. For, he hath appointed, that the appenage of my sonnes, and their succession in the kingdome, shall depend vpon mine owne will; to the end, that the prerogatiue and aduancement of which of them soeuer it be, shall not breed any pride or presuming in anie one of them. Hee hath permitted me, to choose such a successor as I will haue, to wit, he that shall be the most obedient to me, and giueth the greatest honor to his Father.

Now, concerning my selfe (O you my loving Citizens of Ierusalem) I will follow heerein the iudgment of Caesar, who seeing my younger sonnes from the accusation laide vpon them; hath made them equall to the eldest in hope, that (one day) they may succede after me. In which respect, this very day, I make and declare them Kings all three together, the eldest hauing the priuiledge, in regard of his age, and the other because of their Nobility in blood. I would not haue you moued at the number of Princes, considering that the greatnesse and magnificence of the kingdome, sufficient to maintaine and furnish effectually a far greater number, although there were no more aduantages. First of all, I make God the Iudge of this my aduice and ordinance; & next, I would haue you to be witnesses and testifiers thereof; to the end, that you may honor them according to right, & equally them that Caesar hath accorded, and whom my selfe (being their father) do establish and appoint vnto you as Princes. To whom also you may doe such honor, as shall not exceede the bounds of reason in ouer-much esteeming them; and yet in no lesse fashion then belongeth to them. For too much honour puffes vp the heart with presumption, and neglect or contempt causeth rage and choller. Wherefore, I would haue that dutie doe vnto them, as appertaineth to the merits deliuered from them: for you cannot giue so much content to him, who is honoured aboue his deserts, as you doe harme to him, to whom dutie is denied vnderfeudly. Oftentimes, it cometh so to passe, that both the one and other are offended, in regard it is meet flattery, which occasioneth the indiscreete sentence of preference.

Beside, let me further say freely to you, that

Too much honouring a man, maketh him insolent, and contempt is the meane to make him mad.

He is a true friend indeed that continueth alwayes one and the same in all conditions.

that I am the common father to them all three, and you know well enough, that honor done to the Children, redoundeth the more to the Fathers glory. Notwithstanding, if there be any, that shall flatteringly honor my sonnes beyond reason, they make themselves guilty of treason to them: because they shall proue Authours of the reciduation and rebellion, for the which we fell at first into difference. In making too much esteeme of our youth, is to giue it too free a heart and head, and boldnesse in attempting beyond capacity: yet let no man thinke, that I am enuieus of the advancement and glorie of mine owne Childre. No, heaven is my witnesse, how I rather with their power meane and stirred, whereby wee may the better liue in peace; then in growing ouer-great, to swell vp their hearts as high, and thereby spend the rest of our dayes in troubles and seditions. For, that which is established by pride and insuasion, hath but small and slender continuance, and slippeth away sodainly, but that which is possessed with loue and gracious liking, it hath as good and successfull enduring.

What Pride
buildeth, Presumption ouer throweth.

I will therefore bee carefull in taking order, that my Kindred and Friends may bee the pledges of peace and concord for ever hereafter, betwene mee and my Sonnes; by whose exhortations and admonitions, they will bee moued to loue and cherish one another. For, as an euill purpose makes a deep wound in the heart of him that heares it tolde him: euen so, much more are they corrupted, who are made drunke by them that dayly frequent it, and whose soules are continually infected by so foule a plague; so that the contagion spreades it selfe ouer all them, that then are about, or come into their company.

Although a man be (by nature) very courteous and peaceable; yet, let a Lake or Poole be neuer so calme and still, when impetuous windes throwe their churlish blastes vpon it, it will swell, and shewe a discontented countenance. In the very same manner, are the mildest Natures of men madded, and quite peruered by the meanes of lewd and wicked Counsellors. In breief, it is on mee that all my Subiects must fixe their expectation, and there assuredly settle their confidence: for whatsoeuer aduancement happeneth to my Sonnes; yet so it is, that I will not lose a iote of mine authority and power. And when all is saide, there is not a Captaine or soldier, but w^l I expresse more reuerence to the father of Conductors and Generals, then to them that command ouer the whole Army.

It is my selfe alone, without any other, that will bee the discharge of all, and will onely recompence them, who hauing done their dutie vnto mee, shall acknowledge what seruices they haue done to my Sonnes. If I finde dutie performed without peruering; no doubt but deferred recompence will follow thereon; but deceipte and cogging shall finde such reward, and so surely paie him, that he will vterly lose all the fruit of his labor, and that which he fawned for by knauish flattery.

Now, as concerning you (my good and deere Sonnes) fasten your first regard vpon the common bond of nature, which vnitheth brute beastes together, and cauech their alliance to keepe such a mutual agreement: as there is not any beast so vntactable, but with the perill of his life, hee will stroue and labour to defend his young ones from danger. Carry honour and reuerence to Cesar, who hath reconciled you together; and next, haue regard of mee, and of the Honour which is due vnto mee; who had much rather pray wee to doe so, then to command it to be done, albeit you know that it still remaineth in my power to Command.

Continue in the bond which you haue knit together; you are brethren, I would not haue you breake that vniou, neyther to be the occasion of disioyning that for which ye were borne. I shall giue you Habites, Attendants, and Royall honors, but much more precious is that whereto I exhort ye, inuincible amity, being vnited together in one and the same will. If you declare such mutual affection, your authoritie will bee the more acceptable vnto mee: but amity sayling, you dart your malice thorow my heart, and thorow the very foule of Kingly Gouvernement.

You shall enioy all that is goodly and pleasing in the dignitie Royall, as Princes of the blood: but concerning the charges of the Empire, and troublesome burthen of State-affayres, they shall lye vpon me, though it were better to cun ber many, then one onely. By this meanes, it shall bee very profitable for you, to accomodate your selues to that which I haue desired: because I loue the glorie which should fill thine in you, and which I truly account to be mine owne.

THE EFFECT.

Herod hauing deliuered all these speeches, and greatly comforted his sons, howsoeuer some reioyce thereat, as not discerning so far off, that which was hidden vnder these words: yet the better sort felt themselves offended. For they perceived, that this equality serued but for a sparke, to kindle the concealed fire in the breasts of the brethren, who could not indure any aduantages, how little soeuer, especially hauing all but one and the same prerogative. So that this proued to be the cause of ruine to one another, as also of distrust and extreme cruelty in King Herod.

CHAP. XIII.

The Battaile of Riotta or Nouara, which was fought in the Dukedome of Milan, betwene Iohn Trivulzi, and the Lord of Trimouille, Generals for Lewes the xij. King of France, on the one side, and Maximilian Storza, Duke of Milan, accompanied with the Switzers, on the other, in the yeare 1513.

The King for a leile of Milan, was the occasion
of this warre.

Lewes King of FRANCE, the twelfth of that name, ill digesting the losse of Milan, and som other disgraces formerly received, made his election of two speciall Captaines, well experienced in martiall affaires, and also of no meane authority; the Lords Trivulzi and Trimouille, to passe the Alps, and enter Italy. A further choise was likewise made, for the more happy successe in this attempt, of Robert de la Marche, whom hee sent for out of the Countrey of Luca, and his blacke Regiment of Germans by some termed Allemaignes, as also the Lord Lewes Beaumont, who came from the Frontiers of Nauarre, and brought with him those famous bands of Cascoignes, that had before serued Seigneur de la Palice at Panipelen, when they fought against the Spaniards. Some few Ensignes of foot (but of very choice men) were intermingled with them; for such Gentlemen as serued not with horse, held it no disgrace, thus to be employed on foote, and went vnto it with chearefull alacritie. Al which power being very aptly appointed, and furnished with great Ordinance vnto their owne good liking, they halted away with speed for Italy.

On the contrary side, the Duke of Milan, named Maximilian Storza, understanding this French preparation made for him; he was not negligent in his owne occasions: but moued the Switzers to reuise Lombardy, as in some former expeditions they had done, and to friend him with their manly assistance, in which motion he purchased no deniall. The Ammans, or they that beare the Office of Maiores, in the Cantons of Vri, Suits, and Vnderwald, as lying nereest vnto Italy, with their warlike powers, were the first that passed ouer the Alpes: being seconded or followed by the like bands of Gliris, Zug, Lucerna, Schaffouse, Zurich, and Berne, and these made vp another martiall company. The third and last confort, consisted of five thousand foot, conducted by Altofasco, a most expert and forward captain. But Maximilian became somewhat discouraged, by an vnexpected reuolt of Sacroras Visconti, that did keepe a swarme of desperate fellows about him in Milan, all errant vnthriftes, though leaning to Nobility, and others beside; and therefore ioynd with the first company of Switzers, going to Nouara, expecting there (yet free from priuy awais and

Before the Towne of Nouara, came the French Forces, yet hearing that the second supply of Switzers was somewhat neerer, and that Altosaxo was at Galvritia; they retreated to Rionta, which was about some twenty Furlonges from Nouara, hard by the River of Adara. No sooner were the second Conuoy of Switzers entred the Towne, and had they Mornings refection; but the Captaines called for a consultation, for concluding vpon matters fittest to be done: wherevpon, Caraffe, Amman of Zurich, offering the first motion of speech, began in this manner.

The Oration of Caraffe, Amman of Zurich.

*V*aliant, and invincible spiritued Brethren, let not the attempts which you have resolutely concluded on, coole through want of courage, or corruptly lose it selfe, in needlesse attending for Altosaxo, & such as come with him. For it hath ever bene knowne, that the surest and happiest way to fortunate successe, is to stifle delay with speedy expedition; and so we shall finde it, if wee have the providence to pursue it: Nor neede we, whose courage and constancy stand equal, by kissing each other, listen to any other recreant word, but onely braue and speedy expedition: lest the day shining now fauourably for vs, cloud it selfe in our lingering, and so we lose our glorious expectation. Occasion is yet offered vs, and we may take hold on his happy forelocke; for, it is not number, but Noblesse of minde that gives honor to the actions vsse. A handfull is enow for a heaped multitude, and while hope holds them, that Altosaxo is our Lead-starre, and we dare doe nothing till he shine out with vs, they may be deceiued in their idle supposition, & we more then matters of so good advantage. Let therefore their erroneous conceits, lead vs the way to true discipline, for a so daime and vnexpe-cted onset, strikes terror in an enemies soule, and followes him both with flight and slaughter. Let their overweening pride cumber them, and take we hold on this happy and beneficial counsel: which guides ye to vndoubted victory, if with dreadlesse hearts you ply to pursue it.

No sooner had Caraffe come vnto his speeches period, but all the Captains and Ensignes consented to him, and a graue consultation grew immediately, for best proceeding in their purpose. Hereupon, refection and rest was generally commended; and after the second watch, present repaite vnto their Colours; where before day-dawning they should bee acquainted with other instructions. Imagine heere (as well you may) that euery minde fast musing with serious conceits, what issue the intended fight would fort vnto; & by this time the Sun was set. But now listen to a wonder, and truly no lesse in mine opinion. The Dogges which the French had brought to field with them, quite leauing their Campe, all in a troope together entred Nouara, and the Switzers Centinels, with such as walked the round, or kept the Corps du Guard; the dogs lawning on the one after another, euen as if they were already become their Masters, or shortly should, laide downe their eares, wagged their tailes in louing manner, and licked their hands.

But the Switzers, not intending to haue their priuate cogitations discouered, cunningly gaue order, that in euery part of the City, now at one place, then at another, Drums should still be beaten; that if any scouts or spies tooke notice of them, they should the easier bee periwaded of their sodaine coming forth, as also to continue their enemies in Armour skill; they hauing all the day before bin to prepared, and on horseback. Thus they thaped their outward designes, while they closer determinations aimed at other ends, as to strengthen their bodies with food & rest, and to win another daies respite more for their better contestation in trial of honor. And let me tell yee, that the Lawes are so strict and seuerer among the Switzers, that if any shal dare (in publicke view of the Armie) to do any thing cowardly, or with feare, shameful & vnriting men of valour; he is immediately slaine by his following fellow, so that the greater feare confounds the lesse, and begets an honorable death, in stead of that which is otherwise attended on with nothing but infamy.

The Switzers
were carefull
for being the last opportunity.

The Army consisting of about 9000. foote, made choise of a thousand Horfile beside, men of well tryed and vndaunted valour, to take the charge of eight Faulcons, and to keepe with Maximilian and his Horfile (which indeede were but few, yet of the cheefe Nobility): while the rest did throw themselves into two batailles, and silently, without beating any Drum, marched towards the enemy two seuerall wayes.

Now Trivulzi, being reputed for a wise and well experienced Captaine, suspected nothing lesse, then that a few tyred foote, and also before Altosaxo came; would venture out vpon a stronger power, or hazard any the least fortune of battaile. But vnderstanding that the Enemy was within sight, he cald vnto Trimouille and the other Captaines, giuing order for placing the Ordinance, the signals for fight to be giuen, and what hee knew by discipline or experience, to wait vpon the need of danger.

Such was the shortnesse of time, and the courage of the foe so mounted for fight, that the French scarcely had leisure to bridle their horses, & arm their heads: for they had stood most part of the day & night in Armes, expecting stil what shold be commanded, and at last (though very late) newes coming, that all was whist and quiet at Nouara, had got into theyr Cabines to rest. But the Light-horfile being sooner ready then they looked for, yssued forth in time conuenient, making a long Wing to the left handwarde, and met the thousand Switzers as they were marching on. And they, for more safely shunning the great Ordinance, which played vpon them tempestuously, fetcht a small compas about towards the River of Mora, with intent to passe a Bridge, & so fet on the enemies tents in the rere. So marching in a broad way towards the Ruer, they were hotly rent and torne with the Ordinance, and mightily pressed also with the light horfile.

But then Mottina, whose courage could not be quailed, changed his former resolution, and entreated Duke Maximilian, (being then in great danger, by reason that the Epirotes insulued round about him) to leaue the fight, and returne to the City instantly, that so the warres mayne head might be kept, which lay open vnto

the tyranny of chanches, and there to await the successe of expected victory. Maximilian made an honourable refusal; for such was the constancy of his courage, as he would endure all common accidents of Fortune, rather then be blurd with the least disgrace.

Heereupon, two vnder Captains, and two Ancients seized his horse by the bridle, and renting the Crest from off his Helmet, threw an olde cloake about him to hide his Armes, and forcing him (whether he would or no) led him out of the field with a troope of Horfile, and so conducted him to the City, to stand cleare from danger, while they endured the brunt of the day. Afterward Mottina rallied his swaying battell, which (by this time) hadde lost three of their Faulcons; then retiring the wounded into the midst of the battell, and beating back the over-forward Epirotes, slew there Alexio Bogisna, a noble Grecian Captaine, and so defeated them vnto.

Then rushing into the enemies campe, where the drudges and dragglers beeing slaine, and the soldiers of that station disordered; the carriage and baggage were surprized. But some little while before Mottina had thus preuailed, another company, that tooke a longer iourney through the Corne-fields, then growne vp, and receyuing little harme by the Ordinance, had made a fresh charge on the Enemies side.

The French forces were ordered into three battallions, Trimouille and De la March hauing the leading of the winges, and Trivulzi the middle Regiment, or maine battaile. As for the Launce-quetts Battallion, they had got themselves within a ditch, and betweene the batailles of the Horfile, because their Trench being a new and somewhat admirable kinde of Workmanship, deuised by Robert de la March, to hemme them in against the chances of warre: vpon so sodaine a coming of the enemy, could not by any meanes bee fet vp and pitcht. The Switzers bringing their Batailles about towards the right hand, and vpon this Squadron of the Germaines or Allemaignes, very courageously turned to them; perceiving that victory would soone bee wonne, hauing once defeated the cheefest force of the Enemies Armie.

Which the French Captains beholding, gave present order to discharge their great Ordinance vpon them, breaking through the ranks, with mighty slaughter, the Horſe alſo comming hotely on them on the left ſide. The Ammans of Berne and Zug were ſlaine in this confuſion, which nothing diſmayed their ſouldiers courage, nor their owne vnauoydable perill, and wofull hauocke of theyr Fellowes about them; but chearfully animating themſelves, and wheeling round into a ring, propelled the Horſe very valiantly and (as before they had concluded) ſuddenly getting ouer the ditch, ſet vpon the Allemaignes courageouſly. Now began a fierce and bloody fight, no noiſe or words ſpoken on either ſide; but onely a diſmall claiſhing of Weapons and armor, and the ſoft ſighes of ſuch as fell downe dead, giuing their laſt adiew vnto the world.

Where both

The Allemaignes, that they might reuenge the ſlaughter of their country-men the yeare before at Pavia; and now (by new renouwe) redeeme their glorie loſt fourteen yeares paſt at Bruderholz, on the confines of Baſile, fought very fiercely. And the Switzers that they might yer (one day) deſtroy their olde and peculiar enemies, fellowes that had runne out of Germany, and (in reproach to the Emperour) ſerued the French King; were not a jot behinde them, either in ſtrength, or feruency of courage.

Now, while the Switzers and Allemaignes fought thus at the puſh of pike, Newes came to Trivulzi and Trimouille, that the bagges and baggage were taken; thoſe that were appointed for keeping the campe alſo ſlaine, beſide tumult and ſlaughter in euery place. Which report ſo daunted the French, that a great part of their horſe (euery man being careful for his luggage) ran (without any command) to ouercome it againe.

A ſtratagem of the Switzers
to beguile
the French.

In another quarter alſo, & at the ſame inſtant almoſt, the company or battalion of the Switzers, ſhewd themſelves at the front of the French, which Battallion (while the French hadde (in vaine) diſcharged their Ordinance into a Wood ſtanding before them, in regard that the Switzers (to deceiue the enemy) had poſitively left a few of the drudges amongſt the trees, as making a ſhew of ambuſhed armed men) had cloſely crept along by a ſide way, by little and little ſloppings downe, and trayling their Pikes vpon the ground after them.

Now, ſo great was their contempt of the bullets flying about them, and the charge ſo dreadfull, that the French and Nauurine foote (their Captaine Beaumont being ſlaine) two bands alſo of Gentwyses and Salucians defeated, and theyr Ordinance taken, and turned vpon their backs that fled; the Allemaignes now beeing almoſt quite deſtroyed, their Tents taken, the enemy overthrowing all, and largely Lords of the field; betwene ſhame and feare turned their backs. VVhen all men were thus diſmayed, the Captaines yet continued fearleſſe (conſidering the fearfullneſſe of their preſent eſtate) and went ralliing the diſordered ranks, and turning themſelves vnto the cryes of theyr Companions, made them to abide and fight.

The vnder Officers and Ancients, entreated them for to exempt all feare, the Lancelqueters bare the brunt of the battell, and the fight began to be repaired in all places. But the horſemen, nothing moued with their Captaines encouraging words, ſhamefully fled. For the Switzers although their Captaine Mottins was ſlaine by a piece of Ordinance; yet, hauing gotten the Campe, ſet fiercely and bloodily on the left ſide of the Horſe, & likewiſe on the right, and then on theyr backs came a greater power with terrible Pikes, to the no little terror of the diſordered horſe.

In repairing the field, there perished Montſalmon, Captaine to the Duke of Albanies company of horſe, and Coriolano Trivulzi, a young Gentleman of ſingular hope. But, the Allemaignes loſing haſte their men, two Enſignes, and their General Floranges very greenouſly hurt, had fought moſt conſtantly a long while together: but perceiving now the Horſe to forſake them, the foote in euery quarter to bee defeated, and the great Ordinance taken, accounting flight to be very thankfull, yet void of ſecuritie; ſet the points of their weapons vpright, according to their viſual manner, and yielded, ſeeking mercy of the victor enemy. thorough with deadly ſorrow, beholding his two ſonnes, the Lords Floranges and Gemeſe engirt by the enemy, and meerly in deſperate danger of life: with a troope of Horſe, boldly brake into the miſdeſt of the enemies battell, and they lying among the mangled bodies halfe dead, pittifully embred with their owne blood and woundes, laying them ouerthwart the neckes of two Horſes; to his no little prayſe, both for manly proweſſe and fatherly pittie, woorthily brought them thence, preſeruing theyr liues for future renouwe, and in a farre more fortunate field.

Thus the Switzers, fighting in three ſeueral Squadrons or Companies, within the compaſſe of an houre and a halfe, or thereabout, perfected a moſt memorable famous battayle, and vveightie warre.

And although their enemies lay ſlaine before theyr faces, ſtored with goodlie and rich Furniture, which was able to allure them: yet would they make no ſeyſure on the ſpoyle, but kept within care of their Country Discipline, which permits not to take any armed man priſoner in the battaile, neither to follow him that flyeth.

This made them to ſtand ſtill a great part of the day, as doubting leaſt the French, prouoked eyther by pollicie in their Captaines, or their owne ſhame; ſhould retreat backe againe, and take them at aduantage in deſpoyling the dead. But this feare was much more diſcrete then needefull, becauſe the Enemy kept on ſtill in flight, and Trivulzi gallopping too and fro, confounded with extremity of duſt and hoarſeneſſe in crying to them, was vterly vnable, eyther by ſoule or faire perſuaſions, or the commanding Authoritie of a Generall, to ſtay the Enſignes or the Horſe, that throwing away their Lances, ſtroue with greateſt eagerneſſe, who ſhould bee foremoſt.

It is reported, that the whole troops of French Horſe might haue bene vterly overthrowne and ſpoyled in theyr flight, if Duke Maximilian had made an oppoſition but with two hundred light Horſe: for there was not a French-man that carried a Lance beyonde Seſſithes, ſuch was their heate and haſt to be gone.

And yet within a ſhort while after, Stenis Sabello, and Corradino Cribelly, with certaine light Horſe, purſued them vnto the Towne of Treſcato: but the Conradines and Peazzants, flocking amaine out of the Fieldes and Hamlets to the ſpoyle, made a moſt cruell ſlaughter where anie bootie was to be had, at hedges, ditches, and all other places, that hindered the tired French in their flight.

The ſame day the Switzers, gathering together the ſlaine bodies of their countrymen, carryed them on their ſhoulders into the Cittie, to giue them the laſt honour of buriall. Amongſt them, were ſlaine a thouſand and three hundred, ſeaſen hundred beeing torne with the great pieces of Ordinance, and almoſt as many were wounded, but of the French were ſlaine eight thouſand of all degrees.

Duke Maximilian, not a little ioyfull of ſuch fortunate ſucceſſe, ſummoned the Souldiours together, and ioyſo confounding ſpeech, as he was ſcarſe able to vter a worde; which appeared by the teares trickling downe his cheekes, gaue them all moſt hearty thanks; and, as a gift of inſtant benefite and pleaſure, all the Vicualles then taken, beſide the Ordinance and generall ſpoyle, hee frankly beſtowed vpon them. As for the admirable Trench, wherein conſiſted ſuch vndoubted hope of Victorie, inuented by a warlike witte, brought ouer the Alpes with much labour, and great charge: that being taken from the enemy, was ſet vp in a publique place, for a future Monument of that victorie: and this deceyued the Allemaignes moſt, that they holde it vterly needleſſe to erect their Trench that day, which lay ſtill in the Waggon, becauſe ſucceſſe ſeemed then to crowne on the enemy.

Vpon Conference had afterwards with Trimouille at Bologna, concerning all theſe matters; he did not friuoliouſly impute the fault vnto Trivulzi, for not encamping on his owne groundes (as Trimouille had perſwaded him) in regard of ſpoyling the Graſſe, which then at that time was ready to bee mowne. But Trivulzi, as a man neuer conquered before, yet diſputing on ſeueral cuncts hapning in the battaile, threw the maine error on aduerſe fate, which too much enuyed his worth and renowne. And hee faide very truly, that men, made more then mad, by cowardly and degenerate feare, in the cheefest heate and fury of fight; are no way able to be restrained or ordered, by the best or most skillfull Capitaine that euer liued.

CHAP. XIII.

Of the force of sudden Chances and unexpected Euent, for the disposition as well of mans power, as of his policy: And of the hazards and doubtfull euent of Battails, and other enterprizes of Warre.

Although the successe of mens affairs is most vncertaine, variable, & subiect to infinit changes and hazards; yet in nothing so much as in matters, wherein mans power is most seene, to wit, in matters of warre, whereof the euent is so doubtfull and dangerous, that (as Iason saide to Epimandarus) He is not wise that doth not feare them. And therefore it is reported of Phocion, a most excellent Capitaine of the Athenians, that although hee was chosen five and forty times Generall of their armies; yet hee himselfe did euer perswade the to peace, as fearing the successe of warre. And Hanniball hauing bene for 16 yeares victorious in Italy, and forced at the length to defend his owne country, which was Carthage (where Scipio the Romane had already ouerthrowne two great armies of the Carthaginians, and was ready also to present him battaile) he doubted so much the euent thereof, that crauing conference with Scipio, he sought to perswade him to peace, representing vnto him the hazard of warre, and aduising him to consider in the prosperous course of his victories, not onely what had happened to other men, but also what might ensue to himselfe, & that to make peace was in his own hands, but if he came once to the battaile, the victory should bee in the hands of God. And lastly, that Nusquam minus quam in bello euentus rependunt. The euent of things do no where lesse answer the expectation of men, then in warre.

Thus spake Hanniball, who may also well serue for an example of his owne admonitions. For though he had bin many yeares together, the scourge of the Romans, and the most famous and renowned Capitaine then liuing, yea, and was (as it were) growne old with victories in forreigne Countries, euen before the very gates of Rome; yet was hee at length vterly ouerthrowne by a Romane, a young man, inferior to him in reputation, experience, and forces, and in that battaile which most imported him, and wherein (by the iudgement of all men) he employed all the endeour, military arte and skill he had, or which could bee required in a most prudent and valiant Capitaine.

This change and decay of fortune in war, may be exemplified in many others, as famous Captaines as euer were; as in the worthy Iudas Mithabenus, Cyrus, king of Persia; Pyrrhus, king of Egyptus; Marcellus; Pompeius Magnus; Marcus Antonius, Competitor of Augustus Caesar; the Emperour Constantinus; and Heracles; Belisarius; Edward the third, King of England; our famous Countinman, John Talbot, the first Earle of Shrewsbury, whose name is yet terrible to the French; the great Earle of Warwicke, in the time of Edward the fourth; Charles, Duke of Bourgonne; Nicholas Pricimice; Lewes the 12. king of France; and now lastly (in our memory) the Emperour Charles the first. All which (with many other whom I omit for breuities sake) hauing by many notable victories got the fame and renowne of most famous Captaines, were eyther at last disgraciously killed, or else receyued some great ouerthrowes, or had (at least) some notorious decay of their former and wonted prosperous successe.

The consideration hereof, had mooued diuers most valiant Captaines, to auoide the aduenture of battaile as much as might be, and rather seek to overcome their enemies by stratagems, practises, and delays: as L. Fabius Maximus, who (by such meanes) distressed Hanniball, much more then others could do by main battailes. And therefore Emilius the Poet saide of him; Cunctando restituit rem; He repaired the State of the Romanes by delays. And it is also written of the valiant Franciscus Sforza Duke of Milaine, that he would neuer ioyne battaile with an enemy, but when hee could not otherwise choofe.

And Lewes the eleuenth, K. of France (who was no lesse valourous in war, then prudent in peace) feared nothing more, as Philip de Commynes testifieth, then the hazard of warre; and especially of a battaile, which by all meanes possible hee sought to auoid. In somuch, that when any enemy entered France; hee procured to make peace or truce with him, whatsoeuer it cost him. As appeared when Edward the fourth King of England was ther with a strong Armie, to whom he gaue a great summe of ready money, and granted to pay him a tribute of fiftie thousand Crownes a yeare, besides diuers pensions to his Councillors, and other hard conditions; rather then hee would hazard a battell with him, knowing the casualtie thereof, and that as Commynes saith, Une bataille perdue a mauuaise querelle; A battaile lost hath an ill taile or consequence. For it redoubleth the hope and courage of the Victors; it astonisheth and discourageth the vanquished; it shaketh the fidelity of subiects; it ministreth matter and opportunity of conspiracie to malecontents, of reuolt to Townes, and of alienation to confederates, who commonly sway with the good successe. And for this cause, not onely King Lewes the eleuenth, but also other wise Princes haue vsed, when an enemy hath bin ready to enter their countreys: to dismante all the Townes in his way that were not tenable, and to fortifie and make strong therest, retrying thither all the Cattle and prouision of the countrey, and destroying all the Corne vpon the ground, thereby to consume him with famine, long siedades, and all kindes of delays whatsoever, rather then seek to ouerthrow it by a maine battaile. This was very prudently practised by Frances the first, King of France, at such time as the Emperour Charles determined to enter into Provence, with a great and puissant army: in somuch, that when K. Frances vnderstoode, that the people of the Countrey resisted the destruction of theyr Corne, and other commodities; he straight way sent his armie to destroy it. Whereby the Emperour finding all Townes fortified, and no prouision abroad was left them, were forced (after hee had besiedged Marseilles some certaine moneths) to retire himselfe for lack of victuals.

And this I haue thought good to signify by the way, for that Philip de Commynes, and Martin du Bellay (both of them notable Historiographers, and Councillors, the first to Lewes 11. and the other to Frances the first) do greatly approve this manner of proceeding in these Princes, and propose it for a rule of state to all such Kings & Princes, as, being in possession their Kingdomes and States, are invaded by Forreiners; though for those that invade and seeke to conquer, Philip de Commynes, thinketh it meete and conuenient to seeke battaile, to make short worke, by reason of the difficulty to bee succoured, and of the infinite dangers & inconueniences, which happen by delays to an armie of strangers in foraine countreys. Besides, hee that inuadeth and seeketh to conquer, commonly aduentureth no more but his present armie, and that in hope to gaine a Crowne, whereas the Prince in possession, aduentureth his whole state against nothing, and a state is lost (many times) with the losse of a battaile at home, if the victory bee well followed.

But now let vs returne to speake of fodaine Chances, and to touch some particularities, thereby to shew very manifestly and evidently, the weaknesse of mans wit and power, and the casualty of warlike attempts.

Let vs first and formost consider, by howe many accidents the mightiest armies are many times quite disperfed and dissipated, and the greatest enterprizes ouerthrowne: as sometimes it falleth out by the death of some one man, sometimes by the dissention of Leaders and Captaines amongst themselves, sometimes by the mutiny of souldiers, sometimes by means of a Tempest or vnseasonable weather; sometimes agayne by plagues, or other discases in the Campe; and sometimes againe (as Guicardin noteth in his second Booke) by a commandement eyther not well vnderstood, or ill executed; by a little temeritie or disorder, which may chaunce to happen by some vaine worde or speech, euen of the meanest Souldiour. And last of all (faith hee) by infinite chances which happen at vnwares, vnpossible to beefore-seene and preuented, by the witor counsell of any Captaine.

Heereto I also adde out of Commines, that be the counsell neuer so well taken, and the plot neuer so well layed: yet it is neuer or seldom executed in the fieelde, as it is ordayned in the Chamber. And that sometimes, by the least motions or occasions that may bee, the victorie is wonne or lost: Which (saith hee) is a great Mystery, whereby Kingdomes and States do rise or fall. And hereupon, the selfe-same Authour groundeth two Conclusions, no lesse piously then wisely. The one, that no humane wit is able (of it selfe) sufficiently to gouerne an Army of men: and the other, that God reserueth to himselfe the successe of battels and disposeth of his victory at his will and pleasure.

This will be made cleare by examples, by the which, I will first of all shewe the force of sodaine chances in battaile, and other enterprizes of Warre. And after that all victorie proceedeth from the providence and haud of God, and not from the power and pollicie of mortall man. As concerning the first, we see many and sundry times, that great designements are broken, and potent armies dissolued by accidents, without any force or stroke of the Enemy. Vhen Leues the Emperour (called Leues of Bavaria) was in Italy, with a great and puissant armie, and readie to besiege Florence, vpon the confidence he had in the valor and assistance of Castruccio of Pisa, whom the Florentines feared more then any man liuing: it chanced that the sayde Castruccio dyed: whereupon, the Emperour broke his designement, and returned into Germanie with his army.

Also, in the time of the great Schisme which was holden betwixt Vrbane, the sixte Pope of that name, and Clement the false Pope, who was called Clement the seventh, and liued in Auignon: Leues Duke of Aniou, Vnckle vnto Charles the fixt, King of France, went into Italy with an huge armie, wherein hee hadde aboue thirtie thousand Horfse, partly to deliuer Rome, Queene of Naples, (who was besiedged by Charles Orsazzo, Nephew vnto Leues King of Hungary) and partly to depose Pope Vrbane, in fauour of Clement. When he had already entered into Italy, and began to make warre in the Territorie of Bologna (which belonged to the Church) and was likely in al mens opinion (by reason of his great forces) to obtaine his desire in all he pretended; he sodainly fell sicke and dyed; whereupon, all that mightie and innumerable army, disperfed and dissolued it selfe; and euery man returned from whence he came.

The like hath chanced diuers times, by some great plague and mortalitie in armies, as in that of the Christians, which beganne in Thunis in Africa, vnder the conduct and command of Leues, the ninth, King of France: which armie was so mollested with pestilence, that it was forced for to rise from the siege at such time, euen when the Towne was brought to extremitie, and must needs haue rendered it selfe within few daies.

Furthermore, such is the force of sodaine feares which fall vpon men, sometimes by meere chance, without anie iust cause, that the greatest armies are vterly ouerthrowne thereby. And no maruel seeing no man is so valiant, but that hee may bee seized and transported with a sodaine feare. And therefore the Lacedemonians, before they went forth to fight, were wont to sacrifice to the Muses, to obtaine their assistance, against the fierce and furious assaults of sodaine passions. VVhich taking reason many times at vnwares, and (as it were) at an aduantage, doe so oppress it, that they becaue a man of all iudgement and discourse for a time, and no passion more then feare. VVhereof I my selfe saw a notable experience, in a most valiant Spanishe Capitaine in France, which happened in the time of a League, who going out of his Garrison, with certayne Troopes vpon an occasion, and meeting with the Enemy by chance, where hee least suspected, tooke such a fright thereat, that he ranne home with might and maine, and tolde vs (for I was ther at the same instant time) that all the Souldiers were cut in peeces, and that hee himselfe elcaped very hardly. Neuerthelesse, within fise or sixe houres after, they all returned home safe, and not so much as any one man hurt, though they came scattering one after ano-

another, for they all fledde as well as he, and the rather by his example. VVhich would haue vterly disgraced him, if in very many occasions (before) hee had not got the reputation of one of the most valiant men of his Nation, in which respect it was rather wondered at in him, then blamed.

But to shewe the like effect of sodaine feare in whole Armies, vpon diuers accidents. When Arnulphus the Emperour besiedged Rome, it chanced, that a Hare (being started by some of the Camp) ran towards the Citie, and that a great number of the souldiers pursued her with very great rowt and cryes, which the Romans seeing from the Towne, and conceyuing that the enemy meant to giue some furious and violent assault thereto, were surprized with such a feare, that they abandoned the wals and Rampiers, and the enemy clyping, and taking the opportunity therof, scaled the walles, and tooke the Towne.

Also, when Sigismund, King of Hungary, (who was afterward Emperour) gaue battell to an Army of the Turkes, neere to Anopolis, and was assisted with exceeding great numbers of the French, and of diuers other Nations, the French Horfse being in the vanguard, and seeing themselves (after a while) hardly oppressed, alighted from their Horfles to fight on foote. But their Horfles being loose, ranne all backe toward the campe, which the Hungarians and others that were in the reere perceiuing, and imagining that the Horfse-men, were slaine; tooke such a fright therewith, that they ranne away, whereby the Turkes got a notable Victorie, with great slaughter of the Christians, especially of the French, who wer almost all slaine.

Also at Ptolonais in Egypt, which the Christians besieged two yeares together, the Suldane, who came with an armie to succour it, gaue them an ouerthrowe by the like chance; of a Horfse, which beeing let loose, ranne backe to the Campe. For whereas diuers souldiers called one vnto another to stay him, many ranne out of their ranks (to take him) with such disorder, that they seemed to those that were behinde, and some what farre off, to run away; whereupon, a great part of the Christian Army began to flye. And this happened at such a time, as the Soldane with his Souldiers (being put to the worke) were running out of the fieelde: who seeing the Christians flye, called backe his men, charged them afresh, and got the Victorie.

Charles Duke of Burgogne, besiedging Granson, & vnderstanding that the Switzers came to succour it, went to meete them, to giue them battaile. The Souldiers of the vanguard, as they wer marching, meaning for to take a better way, retired a little backe. The reereward seeing the same, imagined that they fled, and began themselves to flye, whereupon the rest also did the like; and (in conclusion) the Duke and all ran away, abandoning their artillery and Campe, to the spoile of the Switzers, who were exceedingly enriched thereby, and yet flew only but seven men, for all the rest saved themselves by flight. Thus much concerning sodaine feares, whereto I will adde a few more examples of other accidents.

Gildo, Gouernor of Affricke, vnder the Emperours Arcadius and Honorius, rebelled against the Empire, and his own brother Mascesell was employed against him for General, who had not (in a certaine occasion) aboue 5000. men to fight with 70000. And the armies being so nere together, that they were ready to Charge one another, Mascesell beganne to make motions of peace; & receiuing some hard and crosse language of one that bare an Ensigne, stroke him vpon the same arme that helde it, wherewith the Ensigne fell, and diuers others that followed, seeing it, and conceiuing that he which bare it had yielded it, went in great hast, and yielded themselves. VVhereupon, Gildo fled away with a great part of the armie, and the rest surrendered themselves to Mascesell.

Also in the battell of Cirignolis, in the Kingdome of Naples, betwixt the Spaniards and the French, a worde spoken by the Count of Nemount, (who was then General of the French) beeing misconstrued by his Souldiers, was a very great cause of their ouerthrow. For, the battell being already begonne, and the Count finding withall, that he could not passe a certain Ditch (ouer which he had thought to haue ledde some part of his Armie, to charge the Spaniards on the other side, cried vnto the Souldiers that followed him, Backe, backe; meaning to lead them another way. But they not knowing the cause, vnderstood that he had them flye, which they all began to doe: and others (seeing the same) followed their example. It chanced also at the same time, that the Count was slaine; whereupon the whole Army of the French ranne away, and lefte the fildes and victorie to the Spaniards.

Againe, whosoeuer hath reade any thing of the ancient warres, or hath any experience in these our times, cannot be ignorant, what confusion may bee bred in a battaile, by a little disorder growing vpon some sodaine accident; whereby Armies (many times) are causes of their owne overthrow. As it chanced to Hannibal in his last battaile with Scipio, wherein his owne Elephants turning backe vpon his Horse-men, so brake & disordered them, that the Romans taking aduantage thereof, did easily put them all vnto flight.

The like to this, hath happened sometimes in this our age, and namely, a few yeares past in France, in the yeare of our Lord, 1590. in the battaile of Yury, betwene the King of France, Henrie the fourth, and the Duke de Mayne, then General for the League. In which Battaille, the Horsemen of the League, flying backe vpon their owne foote, brake them in such sort, that theyr Enemy entring withall easily defeated them.

Lastly, to shew evidently the force of chance in warre, is there any thing more vncertaine or vncoustant then winde and weather? And yet neuertheless, thereupon (many times) dependeth the successe of battailes, and other warlike attempts; especially by sea, where the winde & weather do predominate, and check al the power of men. For, who is ignorant, that be the Naue neuer so potent, it can neyther goe out of the harbour, nor arrive where it should to encounter the enemy, if winde and weather be not fauourable? Which is also as necessary and importat for obtaining victory in a conflict by sea, wherein, the first aduantage that an expert Sea-man seeketh to get of his Enemy, is to winne the winde of him: which winde also changing (sometimes) during the Conflict, doth giue both the aduan-tage and victory to the enemy. As it fell out in the Battaille of Lepanto, which happened betwene the Christians and the Turkes, wherein the Winde being first fauourable vnto the Turkes, sodainly changed, and draue all the smoake of the Artillerie and small shot vpon them, whereby they were so blinded, that they were very easily and speedily overthrowne.

And thus it chanceth in like manner in battailes vpon Land; and therefore wise Captaines seeke not onely to haue the Sunne, but also the winde on their backs: for, it often fauour them, that a storme of Haile or Raine in the face of an enemy, or a violent winde, drying either the dust, or the smoake of shot and Artillerie vpon it, giueth the victory to the enemy. As in the famous battaile at Cannas, when Hannibal overthrowne the Romaines, and slew foure thousand horse, and seuen and twenty hundred horse, and tooke three thousand and three hundred prisoners. He had the winde in his fauor, which being in his backe, and withall so violent, that it draue the dust into the Romaines eyes, and did greatly facilitate his victory.

The like, or rather a farre greater victory, got Scipio Africanus against Antiochus, King of Syria, whom hee put vnto flight, and slew five thousand foote, and foure thousand horse, with the losse only of three hundred forty nine men; by the helpe of a foggy mist, and a shoure of raine. For the mist was so thicke, that the huge Army of Antiochus could not one part of it see another: whereas it wrought no such effect in the small Army of the Romaines. And againe, the raine so weakened the Bowes and Slings of Antiochus his Souldiers, that they serued to little or no purpose: whereas the Romaines vnging onely Swords and Darts, receyued no damage thereby. And to come neerer to our time, wee reade that Adolphus the Emperour was slaine, and his whole armie cleane overthrowne and vanquished by Albertus, by reason that the Sun vvas in their faces.

Also, amongst some other causes of the losse of the great Battaille of Chalradada, betwene the Venetians, and the French, Guichardin obserueth, that a certain shoure of raine; which fell euen

as they were fighting, made the ground so slippery vpon a sudden, that the foote of the Venetians could not hold their footing, to defend themselves against the French Horse. By which means they were easily broken, and the greater part of them slaine.

Thus then wee see, how great a sway chance beareth in battailes and enterprizes of warre, and consequently, how little confidence is to bee reposed in the witte, pollicy, power, and endeuour of men, for the good successe thereof. VVhich dependence vpon infinit accidents, chancing so diuersly (according to the difference of persons, times, places, and circumstances) that neyther the wisdome of any Generall can force them, nor any diligence, celerity, or industry of Souldiers preuent them, though al should concur in the highest degree. For be the Soldiers neuer so obedient, dexterious, & diligent, and the Captaine neuer so wise and valiant; yet what assurance is there of good successe, when a sudden danger shall fo descend both Captaine and Soldiers, that neyther the one shall know what to command, nor the other how to obey; when an erroneous conceite of some few, or had example of some one, or a word mistaken, or a blast of winde, or a shewer of raine, and innumerable other accidents, not possible to be fore-seene or remedied, shall giue the victory to the weaker, yea, to those that are (in a manner) vanquished before? Therefore I will thus conclude this Chapter, that the successe of Battailles, and all warlike attempts, depend wholly on the will and secret iudgements of God.

CHAP. XV.

How our Ancients and reuerend Predecessors, punished such in former times, as durst do any dishonour to their Mistresses.

VVas the more willing to insert this Chapter, to the end that the youth of our times may know and vnderstand, in what veneration and regard, our Ancients held the honour of Ladies, Gentle-women, and Mistresses, and not without very great reason. For it is a notorious treason, & high point of dishonesty, that he who abideth as a seruant in a house, should entermeddle in seeking to purchase the loue of his Mistresse: nay, and that which is worse, to obtaine the cheefest point of al. In the compassing or contriuing whereof, he maketh the husband infamous, doth iniurie to the wife, scandalizeth neighbourhood, and overthroweth himselfe.

Plutarch in his Booke of Mariage writeth, that the Licasmians had a law, that if any strangers were found to conferre in secret with the Mistresse of their lodging, they had their tongues cut out of their mouthes; and if they presumed any further, then it was the losse of their liues. Julius Caesar caused one of his Captaines to be beheaded, because he had dishonored the Mistresse of the house where hee was lodged: without attending any excuse he could or should make, and without any complaint vrged by the husband.

The Emperour Aurelius, standing on a day at his window in his Pallace, & beholding a young man, who drew his Mistresse losely by the sleewe of her gowne; had them both brought before him immediately, and although the young man and his Mistresse both deplored, that it was onely done in iest; yet Aurelius commanded (neuertheless) the same hand to be smitten off.

Macrobius writeth in his Saturnales, that such persons were reputed infamous among the Romanes, as should giue any commendations of the Mistresse of a Family, eyther in regard of her beauty, modest behauiour, or any other seemly quality. For such praises they repured, to giue euident notice of more priuate knowledge, and such knowledge vrged speech, and speech being the discloser of the hart, would afterward grow to the shamefull acte. In the like manner Anulus Cellius recordeth, that the same punishment was inflicted on him that dishonored his Mistresse, as to him that corrupted a vestall virgin: which penalty was, to haue his body cut in foure parts, or else to bee stoned to death aliue.

cryed vnto the Souldiers that followed him, Backe, backe; meaning to lead them another way. But they not knowing the cause, vnderstood that he had them flye, which they all began to doe: and others (seeing the same) followed their example. It chanced also at the same time, that the Count was slaine; whereupon the whole Army of the French ranne away, and lefte the fildes and victorie to the Spaniards.

CHAP. XVII.

Concerning diuers kinds of Salutation, used among our Ancients, when they met together.

HE maner that our Elders obserued in their Salutations one to another, was very diuers, and each one according to their Countries vfe.

The Ismaeians at their meetings, vsed to speake these words: The Lord bee with you.

The true Hebrues, saluting each other, said; God saue you my Brother.

The Philosophers were wont to say; God in a good houre.

The Thebanes said; God giue you health.

The Romanes salutations were as if they they would say; God send or giue you good fortune.

The Sicilians said; God keepe you.

The Carthagenians did not vie any salutations by speeches at their meetings, but as a signe of loue and friendlines, they would kisse their right hands each together, and then kisse one another.

The Moores likewise at their meetings, would kisse the right shoulder of one another: and when they tooke leaue for their departing, then they would kis each others knee.

In Italy, they haue three feuerall kinds of salutations for a whole day. In the morning they say, Dio ti dia il buono giorno; God giue you a good morning: At midnoon, Dio ti dia salute; God giue you health. And at euening they say, Buona sera, Good euen. They say also many times, Miracommendo; I commend me to thee. And after two or three houres of night is past, then they say, Dio ti dia la buona notte; God giue you the goodnesse of the night. Sometime also they are accustomed to say, Idio ti contenti; God content ye.

In the kingdom of Valentia in Spaine, when men meete together, they salute each other in this manner; Gentle Sir, you are well come. And at the departing, the one saith, God remaine with you; and the other replyeth, God in a good houre.

In Catholonia, such persons as chance to meete together, salute one another thus; You are very well arrived heere Sir.

In Castile some vse to say, God keepe you; others, God be with you. And when they leaue each other, the one saith, God conduct you; and the other answereth, The blessed Angels beare you company. Some also vse to say; With your good grace and fauour. And others, Adieu Sir. In the Court some vse to say, Kisse the hands of your mercy. And some other, Kisse the feet of your Honour or Worship. Which Courting salutations are altogether vaine, and (for the most part) deliuered with feigning and dissimulation. For many offer to kisse the hands and feet of one another, that would much rather cut them off, then any way kisse them, desiring indeed to see each others viter ruine. And certainly (me-thinks) that men of worth, authority, and respect, ought not to vse any such salutations; because to kisse the feet, hath bin accounted a matter of great dignity, and appertaining to the Pope only. And to kisse the hand, is a gracious fauour afforded by Kings and Princes, to such Subjects as they thinke worthy of such grace.

But without gadding after so many kinds of vanities, and diuersity of idle words, it is a matter meete and reasonable, that wee who are Christians, should imitate Iesus Christ our Lord and Saviour, saluting one another, with such words as he saluted his Disciples, saying; Peace be with you. Our Redcemer entrusted vs also, to salute houses at our entreing into them, saying; Peace be in this house.

Epaminondas said, that vntill the age of thirty yeares, we should salute men thus; You are very well come hither, for all this while it appeareth, that they are but come into the world. From thirty vp to fifty, then to salute thus; Well be ye; because that then they know what maner of thing the world is. And from fifty defending downe againe, to say, God in a good and blessed houre. For then it appeareth, that they are beginning to take leaue of the world, and that as they had an entreing into it, so there must needs be a departing from it.

What a commendable thing it is to pardon iniuries, especially in Princes and great Lords.

I hath euermore bene a praise-worthy thing, to pardon iniuries and offences: which Princes and great Lords should neuer be vnmindfull of, but continually to remember the words, which Julius Caesar spake to Manilius. Who (on a time) demanding of him, what that was which being performed by him, he therby thought to receiue the greatest glory, and in remembrance whereof hee ought most to reioyce? VVhcreto he thus answered. By the immortal Gods I sweare to thee Manilius, that I neuer thought my selfe to haue merited glory, for any other thing whatsoeuer in this life, nor any other else so much to reioyce me; then in pardoning such as had iniured me, and rewarding them that did me seruice. VVords vndoubtedly worthy of praise, pleasing to heare, notable to reade, and necessary to be followed. For although Julius Caesar beleeued as a Pagane, yet his works fauoured of a good Christian: and we miserable men, beleeuing all as Christians, yet our works come farre short of such beleeve, through the tentations of our corrupt flesh. Because humane wretchednesse is grown to such an encreasing in these cases, that many would pardon the iniuries of their enemies; and yet notwithstanding, dare not do it for feare of men: who understanding, that such a man is willing to forgieue his enemy, presently vse to say; that hee rather doth it through weaknesse and cowardise, then in any respect of charity.

CHAP. XVIII.

From whence (as the first) came the title or name of King and also of Emperour.

OVR reuerend Fore-fathers, according to the diuersity of Nations, called their Princes by diuers names. The Egyptians called their cheefest Lords and Rulers, Pharaohs: The Eythians, Ptolomies: The Parthians, Artaxides: The Albanes, Syluius: The Sicilians, Tyrants: And the Argiues, Kings. Heere we are to understand, that long since in former times, to be a King, was not any dignity, but an office only: as euen now (among vs) is a Governour of the Common-wealth.

Plutarch, in his Bookes of Common-wealth, saith, that at the beginning, all such as governed, were called Tyrants: but afterward, all those that governed badly, were termed Tyrants, and such as ruled well were styled Kings, as a different note from them. For as the King maintained common vility, and preferred the safety of the Commonwealth, before his owne respects and commodities; so the Tyrant referred his dominion to his cupidity and profite, alledging his will only, as the sole reason of all his vniust commands. The King fed the flock, and the Tyrant deuoured it: the one obeyed lawes, & the other commanded about them, and also would breake them when himselfe pleased: this man was equall, the other vniust; the one obtrayned the kingdome by vertue, and therein conserued it; the other vsurped it by power, and so by power held it.

From the beginning of the foundation of Rome, the Romanes created Kings, to bee governed and defended by them: neuertheless, they afterward found such kinde of government to be so bad, as they would endure no more but seuen Kings. And after they had banished perpetually the Tarquins for their tyranny, cleansed or purged the City, and flaine their offerings: they made a solemne oath, for them, their children, and successors, neuer more to create any Kings, eyther to gouerne Rome or them. But forasmuch as the Romane Common-wealth, had formerly receiued great benefites by their Kings, as by Numa Pompilius, and that their Kings only had the charge of sacred things: they resolu'd to keepe the name of King perpetually in their City, to the end, it should not appeare, that with the expulsion of the Kings, they derogated from diuine Religion and Service.

And because the Auguries or Diuiners had saide, that that name was consecrated to the Gods: the Romanes ordain'd, that one man among them should

CHAP. XIX.

What was the reason, and upon what occasion, Kings in ancient times were created or established: And of the Dignity Royall.

OR two principall causes, Kings were at first anciently established: One, to the end they should preferre common iustice and equity, by which bond humane society is maintained, and without which the lesser would be oppressed by the greater, all things being done by power, and no right observed. The other, because they should defend the goods and safety of their Citizens from enemies. The necessities of life assembled men among themselves, and conioyned them by a naturall society: which hath beene caused by mutual succours, support, and offices fitting mankinde.

The beginning of this society, was reason and speech, whereby wee are differing from all brutish creatures. Reason caused many and infinite artes to be invented, and speech (which is the interpreter of the spirit) learned, entrusted, & communicated them, not onely by this mutual coniunction; but also hath stored the life of man with many commodities.

The first and cheefest, was the coniunction and coupling of man with woman, whereof was made one house, wherein all things were to the in common, & thence ensued plurality of houses. For Brothers, Sisters, and Cousins contracting marriage together at the beginning, and could not afterward (by multiplicity of their children) be contained all in one house, they went to dwell in other houses. So of one house at the first, came Boroughs and Villages, even as Colonies of kindred. Finally, from Boroughs & Villages were deriued Citties, and becoming to be peopled, were enclosed with walles, confirmed with lawes, and entrusted with sciences: for without all these, they could not be preferred from the conspiracies of men, and therefore were to be ruled by some one, and couerousnesse of reigning is so great, that all would command, and none obey, or yeeld reuerence.

Royall Majesty, you, he to be armed with good Lawes.

yea, & before they will set forth to Sea, fore-seeing future perils, make their recourse to a good Pilot, in whom they repose their trust and safety: Euen so as requisite is it, to giue the gouernment of a City, to such a one as may well conduct the common-wealth, and render iustice and right to euery man. For where there is no Gouernor (saith Ecclesiastes) the people are scattered. All things which consist on a certaine order, should be referred to one head or cheefe. Which we may obserue in some brutish creatures; as in Bees, who obserue a forme or image of a common-wealth among them. This world it selfe (the parts whereof are conioyned among themselves, by admirable order and artefull workmanship) would fayle and come to nothing, if it were not gouerned by the power of God. Therefore such as cannot endure the dominion of many, will submit themselves to the regimēt of one; in whom, for opinion of wisdom and goodnesse, they may safely repose their trust. Not onely then to the Medes (saith Herodotus) but also to all other people, Kings (vertuously inclined) were established for the administration of iustice.

In elder times, kingdomes came not to the Sonnes of Kings, but was giuen to such a one, whom they thought would wisely and religiously maintaine the foundation of the Common-wealth, by concord and iustice. In those olde dayes, a King gouerned in euery City, and after other Townes became annexed to the principality and dominion of one: Kings had beginning to gouerne ouer diuers people, and thence ensued, that according to the names of Kings, the Regions were so called, which the Romanes termed Provinces. Moreover, euery King should excell one another in iustice and power, to the end, that he may the better vniue his people by equitie, and defend the Common-wealth from enemies. And by good right it may be sayd, that Royall Maiestie ought not only to be decorated with Armes: but ought also to be armed with lawes, that at all times, both of warre and peace, he may both manfully and vprightly gouerne.

Now, speaking of this Royall dignity, double it is to great and holy, that Kings being protectors and defenders of societies among men, do therein imitate the prouidence of God: the office and action of whom, is to rule and gouerne all things, & therefore by good right, they may be termed Vicars and Ministers of the almighty and soveraign Rector of the whole world, and he himselfe hath called them Gods. Plato reported a kindome among mortall men, to be a diuine and soveraigne goodnesse; because it came neere to the diuine nature, and power celestiall. How farre then some do surpass each other in many things, so a King doth excell all other men in dignity and honor, not humane but diuine.

Porus, a King among the Indians, being taken prisoner in batraile, when Alexander demanded of him, after what manner he would be vled; Like a King, quoth he. Again he vrged the same demand, & still he returned the same answer. For (quoth hee) all is comprized under the word King. The name of King was of so great veneration among Nations, that the Indians and Persians adored their Kings as a diuine image, and helde it for their highest and cheefest happinesse, to haue at any time but a sight of them. Pors renowned Iupiter by the name of King, more then any other title. And in ancient times, Kings did not onely gouerne the common-wealth; but also had the charge and super-intendency of Ceremonies & Sacrifices. Kings then are sacred, considering that the Hebrewes with one and the same oyle, anointed both their Kings & high Priests.

Let vs see and obserue, how one kinde of reason, and the like of vnderstanding, do gouerne in man like a Queene. Let vs consider the other works of nature, which by a wonderfull kinde of concord, restrained and combined together, depend only vpon one. So that if things which imitate nature, are the most perfect and excellent, then questionlesse, Monarchy is most absolute and entire, farre aboue Aristocratie, Democratic, Oligarchy, or Laocratie, yea, all other kinds of gouernment, where eether many persons, or few, or the people themselves do rule and command. And like as it is a very hard matter, to finde many men good and honest, rather then one only: so is it more hard, that the manners of one man should be so soone corrupted, as of many. So

Kings imitate the prouidence and goodnesse of God.

But when Cities are vnder the sway and power of many, they are then ouer-toyled with troubles, seditions, and dissensions, by reason of inordinate willes and affections in the greatest: who licence themselves to all euill, being partiall and discordant one towards another. Let me demaund one question, is it not much more seruile and slauish, to attend on the willes of many, then of one only. Nay, are not the couetous desires of one man sooner to be satisfied, then of many? you cannot chuse but grant it, and I craue no better iudgement. For as it is neyther good nor necessary, that in one house there should be many fathers of the Family: euen so is it neyther secure nor profitable, that the Common-wealth should bee governed by the authority of many. Whereof Licurgus gaue good assurance, when some one required, that Democratic should bee established in Sparta, hee returned this answer; Begin it then in thine owne house first.

Yet very true it is, that one man only, how great or small soeuer in power & prerogatiue, cannot (of himselfe) provide for all occasions, and in all places: but he may by his Lieutenantes (as God by the ministry of his Angels) exercise his authority throughout all his Lands vnder his obedience, as hauing the eye of his minde euery where, for containing his Subjects in quietnesse, and causing iustice to be administrated vnto them. The Preface or induction
of the Author

Because amongst those Common-wealths of Freedom, gouerned by a certain number of Lords, many haue held opinion, that (at this present time) the Commonwealth of the Switzers is the cheefest, next vnto that of Venice: I haue many times questioned with diuers people, that were no Switzers, how, and after what manner this Common-wealth was first established & gouerned. For they did highly maruaile, that so many people, hauing but little, should ally and encrease themselves in so short while, euen as enclosed within a defensive wall or circuite, and continue firmly knit together in peace, for such a large and long expence of yeeres.

The common

Achaians.

The Common-wealth of the Athenians, excelling all the rest in Greece, was assembled and selected of many people, and from many places, not only into one countrey, but also within one & the same city. As for the Commonwealth of the Achaians, composed of twelue towns or cities, it did not last long, nor prosper: but after it continued in some dignitie, vnder

Aratus and Philopoemen, soone afterward it was subdued by the Romaines, because she abused her owne liberty. After the death of Iosua, the Common-wealth of Israel, exposed (thorow her owne fault) to pillage and violence of enemies, was many times protected and defended by Iudges and valiant persons, which God had raised vp for that purpose: but at the last, the twelue Tribes, as being glutted or surfeited with their own liberty, made choise of a King out of their own motion

In the time of our Ancestors, by the intermeddling and solicitation of the Emperour Frederick, the Townes of * Suaba v. nited themselves together, and (by that meanes) were esteemed inuincible: but hauing rashly attempted (and by badde conduct) war against the Switzers, the former confederation lost much of the latter. Which afterward, it seemed the recovered againe, when the confederates expelled the Duke of Wirtemberg, and ruined all the Castles of Suaba, detained by diuers theues and robbers. So that soon after the time of their league was expired they became so strange one to another, that they who before were their friends and allies, were reputed by them as their greatest enemies, and ioyed themselves with those that had most molested them; by which meanes, in verie few yeares this league was vtterly lost and vanished.

Now albeit there are many people, & a great number of Townes and Cities in Swetia; yet is it neuertheless, but euen as one City or Commonwealth. I know that learned men will hardly credite this, because they suppose vs to haue no society, nor any conjunction of government, and so (by consequent) it cannot be said, that Swetia can yeild the body of a Commonwealth considering also, that the Townes are not tyed to the ordinances of other Cities or Townes, except with their owne good will and liking, as in the Conventions priuate of associates. So it is, that in the same degree of Commonwealth, whatsoever hath passed by plurality of voyces, it bindeth all the Subjects of that Commonwealth. As for my self, I am not willing to contest with the learned: for I freely confesse the truth of their saying; if wee consider matters exactly. But in regard that the whole Nation of the Switzers consisteth of common estates, governing many Provinces in common, deliberating altogether on the affaires of peace and warre, hauing (almost) a like Lawes and Customes, and are so strictly conioyned by perpetuall Conventions: admit that this were not one onely Commonwealth, and in such nature as hath bene formerly spoken of; yet notwithstanding, wee that write and speake of these matters some-what more popularly, do imagine, that we shall not much faile, in calling this association and league, the City and Commonwealth of the Switzers.

Thus then this Commonwealth established by perpetuall alliances, hath conserved her liberty for the space of more then two hundred yeares, with great concord, and incredible vnion of hearts of all the Switzers. For albeit that once or twice (according as it hapneth almost ordinarily in all great Commonwealths) they haue bene prouoked and stirred to ciuill warres: yet notwithstanding, those troubles were immediately pacified, and al-reuinited together againe in sincere & cordiall affection; embracing the laudable desire of their predecessors, to study still for the freedome of their Countreyes maintenance. Neuertheless, there are some kind of men (enemies to the Switzers) so impudent, as to reproch vs, that in Heluetia, every man is a master or commander, and that our Ancestors, hauing put to death, or troden vnder foote the awe of our Noblemen, by these meanes entred into this liberty, contrary vnto all right and reason. Others do (more truly) confesse, that our Noble-men did offer such outrage to our predecessors, both in words and deeds, that they had iust occasion to vndertake Armes, which all that while they managed very sharply, as it happeneth among people much abused and prouoked. But to satisfie the irresolution of some friends, who vnderstand not the estate of our affaires, and to rembarre the calumnies of the enuious, I thought good to employ my labour, in describing the forme of the Switzers Commonwealth, by reprobuing all vntruthes to the full, and ascending to the height of their originall.

All Heluetia or Switzerland, is at this day considered in three parts: for first of all, the thirteene Cantons haue alwayes allyed and combined themselves, as into one body of a City. And these are they, Zurich, Berne, Lucerne, Uri, Suits, Vnderwald, Zug, Glaris, Basile, Fribourg, Soleurre, Schaffouse, and Appenzel. In the second place are the associates and confederates of the thirteene Cantons, to wit, first of all, the Abbot and Towne of S. Gal; next, the confedered Grifons, the Bythop of Sion, and the whole countries of Valais, Rotuile, Mulhouse, and Bienné. Consequently, the territories or Bayliwicks, which are governed by the 13. Cantons in common, to witte; Turgow, Bade, the Rhegusces, now adayes called Rhinthal, Sargans, the free Provinces, the inhabitants of Lugano, Locarne, Mondrisse, and the Vale Madie, whereto may well bee ioyned them of Bellizone, who are vnder the dominion of the three lesser Cantons. The cities and townes of the Cantons & confederates, are Zurich, Berne, Lucerne, Zug, Basile, Fribourg, Soleurre, Schaffouse, S. Gal, Coire of the Grifons, Syon in Valais, Rotuile, Mulhouse, and Bienné for all the rest do dwell in villages.

Moreover, all of them abide not in Switzerland, neither within those limites proposed by Cesar in his Commentaries: for of the thirteene Cantons, Basile is as a quarter apart, which was anciently called the countrie of the Raurasians. Schaffouse is in Allemagne or Germany, on the further side of the Rhine: and one part of them of Glaris and of Vri, do touch (as some conceiue) with the Grifons and the Alpes. As for the associates, except the Abbot and Towne of S. Gal and Bienné: al the rest are out of the limits of the ancient countrie of Heluetia. First we consider, that the Grifons retainie still their name and old countrie of the Rhatians. Next is the Valaisians, who in elder times were called Viberins, Sedusians, and Veragrius. Rotuile is in Germany, and Mulhouse towards the Franche Comté. Now as concerning the Iurisdic-tions or Bayliwicks, they of Rhinthal and of the Sargans, are Grifons. But they of Lugano, Locarne, Mondrisse, of the Vale Madie, and of Bellizone, are Italians by originall and Language: the other Iurisdic-tions remaine in Switzerland.

And heere you are to vnderstand, that these Cantons doe not hold equal authority ouer the distinct countries; but according as the associations haue bene made in diuersity of times, euen so are the authority of the Cantons diuers. They of Turgow, hold as their Lords and heads the feauen most ancient Cantons, namely, Zurich, Lucerne, Uri, Suits, Vnderwald, Zug & Glaris, Berne, Fribourg & Soleurre, do vndergoe some right in criminall causes. For the Prouostship or Precedency of the Empire (as they vse to terme it) and iudgement of criminall processe, was heeretofore referred to them of Constance, as their due: but among other conditions of peace, after the warre of Suscha, this authority was granted vnto the Switzers, which appertained equally to the fore-named Cantons, because they all ioyned together in the selfe-same warre. Moreover, those feuen Cantons commanding at Bada, did the like to them of Sargans, Rhinthal, and ouer the Free Provinces also. True it is, that in their gouernement of Bada, they associated the men of Berne with them; and they of Appenzel in the gouernment of Rhinthal; and all the Cantons to the foure Bayliwicks, which are on the confines of Italy. Bellizone is subiect to them of Vri, Suits, and Vnderwald: and such (at this day) is the condition and estate of the Switzers Commonwealth. Now, I purpose to shew the times, the cause, and the principall Articles of the Switzers league. Alfo, what hath bene the estate of each Canton, before they became allved together, and what their dues and rightes haue bene, and are. Lastly, what warres they haue maintained since their League was made.

CHAP. II.

Of the three first Cantons of the Switzers.

N the yeare after the natiu-
city of our Lord Iesus Christ, 1307, they of Vri, Suits, and Vnderwald, were the very first that Can-tonned themselves. They were termed Swaines or Boores of the country, dwelling in vallies, and in their owne Language, stiled, Diedrey Lander, also Diedrey Waldstett. And, in time, Lucerne came into the fourth place.
They dwelt in the Valleys of the Alpes, betweene the Grifons countrie, the Vale
of Liwiner, and high Valais, and were searted betweene the Canton of Zurich,
and the countrie of Ergow. Some doe
affirme, that they
of Suits, are descended of the Cimbri-ans; they of Vri,
of the Tauriscis; & they
of Vnderwald, of

certaine banished Romanes; and indeed, their magnanimity in war, declares them to be issued of generous Ancestors.

Their Annals do testifie, that the Emperor Lewes, sonne to Charlemaign, at the request of the Byshop of Rome, granted these people liberty, to bee gouerned by Lawes made among themselves, & gaue them many other Priuiledges, for they faithfull seruice in warre against the Sazars, in behalfe of the citie of Rome. For the Sarrasians, who in those times much troubled Africa, hauing inuaded Sicilie, came likewise into Italy: where they tooke some places: and afterward marching vnto Rome, easily made themselves Masters of the Vatican, which then stood voyd of any defence. There they robbed the Temple of Saint Peter, breaking downe the gates thereof, that were of silver and very great value, and afterward burnt and destroyed it. Hauing continued there diuers dayes in determination to surprize

the whole Citie; they heard tydings (as Historians say) that a great band of soldiers, belonging to *Cſ Alpine Gaule, came to the succor of Rome, which made them forthwith recoile, and to waite all the plaine Countrey about Rome. Among other badde seruices, they robbed the Temple of S. Paul upon the way to *Ofia, and stuffed it with such fires, as the more part thereof was vitterly ruined. From thence continuing on theyr course in spoile and ranage, euen so far as mount Cſtinum, they stole away all the Jewels and Ornaments of the Abbey, and defaced a great part thereof. Thence getting vnto the sea shore, and lading their Shippes with their itoine booties: finding them ready to set saile, they lanchd forth into the maine.

Now, the Annales of Switzerland or Heluetia, do say; that these three first Cantons, and they of the Valley of Hſell, were present at this fore-mentioned succor and supply, and passed two severall times into Italy, vnder the conduct of a certaine Italian Marquesse, named Guy. They pursued the Sarazins, and cut their rere-gard in peeces, bringing back a great spoile from this ouerthrowe of theirs, which they altogether gaue to the Temple of S. Peter, euen all that they hadde gotten from the enemy. In regard whereof, the Pope (as a recompence for so great a benefite) obtained (on theyr behalfe) great priuiledges from the King of France; and moreover, presented them with those Ensignes or Standards; which yet, in our daies, they vse to beare in war.

Notwithstanding, the Emperor Lewes sonne to Lewes the Debonnaire, and youngest sonne to Charlemagne, gaue them of Vri to the Abbey which he had builte at Turegum, now called Zurich, where his daughter Hildegard was Lady Abbess: and the wordes of the Donation (truely translated out of the Latine Copie) are these which follow.

The Donation of the Emperour Lewes to the Abby of Turegum.

E give to our Abbey, founded at Turegum, where Saint Felix and Saint Regula rest in the Lord with their bodies; our Bourrough or Towne of Turegum, situated in the Duchy of Suabia, in the Territory of Duran, with all the appurtenances and dependances in diuers charges: to wit, the village of Vri, with the churches, houses, and other buildings above named: The slaues, male and female, young and old, lands arable and desert, Woods, Meadows, pasture grounds, Fish ponds, Rivers, Ports, Passages, things found and yet to find, with all other rents and revenues. Moreover, our Forreist named Albis, and generally all those things fore-mentioned, that either now or hereafter do and may appertaine vnto vs, without reseruing or retaining any thing whatsoeuer.

But it is not to bee thought, that this Donation did wholly abolish the ancient priuiledges and libertie of them of Vri: For, if we may credit them, the Emperour gaue not the Seignury of all the country to this recited Abbey, but of one Village or two onely. Moreover, if it were so that the whole valley of Vri had bin vnder subiection to this Abbey, yet notwithstanding, it could not much prejudice their freedom: because such as were any way subiect to Monasteries or Conuents, were obliged vnder certaine conditions, and enioyed their liberties in the meane while, onely their seruice to the Church excepted.

Beside, they received their Governours or Prouosts of the empire, to take knowledge and censure in causes criminall, without any appeale. They of Vri also did formerly do the like; and as concerning other causes, their ludge, whom they teame Amman (as much to say, as Maior or Bourgomaister) with his Counsellors or Assitants, was chosen from among among the people, by good knowledge had of him and them, & they are to provide in common for the affaires of the Common wealth. They of Suits & Vnderwald do gouerne themselves in the same manner: and among them, men belonging to the Church, haue some power and priuiledges. In these feuerall quarters wer good store of Noblemen. As among them of Vri, the Barons of Attinghusen, Schwynberg and Ritzing: The Lords of Sillini, Winterberg, Mose, Sedorf, Spiring, Meier, of Bourges and of Oetzfeld. Among them of Suits, the Lords of Stenacker, Rogenberg, Schwanow. In the quarters of Vnderwald, the Lords of Wolfenschief, Muenne, Rudenz, Altsch, Watterberg, Lembourg, Liebourg, and Humeruille. At the beginning, these Gentlemen carryed themselves very kindly with the other Inhabitants, and part of them serued as vassalles to some neighbouring Earles. But when they grew rich thorow succession of times, they began to misprize the people, and to subiect them to theyr vniust commands. The Governours, who ought to censure the peoples libertie, making semblance of not seeing such harsh behaviours: fauoured the Gentlemen, as being next in condition to themselves, and by those means both augmented & supported their power.

In those times especially, not onely the freedom of the Switzers Cantons, but likewise of many Townes in Germany, were in manifest danger. The Emperours were excommunicated, and in open warres assailed by the Popes, so that all Germany was diuided into two factions, one part wherof followed the Popes power, and the other the Emperours. The people of Switzerland, and some few of their Nobility, tooke part with Frederick the lawfull emperor, who (for that cause) renewed and reconfirmed the ancient priuiledges of their liberty. They of Suits can yet shew the Letters Patents of Frederick the second, written in the moneth of September, in the year 1240. whereby he receiued them of Suits into the safeguard of the empire, as members thereof; and that they should not be any way aliened or estranged thence, hee confirmed their priuiledges, and called them people of free condition.

On the contrary side, the most part of the Nobility, especially such as were as vassalls to Conuents and Abbaies, which were then in very great credit, they followed the Popes faction. Hence sprang the hatreds, enmities, and first foundation of ciuill dissentions, all taking a wonderfull increasing in the Interregnum of magic yeares, after the death of Frederick. Neuerthelesse, in those very times, the fore-named people did (euen then) enioy their intire liberty, although many ambuscadoes were prepared to deprive them of it: as appeareth sufficiently by a deed patent of confederacie for three yeares, by them of Vri and Suits, with them of the Towne of Zurich, the tenor of which confederacie followeth thus.

TO all them to whome these Letters shall come, to be either seen or heard: We Arnold Maier de Sillini, Amman, and the people of Vri: and we Conrad de iberg, Amman and the people of Suits, and of the Diocesse of Constanz. We make it knowne, that we are obliged together by oath, mutually to ayd and counsell each other, from the Feast of the nativity of Iesus Christ, untill & for the space of three yeares ensuing, on these conditions following. Whatsoeuer hath bin done or past before 3 dayes, both not any way together. If a Lord, whatsoeuer he be, haue a seruant or vassall among vs: that vassall or seruant shall be subiect vnto him, according to the custom which hath heretofore bin vsed in the kings time. But if the Lord shall constrain him beyond that limitation; then will we extend to succour the seruant. If any of the Allies or confederates shall possesse himselfe of any Castles or other places, without the consensual liking of the other Allies, they shall not stand bound to furnish him with the charge of Garrison or munition. If any one haue done damage by fire or spoile on any place, we will ioyne all our meines together, to make war on them that shall haue committed such an offence. If any shall attempt to invade or see upon the lands of Vri and Suits: they of Zurich shall impeach them to their uttermost power. If they cannot attaine therunto: they shall then endamage them by burning, sucking, and all other helpes of hostility. If any shall besiege the Towne of Zurich, and shall

And we of Zurich haue chosen three among them of Vri; namely, Garnier de Attinghuse, Burckhard, the old Amman, Conrad Maieur of Orscheld. And as many of Suits, namely, Conrad, Amman of Iberg, Raoul Stuttscher, and Conrad Hun. These twelve men, according to their discretion, shall giue command to all the Allies, for mutual aid and succouring one another, both how and when-soeuer neede shall require, in those affaires whereof the conditions haue formerly bin expressed. And to the end that all before declared, may continue firme for the time prefixed: Wee the Senate and Citizens of Zurich, and we the people of Vri and Suits, haue put our Seales to three instruments of the same tenure, concerning this our faithfull alliance. Given at Zurich the day of Saint Gal, in the year of our Lord God, M. CC. LI.

These Letters of alliance, made an 100. yeares before that they of Zurich hadde contracted perpetuall alliance with the three first Cantons, do evidently declare how those people were euermore ialous of their liberty, without offering wrong neuertheless vnto any person in conferring it. Now, about ten yeares after this alliance made, the Empire being troubled with factions, in regard it was destitute of an Emperour, and Helvetia much molested by the ouermuch license, which the Nobility tooke to themselves day by day the three Cantons hauing heard Raoul of Habspourg (who was afterward Emperour) to be highly commended for many Vertues clearly shining in him, gaue him yearly pledges, and electing him for their head, made alliance with him, that they liberty might be maintained at the sword's point, if neede required. They of Zurich, Basle, and Strasbourg did as much at the very same time. The like did manie free Townes of Germany, being called vnto their succour, and gaue money euery year to the neighbouring Princes, to the end, they might be secured by their meanes.

The authority of Raoul, being busied in other warres about Zurich, Basle, and Strasbourg, comming short of abilitie to repress the insolence of the Nobility: at length the people (being too much trod downe by great mens outrages) vnder-tooke Armes, and expelled them forth of the Countrey that had raised this disorder. This warre continued twelve yeares, about the year of our Lord, 1260, and some few yeares following. And in this warre, all the Cantons beganne to fortify the passages of their Countreies. They of Suits builded a Tower at Mount Sattell, fortifying and cutting off the great highway. They of Vnderwald, did dam vp the Lake with a strong prouision of stakes & thrubs, toward the village of Stantz, and fortified the Port, by meanes of a Tower which they builded there. The year 1273, it came to passe, that Raoul of Habspourg was elected King of the Romaines. Then the Gentlemen of Switzerland went vnto him, and gaue him to vnderstand, that the people had rebelled: on the contrary, the people maintained, how much the Nobility had outraged them. The King hauing heard both parties, and seene the priuiledges of the people, gaue sentence to their benefit, and made peace between them and the Noblemen expelled our of Heluetia, whither they returned again for the more part. As for the rest of the country, the king did generally confirme Governors in the name of the Empire. Not of the house of Austria: which Governors (from their beginning) did not dwell in towns or villages, but kept themselves in their Castles, whence they came, twice or thrice yearely, to iudge in cases of proceffe, but more especially in criminal causes.

In our dayes, there are Towns in Germanie, that receiued such Governours of the Empire, who managed no other matter, but only causes criminall, & had no other occasions in Townes to attend vpon, but only the. And so far was King

Raoul, from diminishing the liberties of the Switzers: as rather many of the Cantons stood beholding to him, for not only the confirmation, but likewise the amplification of their priuiledges. For, without depending on them of Zurich; he confirmed and augmented the priuiledges of the Canton of Suits, in the 18. yeare of his Empire, as appeareth by his Letters giuen at Bada, in the year 1291, where, in expresse termes, they of Suits are called people of free condition.

True it is, that the King himselfe tooke very great paines, to make the house of Habspourg great: but he left to the Switzers their liberties entire. Either because he would not be accounted vnthankfull, in ruining that which had succoured him, and shewne themselves faithfull in his right, before he was Emperour, perswading himselfe also, that his affaires would prosper the better, by hauing the Switzers his loyall friends and associates, then to make rebels of subiects, who would carry but bad affection to the oppressors of their liberty: Or else in regard, that hauing (but a very little before) ioyned the Dukedome of Austria, as also of Alemaigne or Suaba, to his other possessions, he might thereby imagine, that it would beget him a generall hatred, to fallen on things of such slender consequence, and that all the profite hee could procure, by vsurping ouer the Switzers, could not value the ill-will he should gaine thereby.

Adolph de Nassau, who was successeur to Raoul in the Empire, confirmed to the Switzers their priuiledges. By meanes whereof, the Switzers were highly hated of Albert, Sonne to Raoul, and enemy to Adolph. This Albert was the very greatest aduersary and persecutor of the liberties of the Switzers. Hee had a great number of children, and to aduance and enrich them, hee began to stretch forth his wings so farre as possibly he could, & especially he resolved, to provide a new kinde of principality in Switzerland. Hee being become Emperour, attributed many things to the house of Austria, that appertained to the Empire: which made him offensive and insupportable to his neighbours, in being shamelesse, to get to himselfe whatsoeuer he desired, eyther by vnjust demands, or else by manifest violence. And because Ecclesiasticall persons were very powerfull, he practised by all meanes, eyther to make sale to them of their iurisdiccions, or else to make them acknowledge him and his childre, as their hereditary and perpetuall Tutors & Protectors. In this manner he dealt with the Colleged and Conuents of Strasbourg, Basle, Constance, Coire, S. Gal, the Hermitage, S. Blas, Disentz, Pfauertz, Rinow, Wettinghen, Muren, Interlach, Trubic, Certina, Seconn, Schenniffs, Zurich, and many other places beside. By the selfe-same cunning, he solicited & oppressed the Earles and Barons of Switzerland or Heluetia, to put thm selues into the safeguard, and become vassalls to the house of Austria. Among others were the Lords of Vislow, Rotenburg, Kenfpourg, Eschenbach, Alpbourg, Wolhuse and Grencinge.

In former times, the Colleged and Conuents depended vpon the Emperour, & Lords & Gentlemen did neuer acknowledge any other Soueraigne vpon earth, but the Emperour onely: but this Albert laboured to fasten all to the house of Austria. Wee may easily iudge of his violence towards strangers, by his bad carriage to his owne proper Nephew, to who he would neuer (although hee was very many times thereto required) render the Hermitage paternall, which hee gouerned in quality of a Tutor. But the Abbot of Saint Gal, two Colleged of the Towne of Zurich, and the Count of Hombourg, could neuer be brought to that point, to acknowledge them of Austria for their Protectors, neyther to sell them any portion of their iurisdiccions. They continually alledged their ancient priuiledges, and would not permit, that they shoulde be dismembred from the Empire: which much incensed and offended the Emperour, who had practised vpon the rigts of many other, especially the Conuents: Seconn, Murbach, the Hermitage, Interlach, Disentz, and Lucerne, who had giuen him all that appertained to them, at Glaris, Lucerne, Suits, and Vnderwald. Howbeit, they had formerly promised (by verie authentical letters) to the inhabitants of those places, neuer to alienate them to any other. But all this while, Albert cunningly wonne the hearts of simple people, and by goodly promises, made them to ratifie these alienations.

ting in the round neighbouring Countreies, & bought some Castles of the Countreies, in the Territories of the fornamed Cantons: hee began to looke into some meanes, whereby he might become Master of Suitts and Vnderwald, which being enclosed by the of Austria (that dominated ouer the Hermitage, Glaris, Zug, Lucerne, & other places thereabout) caused many to imagine, that except hee could preuaile against the too, they would quit their liberty as the other did. Neuertheles, Albert being desirous to reach the height of his desire, by such meanes as he had propounded to himselfe: sent in Embassie to them of Suitts and Vnderwald, the Baron of Lichtenberg, Governour of Austria, and the Baron of Gschwin, two of his intimate Councellers. They addressed themselves first to the of Suitts, and perswaded them to yeeld themselves into the protection of the house of Austria, who were very benigne Princes, & vnder whose dominion they might liue much more peaceably, the formerly they had done vnder the Empire, dismembered and rent in peeces (as it were) while the Princes were in debate about the election of Emperours. They further added that they of Austria had the reuenues of many Countreies in those very quarters, and that if they refused, by displeasing Albert, they might well conceiue, that their affaires would but badly carry themselves; but in doing the contrary, his highnesse made them promise, of all honest and amiable entertainmet, that a Prince could afford them.

The men of Suitts, having bene aduertised before, concerning the intention & demand of Albert, by Carner, Count of Hombourg, Lord of a neere neighbouring Countrey, called La Marche: a man not well affected by Albert, because he had refused to yeeld himselfe vassall to the house of Austria: And having conferred with them of Vri and Vnderwald, returned thus their answer to the Ambassadors. That the Kings and Romane Emperours had giuen them faire and ample priuiledges, carrying expresse charge, that they should neuer bee dismembered from the Empire: wherefore they were fully resolute, in imitation of their Ancestours example, to continue firmly ioyned to the Romane Empire. As for the Monasteries of Marbach and Beron, whose rights and reuenues (especially about Suitts) were then in the hands of the Austrian Princes, hauing formerly promised by authentical instruments, neuer to alienate themselves to any other authority whatsoever: If they had kept their promise, they would haue done the like in duty to them. But seeing that they had broken their faith; and all former contracts were vnaturally cancelled: their example was no warrant to them for the like. Moreover, they would render to Albert and his children, Princes of Austria, such fidelity and obedience as they ought to do: entreating Albert, seeing he was Emperour; that he would not permit them to be diuided from the Empire. Beside, in regard his Predecessours had confirmed their priuiledges to them of Suitts (which himselfe as yet had not done) they therefore againe did humbly entreate him, that he would vouchsafe to confirm them. They also desired the Ambassadors, to returne this their answer to his Imperiall Maiesty, and to entreate on their behalfe, that he would benignly receive them.

The Ambassadors hauing this answer, went to deale with them of Vri & Vnderwald: who (according to that which had bene accorded on among them before) made the selfe same answer as they of Suitts had done. In all the fornamed Villages, they did nothing else but shew to the Ambassadors, the Letters Patents and priuiledges, granted them by Fredericke, Count of Habsbourg, and other Emperours, together with the letters and consents of the Monasteries: all of them making humble entreaty, that they might not be compelled to see all those things frustrated. But the Emperour hauing heard the Ambassadors, was highly offended at the answer, because the Switzers not only refused to acknowledge them of Austria for their Lords, & would not willingly be separated from the Empires body: but also declared, that they would yeelde to no diuision from the Monasteries, by which meanes, all the precedent attempts of Albert, built vpon great cost and trauaile, were vnterly disappointed.

In some short while after, they of Suitts, Vri and Vnderwald, hauing againe sent their Ambassadors vnto the Emperour, to obtaine confirmation of their priu-priuiledges: hee answered them in choller, that hee would satisfie their requests, according as they had done his demands. And that hee had deputed certaine Governours, which he purposed to send vnto them, and by whom they should more amply vnderstand his minde.

Following this intention, hee sent as Governours, the Knight Grifler, and Peregrin Landberg. Grifler was appointed for Suitts and Vri, and made his abiding in an olde Castell about Suitts, called Chfisch, and beside hee builded another Fortrefse on the Land of Vri. Landberg, the Governour of Vnderwald, had two Castles, to wit, Sarne about the Forrest, and Rozberg beneath, which Forrest diuided the countrey of Vnderwald iust in the midst. These two Castles did formerly belong to the Conuent or Colledge of Lucerne, & the Maiors or Bourgoisasters made their dwellings there: but the Emperour Albert had foldes them to the house of Austria, and there he appointed Garrisons. These departments were something nouell and strange to them of Vri, Suitts, and Vnderwald: for till that time, these three seuerall places together had but one Governour, who (ouer and beside) was many times Governour of Zurich and other Townes. Hee remained in his Seigneuries out of the Cantons, and every yeare once or twice (being called) hee came thither to iudge in law-cases. The rest of the time, he had a Lieutenant chosen among the Countrey people, that executed his charge. But now there was appointed two perpetuall Governours, keeping Garrison in the very strongest parts of the Countrey: which the people were constrained to endure, onely in feare of the Emperour, and in regard beside, that those places were in the power of the Austrian Princes.

At the beginning, these Governours shewed themselves very courteous and affable to all men: labouring by blandishments and faire looks, to winne the peoples hearts, & to subiect them to the house of Austria. But perceiving that these carriages did little auaille them, they began to checke and oppress the people, by the command of Albert; who was againe greuously enraged, by reason of a new league or alliance (made for the space of ten yeares) betwene them of Suitts, and the Count of Hombourg. Tyranny thus encreasing day by day, Ambassadors (in name of the three Villages) were sent to the Emperour, who would neither see nor heare them: so that they were constrained to declare their Commission to his Councellers. The fustinne whereof was, that being people of the Roman Empire, they had obtained very ample franchises and priuiledges of the Emperours: whereof they were now in danger to bee despoiled, and oppressed by an irksome and insupportable tyranny. For the inhabitants of the recited places, were without cause, or vpon very slender occasion, immediately imprisoned, & pressed with nouell exactions. Beside all this, every man in particular, was compelled at a certaine time, especially the first day of the year, to bring presents to the Governours, which neuer had bene put in practise before. In which respect, they most humbly desired the Councellers, to intercede on their behalfe to the Emperour: that such charges might bee taken from them, and that their ancient priuiledges might bee confirmed and put in full force againe. But the Emperours Councellers hauing conferred and agreed together, made answer, that the Villages themselves were the cause of this oppression, and that the Emperour was thus seuer to them, because they would not follow the example of Lucerne, Zug, and Glaris, in yeelding themselves to the house of Austria. Which doing, and making more account (then formerly they had done) of Albert and his children; they should find him a Prince that would vie with them very kindly.

The Deputies hauing received this answer, returned without doing any thing else: in the meane while, the tyranny of the Governours (being fauoured & winked at by the Emperour) grew more and more to greater strength. In a certaine Valley of Vnderwald, called Melchthal, ther dwelled an aged rich man, ieaalous of his Countreies liberty, and one that had bene the cheefest in counselling his compatriots, neuer to subiect themselves vnto the house of Austria, but carefully to preserve their ancient liberty, which mā was named Henry of Melchthal. Landberg sent a Seruant vnto him, with charge to bring away with him a couple of Oxen. Wherevnto Henry answered, that he knew not himselfe to be culpable of any crime, whereby the Gouverneur should exact such an amends of him: and albeit hee had committed some offence, yet hee ought not thus to extend his authority vpon his goods, before he had beene heard & condemned. The seruant being of humour answerable to his Master, arrogantly replied, that instantly he would driue thence the Oxen: and if he stood in need of them to plough his Land, his Country lubbards should serue to draw in the yoke. Thus speaking, hee tooke the Oxen out of their yokes, and made himselfe ready to driue them away.

Tyranny may iustly be tearmed the Mother of wrong and iniustice.

Tyranny blindfolded by his villanous compaign conuapience, and chastised by the iust iudgement of God.

Arnoul, a lusty young man, and Son to Henry, moued at this outrage offered to his father, gaue the seruant a found blow with a cudgell, as hee was driuing on the Oxen, and chanced to breake one of his fingers: but fearing the tyranny of his Master, he got immediately to the top of the Mountaines, and withdrew himselfe among them of Vri, where he kept close with one of his kinsred. Lambert vnderstanding al that had past, sent out for Henry Melchtall demanding of him what was become of his Son. Henry made answer, that he knew not where he was, as indeed hee was meere ignorant of his flight: wherat the Gouverneur was so furiously enraged, that he caused the old mans eies to be pluckt forth, & roue away his Oxen, & depoyled him beside, of the most part of his goods. This cruelty brought him into the hatred of all the people: but in regard of Alberis power and oppressions, commanding ouer them very stearely, there was no man (as then) that durst stir against him. And because wicked courtes grow to a great head, when ouermuch licence is permitted to them: euen so inordinate iniquity in the Gouvernors, did driue them out of one mischiefe into another.

Neere to the Abbey of Engelberg, and to the Village of Wolffenchies, in a place named Alzellen, there dwelt a country mā called Conrad de Bomgarten, married to a very faire and beautifull woman. It chanced that a Gentleman, named Wolffenchies, being Lieutenant to the Gouverneur, returning from Engelberg, & passing by Alzellen, to goe home to his house at Rotenberg, found this womā in a meadow, busied about some commendable exercise. He vnderstanding that her husband was absent, commanded the woman to make him ready a Bath, wherein he might wash himselfe, because he was ouer-ratuelled with heate and labour. The woman not daring to make refusall, did as the tyrant had commanded her. Proceeding on further in his intended villany, he pressed the woman to put off her garments, and come into the Bath to him; wherein shee promised to obey, provided, that two varlets, which attended on him, might withdraw themselves, as accordingly they presently did vpon their masters command.

One lewd intention euen more draw on another.

The woman vsing some delay, yet feigning preparation of her selfe to come into the Bath; got recovery of a doore behinde in the chamber, and fled away in great feare and anguish. Her husband returning from the Forrest, chanced to meete her, and vnderstanding what had happened; entred his house, and with an Axe or Hatchet, which he then had in his hand, slew the Lieutenant sitting in the Bath, and so he received the chastisement due to his wicked attempt, vpon the honour of a vertuous modest woman. The Gouverneur sought all means to reuenge his death: but he was so hated of all men, as he could not execute any thing. Beside, the villany and indignity of his Lieutenant, with-held him from daring to require any helpe of the Country in regard also, that he who had done the deed, was fled into the Lands of Vnderwald, & kept himselfe hid among them of Vri. Some say, and among others, Eternilerus, and Stumpfius in his Annales of Helueta, that this man was the Gouverneur himselfe; who seeking thus to violence an honest woman, became so flaine. But they of Vnderwald maintaine, that hee who was kild in the Bath, was called Wolffenchies, a seruant to the house of Austria, and dwelling at Rotenberg.

The tyranny of the Gouverneur Grifler.

While these Tragedies were thus acting at Vnderwald, Grifler, the Gouverneur of Vri and Suits also, to keepe the people in the more awe and subiection; began to builde (by command from his Master) a Fort or Cittadell neere to Altorf, vpon a small Hill called Solturne. This Grifler being a verie vaine-glorious man, made vaunt of abasing the people in such fort, that hee would bow & bend them at his his pleasure, wherupon he called his Fort, A yoke of extreme slavery to the Vrians. He perceiving, that all men were enraged & badly bent toward him, and doubting, lest some matter might secretly be contriued against him, to compass discovery thereof, he vnderooke this course ensuing. He caused a Hat or Bonnet to be fixed vpon a long Pole, erected in the market place of Altorf, where the greater part of the Country people vsed to meete, and gaue command, that all men (taking off their owne Bonnets) should bow their knees, and yeelde as much honour to that Hat, as they vsed to doe to him the Gouverneur, or when they came into his presence. His purpose and opinion was hereby, that such as were maliciously addicted toward him, would neuer humble themselves, in doing so many reuerences to the Hat, especially if they had any comforts, vpon whose help they made any dependance: and that this occasion would serue him as an honest pretence for their discovery to his spies, and so torture might be inflicted on them, to gain knowledge of the whole enterprize. In the meane while, he departed thence, to visite the Country of Suits, where he was likewise Commander and Gouverneur.

In Suits there was a Gentleman of marke, named Garnier Souffacher, whose Father was called Raoul, and had bene the first Magistrate of Suits, about thirty years before. This Garnier had built a house in more ample and magnificent manner, then was the vsual custome of the Country. It fortune, that the Gouverneur Grifler passed on horsebacke by this house, and demanded to whom it appertained. Souffacher knowing himselfe to bee in the ill opinion of the Gouverneur, because he had alwayes before counselled the people, not to subiect themselves to them of Austria: This house (quoth he) is for the King and you, by whose liberality, I am possessor of it. Then the Gouverneur answered; I am Lord of this Country, and henceforward I will not suffer any more, that yee shall sway your selues after your owne appetites, in building houses, as if you were Masters, and that you shall well feele before it be long.

This answer deliuered with outrageous menaces, greatly displeased Souffacher, who (from that time forward) could not dissemble his greefe. Which was the cause that his wife, being a wife, modest, and discrete Lady, perceiving her husband had sad and pensive, and vnderstanding the reason thereof; exhorted him to hope well, in regard that God, to whom all violence and tyranny was displeasing, would neuer forsake such as inuoked his help & furtherance. Moreover, it would well become him to make search after men of courage, such as were oppressed with the same tyranny: to conferre with them, and ioine their means together, to recover the liberty of their Country; for (hee durst assure him, that God would blisse so holy an enterprize. Souffacher, hauing a long time consulted with himselfe, at length went from Suits, to Vri, where he easily knew and perceived, that Grifler was hated of all men in those quarters, by reason of his insupportable pride, euen as much as he was in Suits: especially by the Baron of Attinghuse, then cheefe in iustice at Vri, & a familiar friend to Souffacher. This Baron first began to complain, as extremely wearied with the insolencies of Grifler, in erecting his Hat, as to ranke it with Princes; protesting openly, that he could not permit his Country, any longer to endure so great a tyranny.

But Souffacher fearing (perhaps) that the Baron vsed this kinde of language, only but to found him, and (as we vse to say) to vndermine his secret cogitations; kept his owne intention couert, contenting himselfe, to breake his minde vnto an ancient faithfull friend of his, called Gautier Furff, that is to say, the Prince. These two hauing many and sundry times considered on all matters, and taken into their counsell (as a third party) Arnould Melchtall of Vnderwald; bound themselves together by mutual oath, to ioine all their means, and employ their paines by a common consent, for the extirpation of tyranny, and reducing their country to her ancient liberty. Moreover they concluded, that each of them in his owne quarter, should procure for many men as possibly he could, provided, that they were people of good and discrete carriage: who should all swear, to employ both their goods & bodies, and to maintaine one another in his right, for recovery of the Countries former freedom; and that in the meane while, each man should acquit himselfe of his duty towards the Empire, the Monasteries, as also to all Gentlemen & Yeomen. Promising likewise, to keepe this league & combination secret, vntill such time as (by common aduice) all the confederates should bee refolued to publish it. They made choise also of a priuate place, nere to the Lake of Vri, called Grutly, where these three chiefe heads of the League vsed to meete, accompanied each one with three or foure, to aduise together what was to be done.

Thus you may perceiue, how the ground-works of the League of Switzers was then begunne, by Stouffacher, Furft, and Melchall: and being so agreed vpon, each man returned by himselfe home, to make coniunction with his companions. Soone after this, not onely the vulgar people, but likewise the most part of the Nobility in the Villages, racked themselves with the confederates: For the Gouernours did molest the Noblemen, no lesse then they did the common sort, not making any difference betweene the one and other, but called the Gentlemen, peazants, and companions of a facility. In like manner, they of Austria had appropriated (by little & little) to themselves, the rights belonging to Noblemen: whereat many being offended, had forsaken (as it were) the part of Austria, as we haue formerly obserued by the Baron of Attinghusse.

The number of the confederates being encreased, it seemed good to many, that it was time to set hand to the worke, namely, to chafe thence the Gouernours, & replant the ancient liberty of the country: for feare (lest by over-long delay, their enterprize would be discovered (by some meanes) to the Gouernours. And therefore, in the year 1207, the 17. day of October, twelve of the principall men among all the confederates, assembled themselves at a certaine place appointed. All inffited to lay hand to the business so soone as possible might be against which, they of Vnderwald onely opposed themselves: because that the Castles or Fortresses, which the Gouernour held in their territory, to wit, Sarne and Rotzberg, were places well munit, and almost impregnable, and if siege should bee planted before them, the King of the Romaines would come forthwith, bringing an Army sufficient to succour them. The other confederates yielded to this motion, and agreed together, that the first day of Ianuary then next following, through all the Cantons, seizure should be made, on all the strongest Castles belonging vnto the Gouernour. To whom notwithstanding, nor any outrage should be offered, neither to any of their family or Garriçons: except only to such as would make head, and withstand them in Armies; but to send the Gouernours safely and well away, with their goods. Moreover, that the Castles and strongest holds or Cittadels, should be rased from the top to the bottom: to declare by manifest effect, that they had not undertaken Armes for blowes or pillage, but onely to conferre their Countries liberty. This resolution agreed on, each man retired home to his house, awaiting for the day appointed: in the meane space, according to faithful promise, they kept their determination very secret.

While these affaires were thus in forwarding, there happened a notable accident at Vri. One Guillaume Tell, a man in the confederacy, diuers times passed by before the Har exalted on the Pole, as formerly hath bene related, without performing any reuerence thereto. And being therefore accused to the Gouernour Grissler: he entreated, that his incivility might bee excused, because hee reputed such reuerence to bee a matter of no importance. But the Gouernour, who held him a man much to be suspected, among Guillaumes children, made choise of a young little boy, whom the Father loued very dearly. And hee commanded Guillaume (being known an excellent atcher) to set his sonne some good distance off, & with an Arrowe, to cleaue an Apple vpon his head, which if he did not, his owne head should be smitten off. Guillaume Tell answered, that his commaund was too strange and seuer, and he had rather die, then thorough default of shooting right, to kill his dearest sonne. If thou doest not performe it, saide the Gouernour, it shall cost both thy life, and thy sonnes.

Prayers and entreaties not preuailling, Tell tooke his Bowe; and, by the providence of God (who questionlesse guided and directed the Arrow) cleft the Apple in twaine vpon his sonnes head. Euerie

one of the beholders did not a little reioyce, at such a faire and admirable shoot: but the Governour, not contented with so perillous a satisfaction, perceiving another Arrow remaining vnder Guillaumes girdle, demanded of him, what vñe meant to make of that other Arrow? Guillaume replied, that it was a custome among Archers, to draw more arrows then one out of their Quivers, for any occasiõ that might happen. But the Governour suspecting something else, pressed him more & more; & finally, promised him to saue his life, if he would confesse the truth: which accordingly Tell did, and that he had that other Arrow ready, therewith to kill the Governour, if his first shaft had slaine his Son. Then the Governour declared, that he wold not take away his life, because he had promised the contrary: but he should be kept in perpetuall prison, and live miserably in darknesse, without conuersing with any man living. Thus speaking, he caused him to be fast bound with cordes, & led into a Barque, that hauing past the Lake of Vri, he might be conuayed to the Cattle of Cusnach. The Governour, with his people & prisoner, being in the midst of the Lake, a greenous tempest suddenly exalted it selfe, which did put the Barque in euident perill. They perceiving themselves in extreme danger of their liues: one of Grislers seruants laid to his master, that there was but one only means whereby to saue them, and that was, to vnbinde Guillaume Tell, and refer the Barques conduct to him, because he was a most expert Marriner, strong and able to direct them in such a necessity. So extreme vrgent was the case, that euery man allowed the counsell, & vnbound Tell; who fastening hold on the Rudder, and guiding it manfully, preferred the Barque among the roughest billowes, turning her prow towards the country of Suits.

Hauing attained neere enough vnto the shore, there appeared a mighty stone (like vñto a Rock) about the water, which to this day is called Telles Stone. Being hard by it, Tell caught hold thereon with his bow, which lay at his feete in the Poupe, and leaping forth quickly vpon that stone, he gaue so strong a thrust with his foot against the Barques side, that it returned back among the steame billows. This done, he tooke his flight thence, and hid himselfe among the neighbouring Mountaines. The Barque hauing long floated in this manner, was guided at length by the Gouvernours seruants, to a Port named Brune des Fontaines. From thence the Governour set on his way towards Cusnach, and must needs passe thorough a hollow craggy straite, where Tell (well acquainted with all those parts) by great good hap had ambushed himselfe among thick bushes: there he discharged an Arrow at the Governour, which passed quite through his body, & slew him. Ther remaineth yet (so our time) a Chappell, built on the place where the Governour was slaine: and another vpon the Stone or Rocke, where Tell threw himselfe out of the Barque. After this successfull shoote, Tell went to Suits, where he made all these matters knowne to Stauffacher. From thence hee tooke his way ouer the highest Mountaines, and turning by Morsach, came back to Vri, wher hauing found Gautier Furst, he acquainted him with all that had hapned. By this time, they had gotten hearts and hands enow, to expell all the Governours family and followers: but hauing respect to them of Vnderwald, and remembering their former resolution for the first day of Ianuary following, they kept themselves quiet, & Tell (in the meane time) liued closely among his friends.

The first day of Ianuary being come, they of Vnderwald made themselves Masters of two Fortresses, according to a compromise passed between them. In the Fort of Rotzberg there dwelt a chambermaid, who was in loue with a goodly young man of Vnderwald, and committed folly with him. An especiall night of meeting being appointed by them both, the young man brought twenty other armed Soldiers with him, and caused them to lye closely hidden neere the Castle. He hauing giuen the signall to his wench, who knew nothing at all of the intended deceit, was mounted vp aloft to her by the helpe of a corde. Hauing staied some time of dalliance with her, making her to beleue one thing for another, he left the chamber a while, going to the window whereat he had bin drawne vp, & letting downe the cord, drew vp one of his companions, and then returned to his lasse againe. He that had thus gotten vp, neuer left till he had drawne vp all his other fellows, lowes, (who were vnmatchable for strength and courage) and so got possession of the place: where they kept all the gates strongly defended, and close shut vp, in expectation of good newes from their other consorts, who were to seize the other Fortresse, called Sarné.

That other company consisted of fifty valiant men, thirty of them hauing ambushed themselves in a neere neighboring wood: the rest went directly towards the Castle, leaning vpon staues and crutches, and carrying presents to the Governour, (according to custome of the day) as Lambs, Pigs, Calues, Cheeses, and such like things. The Governour was going to church, answerable to his ordinary wont at such a time, and met them on the way, where perceiving them to haue no other Armes then staues and crutches, which seruéd (as it seemed) to support their feeble bodies: hee made no doubt of any thing, but passed on, nor a little pleased with those presents, and brought him in more liberall and plentifull manner, then they were formerly wont to do. Their staues and crutches were made round, and pierced so hollow within: that they could easily scrow in long sharpe pikes of iron, which each of them carried close hid in his bosome. They came to the Castle, where being permitted entrance with their New-year's gifts: they possessed themselves of the Gates, giuing an appointed signall to their fellow-souldiers lying in the wood, who came immediately to succour them, and tooke them all prisoners that were in the Castle. Afterward, hearing that Rotzberg was surprized by their other associates, they released all their prisoners, and the Governour also, whom they had laid sure hold on, as hee was about to escape. When the Governour and his followers had solemnly promised vpon oath, neuer more to retorne againe into those quarters; they gaue the leaue to depart, & sent them by safe conduct out of the Country, and then ruined those two strong Forts or Castles flat to the ground. The very same day also, they of Vri demolished the new Cittadell, which Grisler had named, The yoke of the Priams, being not as yet fully finished: and in Suits, Stauffacher (with his followers) won and ruined the Cittadell of Louerts, builded nere vnto the Lake. On the morrow, the three villages (by their Deputies) made a publike league of amity and alliance, to continue for ten years, vpon the conditions before mentioned, confirming them all by solemne oath. Behold the end of their tyrannicall government, whom Albert had established ouer the Cantons.

When Albert had receiued tydings of this sudden change: he was wonderfully enraged, and resolved to make war vpon the cantons, as thinking by strong hand to bring them in subiection. He sent first of all to his subiects of Zug, Lucerne, & other neighbours of Suits, Vri, and Vnderwald, to suffer no viduals to be conuayed to them. But in a short while after, he was slaine by his owne Nephew, the Son of his Brother, and by his complices, in passing ouer the River of Raff: so that this war by him intended, remained now to be freshly attempted. His sonnes, being sufficiently hindred from reuenging his death, left the Switzers in peace: fearing lest they should ioine with the Gendemen, who had slaine their Father. About this time, they of Austria ruined many strong places in Helucia, as in the Territory of Zurich, Warte, Mulperg, Schnabelberg, Maschwande the Towne and Castle, and Farrwange in the neighbouring quarter. Some most noble families also were by them subuerted and extermined, to wit, that of Eschinbach, Wartz, Palme, & many other. For at the taking of the Castle of Forwange, in one day, 63. Gentlemen, with their seruants, had their heads smitten off: And in other parts of Switzerland, they of Austria caused to be slaine, or banished out of the country, about a 1000. persons, the most part whereof were Noble. There are some ill-willers, that do falsely accuse the Switzers, to haue defolated many places, & expelled many Noble families: when al this while, those horrid actions (for the most part) were committed by them of the house of Austria.

Henry of Luzelbourg, 7. Emperor of that name, succeeded after Albert. He confirmed the priuiledges & ancient liberty of the 3. cantons, & established a Prouost or Advocate of the Empire, to be Iudge in law cases in the Towne of Zurich, the round neighbouring places, and in the three Cantons, in name of the Emperor. This Prouost was named Raoul of Habsbourg, Lord of Lauffenberg, Sonne to

But the Emperor Henry being gon into Italy, (in which journey an hundred Souldiers of Zurich, and as many of the other Cantons, were at his pay) the Prouost was falsely accused (as some say) before the Emperor, by the means of Duke Leopold, who hated him, and said that he had abused his authority. So that he was deposed, and Edward de Buge, dwelling at Turge, substituted in his place. Afterward, Raoul being brought to answer his cause at the Court of France, dyed at Montpellier. His seruants brought backe his body, and caused it to bee buried in the Abbey of Wettingen.

The Sonnes of Albert, having slaine all them that were present at the murder of their Father, and expelled all their other complices; became rich and powerful, for they had seized on the goods of all the that had hand in the death of Albert. The three cantons were highly in their malice and disgrace, yet they durst not begin war vpon them, fearing (perhaps) the Emperor, who had taken the Switzers into his protection: but neuertheless, they tholested the Cantons by diuers in-roades, for they could easily offend them of Vnderwald, by Boates descending on the lake of Lucerne; yet the Cantons kept themselves carefully within compasse of their guards, & mutually assisted one another.

In the year one thousand three hundred and ten, a Ship well munited & furnished with men, set forth from Lucern, to make assault on the of Vnderwald, that were come (by great chance) with a Shippe of warre to assist them; did both bondge & strike the Vessell of Lucerne, very neere to the Port, killing a great number of the Souldiers, and taking the rest prisoners. This losse thus received, they of Lucerne (and their neighbours)ooke truce with the Cantons. In the same year, they of Suits, being desirous to pacifie all matters among them: bought of Ennard, Count of Habspourg, Arte and Cusnach, Villages of their Cantons, and subiects to the house of Habspourg, encreasing & enlarging the limitation of their bounds very much that way. But on the other side they had warre against the Monkes of the Hermitage, & for the space of about four hundred years; each being at push of the Pike against the other, and for those reasons which I will breecely relate.

The Emperor Otho, surnamed the great, about the year 950. hadde established certaine bounds to them of Suits, and to the Monkes of the Hermitage. In these limitations, some Mountaines (fertile for pasturage) were left to the Monkes, which till that time had bene possessed by them of Suits. It came to passe, that they would not keepe themselves to the Emperours appointment; but held their ancient limits. The Abbots of the Hermitage, who were not able enough to debout the out of their possession; gave not ouer to obtaine of the Emperours successors, confirmation of the ordinance set downe by Otho. About the year one thousand, forty foure, the Abbot Geron accused them of Suits to Henry the third, Emperor. Raoul and Arnaud, Earles of Lentzbourg, & Governors of Zug, being ioyned with them of Suits, made their complaint likewise, that their limits were much abridged. But the Emperour Henry re-confirmed the grant of Otho, & condemned the Counts of Lentzbourg to a certaine fine of mony; all which notwithstanding, they of Suits kept themselves in their ancient possession still, in despite of all y the Abbot could do. Once more then, about the year of our Lord, 1144, the Abbot Raoul accused them before Conrad the second, Emperour, who confirmed also the sentence of Otho. Neuertheless, they of Suits maintained themselves (perforce) in possession still, and the Abbot (on the contrary side) defending the limits giuen him by the Emperour, and making vie of them accordingly; raised warre vpon them, inuading continually one another, and taking prisoners on cyther side. These enmities endured a long time, and at last, Raoul, Count of Rapperswill, brought them to an agreement, in the year 1217. This accord was imbraced & kept for about the space of fifty years, at the end of which time, there came an Abbot, named Anselmus, vnder whom nouell differences began: because that both sides expounded the tract of pacification, in a contrary sense and meaning.

The war being againe renewed, continued foure and forty years: but soone after, they of Zurich laboured to ratifie

a firme peace, in the time of Henry the seauenth. While they were treating on this peace, some men of Suits, being gon in pilgrimage to this Abbey of the Hermitage: were villanously and publicly outraged by certaine Monks, which wholly brake off the negotiation. Moreover, the Princes of Austria, who had appropriated to themselves the protection of the Abbey: incensed the Abbot and Monks against them of Suits, promising them continuall succour. The warre hauing lasted long, wherein they of Suits were greatly endamaged: at length, in the year, 1313, the 23. day of February, they went forth secretly into the fields in the night time, & hauing deceiued the guardes; entered by strong hand into the Abbey, taking and leading thence the Monks that had done the outrage, together with the Curate of the place, named John, and the Master of the Schoole, named Raoul. There were then Monkes of noble birth in the Abbey, namely, Raoul, and Henry of Wunzburg, John Kegenberg, and Burckhard Fleminger. This was the cause, that the Counts of Habspourg and of Togge, and the Baron of Kegenberg, who were their neere allies and kinsmen, as also John of Schwanden, Abbot of the Hermitage, greatly imployed their pains with them of Suits, for these Monkes. When the Monks had solemnly promised vpon oath, neuer more to deale with them of Suits in any such enterprize, nor to attempt any matter of reuenge vpon them: they were released, hauing first payed nine hundred pounds Tournois. But this enlargement came so farre short of appeasing them: that it wrought a quite contrary effect in them, continually fixing their thraldome before their eyes; so that thence forward, they fought all meanes whereby to inure them of Suits.

Hereupon happened a new occasion of troubles. After the death of the Emperour Henry, in the year 1314, the States of the Empire being assembled to create a new Emperour; the Electors found themselves to be diuided in opinion. Foure of them elected Lewes of Bawaria, fourth of that name: but the other three gaue their voices to Frederick of Austria, the Sonne to Albert. He to make his part equal in voices to Lewes his number, named Henry, Duke of Carinthia, as King of Bohemia, maintaining that this kingdome belonged to him, by right of the Countrey. Frederick counted this Duke among them that should giue their voyces; altho that John, sonne to Henry the 7. was king of Bohemia, hauing married the daughter to the late deceated king. This dismembring of the Empire, caused those greivous troubles in Germany and Scluetia. The three Cantons, enemies to the house of Austria, ioyning themselves with Lewes of Bawaria: all their neighbors being before in their protection of Austria, or else at the time of these elections, approoued that of Frederick. Now in regard that the three Cantons onely, made head against Frederick; he reuailed so far, that (by his action) the Bishoppe of Constance excommunicated them, & they were banished by the Court Imperiall, which was at Rotuelle. They were charged, that they had violated the abbey of the Hermitage, & (in that tumult) had cast downe and spoiled the holy sacrifice: which they of Suits firmly and stoutly denied, promising contrariwise, severely to punish the offenders in such a delict, prouided, y they might be discouered to them. And although they could not produce any one; yet notwithstanding, they remained banished & excommunicated. In regard whereof, they humbly entreated the Emperour Lewes to vndertake the knowledge of this cause: which he did, and procured afterward, that they were reintegrated into the communion of the Church.

In this time, the Gentlemen that were forth of the lands of the 3. Cantons, with the Gouvernors; solicited Leopold of Austria, Son to Albert, to make war vpon the Cantons. The Abbot of the Hermitage, and the Count of Monfort rouled on this wheele with their belt helpe. The occasion was very honest, as it seemed, to wit; that the Prince purposed to reuenge the outrage done to the Chappell of the Virgin Mary. The young Prince, being young, powerfull, and a true heire to his Fathers hatreds; suffered himself to be thus counselled, and intended prosecution of this wat. His forces were about him, by whose meanes he had spoiled the places and castles of his fathers murderers: & Souldiers were people aptly disposed for war, and made rich by the booties they had taken in those castles. Moreover, he leued a

Army, collected from Swisse, Suaba, and Alsatia, dividing all their powers into two parts. One of them, which (as is credibly affirmed) consisted of about twenty thousand men; was conducted by himselfe against them of Suiss. He gaue the rest to the Count of Strasberg, Governour of the vale of Hassell, that they might ascend the Mountaine of Brugg, and assaile that side belonging to them of Vnderwald.

The voluntary offer of the Cantons to the Prince, requesting peace and no way desirous of warre.

The Cantons hearing newes of this preparation, mustered vp their forces, & because nothing might remaine as forgotten: they sent to craue peace of the Prince, by the Count of Togge, promising to accept the Prince as their Iudge, & to make answer in his presence, to the Abbot of the Hermitage, and to the expelled Nobility. But the Prince would allow no audience to the Count, and refused all negotiation of peace. The whole hope and expectation of quietnes being thus cut off; a Fast was published & commanded throughout the Cantons, and prayers devoutly made to God. All such as could carry Armes, were sent to the Garrisons in all those parts, where any entrance might be made into the countries.

The assembly of the forces of the three Cantons, and their number.

But because the Prince was at Zug, with the greater part of his power: the allies assembled themselves at Suiss, which is the very neerest Canton to Zug, and there were mustered foure hundred Souldiers of Vri, three hundred of Vnderwald, and sixe hundred of Suiss. These made vp 1300. men in all, and thus they resolved to attend the enemy, valiantly exposing their liues, for conservation of their countries, liberties, wives, and children: declaring themselves (in this case) no lesse worthy of commendation, then the Lacedaemonians, who fighting for the freedom of Greece, dyed all with their weapons in their hands, at the passage of the Thermopylae. It is said, that the Lord of Hunenberg, a worthy Gentleman, dwelling in the territory of Zug, and being then in the Army of Prince Leopold, taking compassion on the death of so many innocents, at whose throates flicyng knives lay overready (for it was concluded by the Nobility, to put the three Cantons to fire & sword) did secretly aduertise the confederates, by a Letter which he shor vnto the fastened at an Arrow, that the day of S.

Omer (which was the 15. of Nouember) they should be assailed at a place called Morgarten, and therefore it stood them on to looke to their businesse. The allies hearing this, fortified strongly that place, appointing men to all the wayes whereby the enemy should passe, and encamped themselves aloft on the Mountaine.

Fifty men had then ranked themselves together, which had bene banished from Suiss, and they humbly desired, that their banishment might be reuoked, offering to employ their paines courageously, for the safety of their Country. But a sad answer was returned them, to wit, that many among them were guilty of very greuous crimes: therefore they would not accept such people for companions, as fearing lesse those faulty persons, might be the occasion of harme to the whole Army. These poore banished men (for all this) would not giue over their good affection, which they had intirely addicted to their Countries succour: but got possession of a little high Hill on the Frontiers, which hung ouer the way, whereby (of necessity) the enemy must passe.

The sixteenth day of Nouember being come, in the year, 1315. Leopold caused his troopes to issue forth of Zug, about the breake of day; the infantry marching foremost, with all the Nobility and horsemen: for the Gentlemen had resolved to chastise the poore Country people with their owne hands, whom they teamed the Seditious. As they were entered on the confines of Suiss, hauing the Lake of Egeria on the one side, the high Mountaines on the other, and their Army betwene both. The banished men began to roule downe from the Mountaines top, great huge stones, and mighty Logs of Timber, vpon the Princes Army. Afterward, without the least intermission, hauing laid together great heaps of incredible big sharpe-pointed Flints: then showed them downe (as it were) vpon the horsemen, euen like to a violent tempest of haile.

This accident neuer expected, did put the Army into very great trouble; for men were not able to gouerne their horses, frighted with the continuall falling of sharpe stones from aloft, and very greuous wounds they received by the. This being noted by them of Suiss, who were ranged ranged vpon a very high place: they marched on to meete the enemy in the face; and (from a farre off) threw huge stones, and thor sharpe pointed arrows at them. Afterward, they came to handy grappling, and charges with Halberds to rarioufise, that both horse and foote were put to flight; among whom, the Abbot of the Hermitage, and the Count of Mountfort were the foremost, as is credibly reported.ouer and beside the footmen, 500. horsemen were slaine in this battell, beside many drowned in the Lake, & a great number (by reason of the narrowe passage, which hindred the sauing of themselves) were murdered by their own fellows, and trodden to death with horses. Two and fifty Citizens of Zurich, being all habited alike in garments of one colour, and well knowne by the Cantons, to be the most valiant men in all the enemies army, being sent by the Senate to succour the Duke of Austria, were slaine in the field.

The selfsame day as the battaile was fought at Morgarten, the Count of Strasberg (hauing chased the Garrison of Brugg from the Mountain) entered into the Country with three thousand men, and began to forrage euery where. He incamped at Alpenach, which is a Village in the Canton of Vnderwald, threatening the next morning to invade the other part of the country beyond the Forrest, if they on the higher side did not willingly yeeld themselves. But in the meane while, they of Vnderwald beyond the Forrest, assembled them of the Mountaines round about, & called to their assistance them on the higher side the Forrest, whom the enemy had not found as yet, and by the same meanes gaue knowledge to their partakers which were at Suiss. The Messenger arrived at Brugg the morrow after the battaile, but others say, that it was the very same day. These newes being thus come, they of Vnderwald put themselves vpon the Lake, and made such diligence in getting to their houses, as in two hours space (by painfull labour and speed of the Ferry men) they crossed ouer the Lake, which indeede was very broad. An hundred men of Suiss did accompanie them, with whome they arrived at the Port of Buchs, which is a village appertaining to them; then going on from thence to Burgenslad, ioyned their people with the others troopes.

Diligence and haste, with expedient & suitable when urgent necessity is a spur there to.

Soone after, they came to assaile the enemy, who was come thither by the Lake of Lucerne, and ranged on through the country: but they compelled them to flight, and made them glad speedily to recover their Boats. Hauing thus chased them thence, they went towards Alpenach, to seeke the Count of Strasberg: & although it was late, they concluded (nevertheless) to assaile the enemy, because his powers were dispersed amongst the Villages, where they piled and rauaged. Moreover, night could be no hinderance to them, that were well acquainted with all the straites and passages of the Country: which was an excellent resolution, and wonderfull contrary to the enemy. For very hardly could the Count of Strasberg endure their first shocke or encounter, because the dispersion of his foldiers amazed him: and when hee saw two Ensignes belonging to them of Vnderwald, like a good and discreet warrior, he perceived himself, that they of Austria were overthrowne at Morgarten.

Hecreupon, he speedily retired (throw the Mountaines) home to his owne house, and the rest fled amaine and confusedly: but yet not all, for three hundred of them were leit slaine in the field, and the whole booty taken from the enemies hand. They of Suiss and Vri, hauing provided for their affaires, came to succour their confederates of Vnderwald, and in the night arrived at Buchs, where they did heare tidings of the victory. Wherefore hauing first giuen thanks to God, & gratified their friends with fo fortunate a successe, they returned home vnto their owne houses.

This victorie, settled and assured the foundation of the Switzers confederacie or alliance, and from thence forward, they of Suiss, Vri, and Vnderwald, changed their league of ten yeares, into a perpetual alliance, and so passed it by authenticall Letters. The Switzers tooke their name of Eydgnossen (which signifieth partakers in swearing, or conioyned together by one and the same oath) by this alliance. At this time, among strangers, they are called Lords of Leagues, and Switzers, by reason of the Village of Canton of Suiss. The Tenure of League and Alliance, confirmed betwene the three Cantons.

IN the Name of God. Amen. Forasmuch as humane sense is infirme and fraile, which is the cause that things intended to be durable and perpetuall (as they ought to be) are too soone and very easily lost or forgotten: It is therefore profitable and necessary, that such things as are established for peace, tranquillity, profite, and honour of men, should be couched and published by writings, and authentick instruments. So then We of Vri, Suites, & Vnderwald, give all men to knowe, who shall either see or heare these present Letters, that foreseeing & providing for difficult and queasie times, and for our more commodious enuying peace and rest, which are the best meanes, whereby to conserue our bodies and goodes: Wee haue promised and sworn each to other, in good Faith, and by Christian Oath, that Wee will mutually consult, counsell, and aid one another, to warrant our liues, and defend our goods at our owne expences, at all times, against all and euerie one, that would or shall offer outrage either to our bodies or goods, to vs or Ours, in any manner whatsoever.

Notwithstanding, if wrong be done to any one of vs, either in his body or goodes, We are all bound to succour him to our power: to the end, that (by friendship or iustice) the wrong may be amended or repaid. Moreover, We binde our selues by the same Oath, that none of the three Cantons, shall receiue any man as Lord and Commander, without the aduice and liking of the other. Each one of vs, as well males as females, shall stand bound to obey their natural Lords and Masters, and liue vnder their lawfull power, in all seruices iust and legitimate: except the said Lords offer violence (in any manner whatsoever) to any of the Cantons, for vnto such Masters they shall do no service, vntill such time as they be concorded with the Cantons. We haue covenanted also, that not any of the Cantons or Confederates, shall minister an Oath, or binde himselfe to any stranger, without the aduice of the other Cantons and Confederates. Not any person of the Confederates, shall communicate with a stranger (without aduice and permission of other Confederates) so long as the Cantons shall with out a Lord. And if any one of our Cantons, violate and infringe any thing, or point of that which is contained in these presents: he shall be esteemed as a disloyall and perjured person, and his body and goodes consigne to the Cantons.

MOREOVER, WE haue agreed and condiscended, not to accept or entertaine any iudge or Magistrate, that shall buy his office with money, or any bribe else, although he be of our owne Countrey. If difference or warre happen to be moued among the Confederates: then such as are knowne to bee of most honesty and wiseome, shall meet together, to pacifie & confound the war or difference, either by lowing composition, or censure of right. If one side do reiect this proposition, the Confederates shall assist the other side, to the end, that the debate may be ended, either by amity or iudiciall sentence, and at the charges of them that would not stand to the award.

If any suite or warre shall arise betwene two of the Cantons, and any one of them will not yeeld to a friendly composition, or according to right: the third Canton shall maintaine the cause of that side, that submitted most to reason, and powerfully assist it, either to end the contention by a lowing composition or by iudiciall sentence. If any one of the Confederates shall kill one of his owne followers, he must dye also: except hee can make it appeare, and the Judges likewise auouch by their sentence, that he did it vpon urgent necessity, and in defence of his owne bodie. If he fyre for the fact, whosoever of our Countries shall receiue him into his house, there to lodge or maintaine him: he is to be banished perpetually, except by common consent of the Confederates.

If any of the Confederates either priuily, manifestly or impudently, shall fire any noise or goe's off from other of the Confederates: he shall bee expulsed (for euer) out of our Countreies, and whosoever lozeth or instanceth him, shall stand bound to satisfie the others losses. No person shall exact a pawning or age, except it be of his debter, or one unable to answer him otherwise: and it is not to be done neither, without consent of the Judge. That euery man shall be obedient vnto his iudge, and make publike declaration, which iudge (of our Countreies) hee will accept, to undergoe iudgement before him. Whosoever refuseth to obey the sentence given, shall pay the interests to him of the Confederates, for whose profit & benefit the sentence was deliuered.

And to the end, that these conditions aboue written, may remaine firme, inuoliable and perpetuall: We subnamed Citizens & Allies of Vri, Suites, and Vnderwald, haue put our Seales to these presents, at Brunen, in the year of our Saviour Iesus Christ, 1315. being the morrow after the day of S. Nicholas.

These Cantons hauing conquered their enemies, and confirmed their Alliance, sent men to the Emperor Lewes, to aduertise him of all. He at the beginning of the year, held a day imperiall at Nuremberg, where the Princes of Austria were condemned of high treason, the goods which they had in Suisse, confiscated to the Emperor and Empire, and the liberty of the Cantons fully confirmed. The Letters containing this ordination, were given in the campe at Merride, the 23. day of March, in the year 1316. & the second year of the Emperor Lewes. The same Emperor, about the year 1323. established as Governour in these three Cantons, John, Count of Arberg, vnto whom (as Lieutenant of the Emperour Lewes) the Cantons gaue their Oath.

The Governour promised them also by Letters Patents, that hee would not diminish or preiudice (in any maner whatsoever) their liberties and alliances, nor suffer them to be alienated from the Empire, neither to be reduced vnder the power of them of Austria, or of the Noblemen excluded from the Countreies of the Cantons. Beside, that no man amongst them should be drawne in iustice out of these countreies, and that their iuges should not be taken from any place else; but meere from among themselves. And because the Governours should not infringe the liberties of the Cantons, their power was limited by the Emperour, and prohibited (vnder greuous penalties) from diminishing in any manner whatsoeuer, the liberties granted to the Cantons. The Letters Patents which contained these articles, were given at Pavia in the year 1329. and on the day of S. John Baptist. The Emperours that succeeded Lewes, confirmed these things, and permitted (moreouer) to the Cantons, to elect Governours (for their countreies) among themselves, but in the Emperours name, and to haue highest iustice in causes both ciuill and criminall.

They of Austria hauing bin so shrewdly gauld, as hitherto hath bene declared, grew to truce, not because their forces were wholly weakened: but in regard that they were unpeached in war against the Emperor Lewes, so that they could not deal with so many matters all at a time.

In the meane while (neuertheless) some incursions and losses were made in Suisse on either side. It came to passe, that they of Wesen and their neighbours, which liued below the gouernment of Glaris, and in diuers kinds mollected them of Suites: who came and met them with a main army, and compelled them to craue peace. On the other side, the Abbot of the Hermitage, had caused the three Cantons to be excommunicated, especially them of Suits: first by the byshop of Constance, & afterward by the Pope. Fredericke of Austria, who termed himselfe to bee Emperour, likewise banished them but the Emperor Lewes tooke away the curse, and by his commandement, Peter, Archbishop of Mayence, remitted them into the communion of Christians. Also, the Abbot of the Hermitage, wrote to them of Suits that hee had renounced the Popes Bull, and would not suffer it to bee serued against them.

During this time, that the truce continued on either part, they of Austria drew into league with them, Herrmin & Ewald, Counts of Kybourg, and Lordes of Dnn: this happened in the year 1317. By the means meanes of these Earles, they procured such an hindrance, that the men of Unterwald could send no victuals to Underwald. In the yeere one thousand three hundred twenty three, they drew to them Iohn of Habsbourg, Lord of Rapernwill, and heyere to the Count of Hombourg. Afterward, they combined themselves with him, against the Cantons, because his Landes neighboured to the Canton of Suites, and lay aptly to cut off all releefe, and rayse warre. The yeare following, Raoul and Herman, Counts of Werdenberg, and Lords of Sargans, made alliance also with Leopold of Austria: but their brother Henry tooke part with the Emperour Lewes, who (at that time) was excommunicated and deprived of the Empire by the Pope. By these meanes, great divisions fell in the empire, some depending on the Popes decree; others mocking it, and cleaving to Lewes, as their lawfull Emperour.

In these troubles, the Cantons maintained themselves carefully, and in amitie with the partakers of Lewes; whereto also, many Townes of Suisse conformed themselves. For, although (at the beginning) they of Zurich, and some others followed the part of Frederick of Austria: yet notwithstanding, he being prisoner, and having renounced the empire, albeit his brethren continued warre agaynst Lewes, they of Zurich ioyned with Lewes: as with him that then was their onely true Emperour. In the yeare 1327. the Cantons made alliance with the Imperiall cities and townes, that stood fast for Lewes, to wit, Meyence, Wormes, Spire, Straßbourg, Basile, Fribourg, Constance, Linaw and Vberlingen: with this League they of Zurich and Berne combined themselves. But five hundred yeares after, Lucerna made perpetuall alliance with the three Cantons. In few words, I will tell you the occasion, after I have first declared somewhat, concerning the beginning and estate of the said City, before it became allied with the Cantons.

CHAP. III.

Of the Originall estate of Lucerna, before it
lesged it selfe with the Cantons.

The city of Lucerna is seated on the river Russe, which issueth forth of a great Lake, whereby wee may passe to the three Cantons. Also, at the foote of an high Mountaine, commonly called Pilates Mount. The situation is commodious, because this is the way, to traueil by the mountain of Saint Godard in Italy. From Fribourg, the Merchants are transported ouer the Mountaines, and from thence into Italy, with beasts of carriage: and (reciprocally) the Merchants of Italy descend by the Lake and River of Russe, to the Rhein, & thence into the Ocean sea.

It is not certainly knowne, neither at what time, nor by whom the Citie was builded: but one saith well, that on each side of the River there is a castle (which are houses nowe inhabited by Citizens) and builded by the Allemaings or Germaines. Concerning the opinion of Etterlinus, who wrote some small history of Suisse or Smetia, referring these matters to the house of Austria, and thinketh that those castles serued as a retreat for robbers and theues: he abuseth his own iudgement greatly therein. For, in the time of Raoul of Habsbourg (and no sooner) they of Austria began to command in these quarters here, when the Dutchie of Austria fell to the house of Habsbourg. And it is no way credible, that a Prince would euer endure; that theues should make vse of a passage so commodious, for traueiling from Suisse into Italy.

It seemeth, that Lucerna was so named, in regard of a Lanterne, which duly euery night is there advanced, and bright lights clearly shining therein, for benefite of passengers vpon the Lake. And it is very likely, that the high ancient Tower, which (at this day) standeth aloofe on the bridge (as in like manner there is another at Zurich, called Wellemburg) serued for that purpose. Our graue ancientes & forefathers, termed euery such kind of Tower Pharos. A Charter granted to Guichard the Priest, auoucheth, that Lucerna deriued her name from Antiquity. For, the Annales of Lucerna do declare, that the Lucernians (hauing serued Charlemaigne in a warre against the Sarazins) obtained of him diuers priuiledges, and especially, the vie of Corners, wherewith they did both summon the batailles and retreats, euen as they doe nowe at this present time.

Be it howsoeuer, anciently, the Canons of the colledge of Lucerna, helde great authoritie, as also in many Townes of Germany. This colledge was founded by Guichard the Priest, brother vnto Kasperle, Leader of the horsemen to king Lewes, who was sonne to King Theodorick, who died in the yeare seven hundred, & founded also the colledge of Canons at Zurich. The colledge of Lucerna fell to the Abbot of Murbach, by the donation of King Pepin. The same Abbot was Lord of Lucerna, vntill the time of the Emperour Albert of Austria: who hauing resolved to establish a new kinde of principality in Smetia, as already wee haue told you, bought Lucerna of the Abbot of Murbach, by giving him foure villages in Alsatia, and a certaine summe of money, amounting to the valew of two thousand Markes of money, as it is affirmed.

This City enioyed (formerly) the enfranchisement of many things, & sundry goodly priuiledges beside, so long as the Abbots were Lords thereof: and yet they held no foucaigne iurisdiction: for, the citizens were the greatnes of the city, builded the wals and rampiers, and fortified it (by their owne discretion) in those times. The Prince of Austria also promised for his part, to conferre their priuiledges inuolubly, and made shew of being a verie gentle Lord, as he was neuer sparing of goodly promises. But soon after, the dominion of the Austrians proved to gripe and oppresse the Lucernians, who were constrained (to their great (disadvantage) to make warre vpon their neighbours. For they were the first that exposed themselves to make incursions on the Cantons, and maintained a garrison in their cities at their great charge. The Tower of Sbourg, which standeth yet to this day cōfirmeth what hath bin said for there it was, where the Lucernians planted a Corps de guard, against the incursions which their enemies made vpon the Lake. When they had no open war, nor any assurance of peace, the Austrians did not much care to maintain them. In the meane while, Trafficke ceased, the fields were foraged, and many times the Lucernians fell into the hands of their enemies. Moreouer, being gone to warre with them of Glaris, vnder the conduct of Otho, Capitaine of Colmar, to encounter with the Emperour Lewes, the wages promised them, was made void and frustrate. They themselves had paid many in other warres, and lent good summes of money on sedules, to Captaines of the Austrian Princes; but now, in place of payment, they were handled in such sort, as they thought both their good seruice and mony utterly lost.

Being thus tyred and harried so many feuerall waies, they supplicated and desired (oftentimes) them of Austria, to be at peace with the Cantons. But perceiving they traualled all this while in vaine, themselves (in the end) accorded with the Cantons, leauing (nevertheless) the rights of the houle of Austria to them intirely. This peace exasperated not onely them of Austria, but also many citizens, seruants, and pensioners to Gentlemen, by whom they benefited & enriched themselves. Both the one & other feared, that the City would ally it selfe with the three Cantons, and that in so doing, they would estrange themselves from the Austrians. And therefore they conspired together, to oppresse them that had counceiled the people to make this peace, and that they should exhort them to be allied with some other. For this effect, in secret they contracted a league; the substance whereof was this, That at a certaine houre of the night, they of the city should open the gates, and at the same instant, they of Austria, (with so many horsemen well appointed) should make seizure of the Citie. Afterwardes, hauing ioyned their

zens in a time

But the Citizens being advertised, of the traines and ambushes prepared for them, vpon the appointed night did put themselues into armes, & placed good guards at the gates, & provided so fully for their safety, that such as tooke part with the house of Austria, durst not bee seene any way to stirre. Then the Gouvernour of Rotembourg (with many Gentlemen) being come to the gates, they of the City (to whom he termed himselfe a friend) gaue him entrance, and some small number with him, suffered the rest to stand without. Perceiuing that this cunning tricke tooke no such successe as he expected, and not daring to doe any thing by open force, because he was the weaker, he returned the next morning to Rotembourg with his traine, and some Citizens of Lucerna, partakers with the Austrians, fearing to be punished by the City, went away with him.

The league & alliance
made betweene them of Lucerna, &
the 3. Cantons

This combination was the cause of hastening the league: between the Lucernians and the three Cantons, for perceiuing the injuries and ambushes of the Nobility, and the dangers where-with they threatened them: they thought it fit not to reject the succour of their neighbours, which they accepted, as sent from heauen. So they became vnited together, on the Saturday before Saint Martins day, in the year one thousand, three hundred, thirty two.

Extremity vr-ged against the Lucerna-ns by them
of Austria.

When the Austrians had intelligence hereof, they appointed Garrisons in diuers places about Lucerna, as namely, at Sempach, Rotembourg, and Meyenberg: by means whereof, they did cut off all victuals from the Lucernians: and if any ventured farre from the City, they were either slain, or taken prisoners, so that they were constrained to goe seeke for food with a maine army. The year ensuing, and the seuenteenth day of March, the Lucernians going with their troopes towards Buchnass (which is a Castle, now called Hertenstein, vpon the Lake of Zug) the Lord of Ramsburg, Gouvernour of Rotembourg, for the house of Austria, layde an ambuscado for them on the way, and slew about some fourescore of them. The rest that were scattered in the fields, and looking after pillage, assembled themselves together, neere to Buchnass, and charged the enemy to courageously, that they enforced them to flight, hauing first lost an hundred foote, and eightene horse.

The Gouvernour of Austria well perceiuing, that ouert power stood not for his aduantage, neither did any way benefite him in his businesse: vnderooke the first traine of ambuscadoes, and priuate practices. There were then at Lucerna, many persons that had bene pensioners to the house of Austria. This war was verie troublesome to them, for they had lost their pensions, and besides, enjoyed not the reuennewes of their owne inheritances; which (for the most part) lay on the lands of the Austrians. The Gouvernour conferred with them, and because they were of the very worst houses in the City, and the cheefest of them: he aduised them to perswade the Citizens to renounce their alliance with the three Cantons, and render themselves again to the house of Austria. He shewed them, that they might bee much more endamaged by one Prince, being a potent enemy, & so neere a neighbour, then by the three Cantons, who (in the pasted Warres) could doe them little, or no harme at all.

And forasmuch as it had happened at this very time, that the lower Towne, and the fields about it, were greatly injured by impetuous and extraordinarie raines: the Gouvernour made vse of this accident, to his own aduantage; telling them that God punished them by such a means, because they rebelled against their lawfull Prince. But because these coniurations could not preuaile, nor hee moue the people with all his goodly persuasions; he would compasse his intention by another stratagem, and plotted with close confederates, to massacre the Authors and confederators of this Alliance with the Cantons, taking their faith vnder oath, and Letters signed and sealed. And, because they might be knowne one to another, each of the Conspirators did wear red sleeves, which onely was their noted mark. Whereupon grew the Prob-uerbe (afterward) among them of Lucerna: Beware the hand of Red sleeves, and it was held for a matter extremely ignominious, to tell any man, that he was one of the red sleeves band.

The number of the conspirators increased, and then they assigned the day for the massacre, which was the last day of June, being the Feast day of S. Peter & S. Paul, Apostles. They were to meete vnder the great Arch or Gate, neere to the publike house of the Taylors fraternity: for then the watch for night should cease to walke the round in that quarter: Also, the Lieutenant to the Duke of Austria, must haue an army ready to bee let into the City by the conspirators, who (purposely) should open the gates. But God (by his gracious prouidence) discovered these bloody consultations, the very same night as the massacre was to bee executed. For, as the conspirers met in Armes at the place appointed, a yong man, passing accidentally by, without dreaming or thinking on any such matter, discovered the businesse, and vnderstood their deliberation. The night was very darke, by means whereof, he softly slipped away, hying speedily to the butcher or Shambles, where perceiuing by the lighted candles and noise he heard, that diuers were there vp out of bedde, drinking and playing: hee went in amongst them, and tolde them the things hee had heard.

Forthwith they ran to the Gouvernour, and acquainted him with the compact, & the Citizens quickly had warning to arm themselves, and good Guards also sent to the gates: moreover, they rushed in suddenly vpon the conspirators, and tooke them prisoners, before they could giue entrance to such supply as they expected from without. And to impeach the Lieutenant to the Duke of Austria, from attempting any thing by manifest force, or violence against the City, it being in this dangerous agitation: the same night they sent (in post) for succour vnto the three Cantons, who also sent them three hundred men early in the morning. After this happy supply was thus come to the, they consulted then together, concerning punishment to bee inflicted on the conspirators. Their Letters were laid before them, and such other guilty persons, who had escaped out of the tumult, by fauour of the nights extreame darkenesse, were likewise apprehended and imprisoned, as was most conuenient.

Now, in regard that the number of the conspirators was great; and, many among the of the principall houses, who had store of kindred and friends in the city. At request of the three Cantons, their liues were saued, and they punished by the purse, after they had solemnly sworn neuer to attempt any thing more against the state of the city, nor contrary to their alliance with the three Cantons. Heereupon, they of Lucerna made a law, whereby it was prohibited to the Citizens, not to make any assemblies or clandestine meetings in any place, nor to bind themselves one to another by Oath: except vpon any bargain they made for monies, they should leave twice as much in the hands of the Seignoury.

At this time, they of Austria were reconciled to the Emperor Fewer, to whom also, a great accusation was made of the three Cantons & the Lucernians. VVho (contrarywise) well excused themselves, and shewed, that they were allied vpon plenty of good reasons, and without doing wrong vnto any man. Whereupon, the Emperor gaue charge to them of Zurich, Herne, and Basile, who were then allied to the house of Austria, and friends also to the Cantons (for three yeares before, the men of Zurich had assisted them in a Warre against the Grisons) to pacifie the difference, and make an agreement of the Cantons with the Austrians.

VVherefore, in the yeare, one thousand three hundred thirty foure, by entermise of their Ambassadors, truce was taken for two yeares and an half, on these conditions following. That during this time, they of Lucerna should not be constrained to pay the monyes borrowed of them, nor the wages due to the Lucernians by the Captaines. That they might make vse and seruice of the Money of the Dukes of Zofinge, forged in their Citie: rendering obedience and honor done to the Dukes.

CHAP. III.

*Of the Originall condition, and estate of Zurich, before it leagued in with the amity of
the Cantons.*

It is not to bee doubted,
but that Zurich is one of the most ancient Cities of Swetia. The Annals of the country doe declare,
that it was builded sixe-teene yeares after the citie of Treues or Treueris. Marianus Scotus saith in his Chronicles, that Trebetus, son to Ninus, builded the city of Treues, in the time of the Patriarch Abraham. The Romane histories make honourable mention of the 1

Tigurines, who are they of Zurich, because they were present in the war of the Cimbrians against the Romans, and overthrew the Consul Cassius. Afterwards, when Iulius Caesar came to the conquest of the Gaules, they were vanquished and ruined by him. After that time, to the inuasion which the Allemaines or Germanes

made: Zurich was subiect to the Romane Empire, then fell into the hands of the Kings of France; and lastly, came to the Germane Empire, which beareth y name
and shadow of the Romane empire.

There are in Zurich two Colledgi-
all churches; one of men, the other of Women founded by the Kings of France. In ancient times, these colledges were (wellnecere) Lords & commanders of the citie.
There was also (heretofore) a castle, builded vpon a little hill, nere to the River of Limagus, where the Gouernours (established by the Kings of France) kepte their abiding, who were Prouosts of the city, & of those colledges. Afterward, vnder the Germane Emperors, those Prouosts still continued, but they dwelt not in the castle: because the gouernment was will-lingly giuen to the Princes. Neuertheles, since those times, there grew in the city a councell of fixe and thirty men, twelue
whereof gouerned for the space of foure moneths. The commonwealth was so ordered in the yeare, 1100. and continued in that estate till the yeare, 1336. and then it fell to changing, in manner as hereafter we shall declare.

From such time as the city beganne to throwe off the yoke of the Colledgiall churches, it began also to consider on his owne freedom, and how it might best receiue increasing. For, amongst the dis-sentions of the Emperors and Popes, the men of Zurich adhered to the Emperors, and followed Fredericke Barbarossa, *Frede-
ricke* the second, and Lewes of Banaria, who augmented thei liberties and franchises, especially Fredericke the second.
For, after the death of Berthoull, the last Duke of Zerungen, Prouost of the Col-ledges, and also of the Citie of Zurich:
he receiued the citizens into protection of the Empire, about the yeare, 1218.
Then afterward, he tooke many priuiledges from the Colledgiall churches. Amongst other, the right of electing the councell, and graunted it to the citizens, ordaining, that it should neuer bee law-
full to alienate Zurich from the Empire.
Also, in the time of Fredericke, the Citiezens made the ditches and walles about the City.

It came to passe, that they requested
the Priests & were citizens of the Citie,
to furnish their part of charge towards these

the fortifications, and commaded them
moreover, to rid their houses of some women ill reported of: which offended
them in such sort, as they with-drewe themselves from the Citizens. But this difference was appeased by the bishop of Constance. Some few yeares after, the Pope excommunicated them of Zurich,
because they tooke part with the Emperor Frederick. At the same time, they ruinated (by permission of the Emperor) the old Castle, fearing least some (enemies to their liberties) should get possession ther-
of. At this day it is a very pleasant place, beautified with Linden and other fayre trees planted there. And because the City stood excommunicated, and (by consequence) exposed to the violence of any man: many Gentlemen round about, much molested the Citizens, so that the traffick of filkes, being very great before in that place, was from thence transported to Come.

In the yeare, 1351. they of Zurich did take their first alliance with the Cantons of Vri and Suits, the tenour whereof you haue already scene. Some few yeares after the death of Frederick, his Nephew Conradine laboured to subiect them of Zurich, to the Dukes of Suaba: vnder
the pretence and colour, that they had long time bin Prouosts and Gouernours
thereof. The Citizens maintained thei liberty very firme and strongly, which caused Conradine to worke so with the Emperor Conrad, that Zurich stood proscribed from the Empire. But Richard of England, king of the Romanes, tooke away the proscription, and by Imperiall Letters, confirmed the priuiledges of the Citizens. In those Letters, amongst other matters, these words following are contained.

A true Coppy of the fauor

By faithfull report, which is come to our serenity, we haue

vainely vsurping the honor appertaining to

so to do: hath published a sentence of banishment, against our Citizens of Zurich (as if they were subiects to that Dutchy) planted in the effect all boosome of vs and our Empire, & not appertaining any way to that Dutchy, but antiquitie hath bene established, and is now approved in our time, &c. Given at Hagenaw, the xx. day of November, in the yeare

These Letters do render an ample testimony, of the liberty belonging vnto them of Zurich: notwithstanding, they tooke no great effect then, because such as succeeded in the Empire after Frede-ricke the second, to Raoul of Habsbourg, held no great credit, so that (by manie)
they are not numbred among the Emperors, but all this interuall or respite of time, is referred vnto an Inter-regnum, wherein the most part of all the variances were decided by the sword, rather then by iustice and law, and the stronger trampled the weaker vnder their feet. Aboue
all, the Gentlemen that had anie means,
did nothing else but machinate against the liberties of those Cities that were their neighbors. All the wayes were co-uered with theues, & (in brieft) this License wrought a meere confusion among the most wicked and desperate, mouing them to attempt and execute euery whatsoeuer themselves pleased.

Heereupon, they of Zurich, desiring to conferue their liberty, and maintaine themselves in peace: sent an honorable Ambassage to the Lord of Regensbourg, entreating him to be their *Gouern-

offered him honest and sufficient gages;

shortly bee compelled to accept it, euen in meere despite of them: because their Citie was ingirt and inuoloped with his castles, as Fifth within a Weele, or water Leape.

This vauntery of the Lord of Regenspourg was not wholly vain, for he had many strong places neere vnto the citie: as Wipria on the Lake of Zurich, a mile and a halfe from the citie; Glanzenbourg, a Towne and castle of like distance, and on the river of Limagus. He had (moreouer) much neerer to the citie, vpon a high Mountaine towards the Sunne-setting, two castles, to wit, Vilberg and Balderie, impregnable (as was imagined) by reason of their situation. Beside, the Towne and castle of Regenspourg, not a bouefine miles at the most from Zurich. And, beyond all these, manie Countes or Earles were Leagued with him; among other, the Count of Kybourg, dwelling at Burgdorff, the Count of Ruperswill, of Togge, of Nidow, of Arberg, and the Barons of Eichenbach, of Riggenberg, of Kilchberg, of Balm, of Hombourg, of Wart, and many other. They of Zurich, hauing bene to ignominiously refused: addressed themselves to Raoul of Habsbourg, mortall enemy to this Regenspourg; made alliance with him, & within two yeares following, tooke the castles of Wipria, Wipria, Vilberg, Balderie, and the Towne of Glanzenbourg, mollesting Regenspourg in such sort, as at length hee desired peace, and came to make his abiding at Zurich. These things hapned in the yeare, one thousand, two hundred, sixtie fixe, and the yeares following.

Pride & scorn full contempt very iustly scourged and rewarded.

Raoul of Habsbourg King of the Romans, and a friend to them of Zurich.

In the yeare onethousand, two hundred, seventy three, Raoul of Habsbourg, was created king of the Romans, by common consent of the seauen Electours of the Empire. Afterward, being chosen Emperour, the Citizens of Zurich, serued him in many Warres, hee finding them still faithfull, and valiant souldiers. In the warre of Bohemis, he had two hundred, which he placed betweene the Ensignes in the first ranke: exhorting the others souldiours to imitate the magnanimity of them of Zurich, whom (he said) he had well knowne and made prooffe of before. Also, the most part of them dyed in the field, of battaile then giuen, and the Ensignes of the other were borne (for their honour) into the Temple of the Cordeliers or gray Friars. Raoul hauing receyued so many seruices by the men of Zurich, gaue them diuers priuiledges: and to honour them the more, beautified their Ensignes of Armes, with a Diadem and Bend of Purple.

Many haue imagined among the vulgar fort, because in the battaile at Winterberg, that the Bend was afterward annexed therto, as a note or mark of theys ignominy. But there are many things yielding contrary reasons to this opinion. For, in the first place, the notes of ignominy are not red, but meely black. And afterward, when René, Duke of Lorraine, tooke away all the marks of the ensignes belonging to the Switzers, in the warre against the Duke of Bourgonne; they of Zurich would neuer permit, that the Bend should bee taken out of theys Standard. And in the yeare, one thousand, five hundred and twelue, when Pope Iulius gaue new Standards vnto the Switzers, the Councell of Zurich would not alter any thing whatsoeuer in theys Ensigne, no, nor to what as the bend or Diadem, which they neuer would haue done, if they had bene any notes of infamy.

Moreouer, Iohn of Winterduer, who liued at that time when they of Zurich were conquered by ambuscadoes at Winterduer, spake to King Raoul these Words: He crowned the Standard of Zurich with great action of graces. The same Authour also declareth, that in the warre at Regenspourg, Iaques Muelner, a citizen of Zurich, couered (with his owne body) Raoul of Habsbourg, who was cast from his horse: and hauing remounted him vpon his own, brought him forth of the prease safe and sound. For which great fauour, Raoul did much honour to the man, and loued him singularly; yea, hee was also a deare friend to them of Zurich. This they auouch, because Curion, and such as were of his minde, did highly wrong the citie of Zurich, accusing it of sedition & rebellion against King Raoul, who therefore foiled them, and brought them vnder his obedience by armes.

After the death of Raoul of Habsbourg, they of Zurich mainteyned the part of Adolph, and to did the Abbot of S. Gall, and

and the Bishop of Constance. Now to the end that they of Zurich might ioyne themselves with the other: they assayed the Towne of Winterduer, and tooke it in the assault, vnder conduct of the Count of Togge, and there (in Garrison) was the Lord of Werdenberg, with great troopes, in name of Albert of Austria. The first day they were Victors, but on the morrow, by treachery in the Lorde of Werdenberg, who caused the Ensigne belonging to the Bishop of Constance, to be carried before him: by this cunning stratagem, the men of Zurich were overthrowne and cut in peeces. They attempted againe another warre in the name of Adolph, against them of Groningen, the which is in the territory of Zurich. But Albert Duke of Austria, sonne to Raoul, was offended at their enterprize, being informed by his people, that the greater part of them of Zurich, were slaine at Winterduer, which caused him to come and besiedge Zurich, which hee imagined to bee quite emptic of any defenseue men.

The Citizens made a muster of their men (apt for armes) in the Citie, and on a place very high, where sometimes the Callic stood; and that the Duke of Austria Army might easily discerne them. And, because their number might appeare to bee much more greater then it was, they caused all their strongest and stoutest women to be armed, and theys children of biggest stature: which made the enemy to imagine, that there were great store of warlike people within the Citie. Afterward, they sent Ambassadors vnto Albert, to remember him, that his Father alwayes loued and maintained that citie; that the citizens had serued him in all his warres, and wherein they (euermore) carried themselves faithfully and valiantly. Wherefore, they intreated him to follow his Fathers steps, and to accept them of Zurich rather as loyall and seruiceable friends, then to beleue false rumors spied abroad by their ill-willers, considering withall, that they were ready to giue him satisfaction.

Albert answered the Ambassadors verily kindly, & willed them to come to him at Winterduer, where the peace was confirmed betweene him and them of Zurich: vpon condition, that they should acknowledge and honour Albert as lawfull Emperour. This peace was continued after the death of Albert, and in the warre which his sons made against them that had slaine him: the citizens of Zurich kept themselves still faithfully on the behalfe of Austria, and fought for them against the three Cantons. After that, in the battell of Morgarten, fiftie men of Zurich were slaine in the field, as hath already bene declared. Moreouer, when the Emperour was in some troubles, because some had elected Lewes, Prince of Bauaria; and others Fredericke, the Sonne to Albert, the men of Zurich helde a long time for the part of Fredericke.

In the yeare, 1330. peace was made betweene Lewes of Bauaria, and Fredericke of Austria, whereat, Fredericke renounced his Imperiall Election, and Lewes (to recompence him) promised to pay him a great summe of money. And because hee could not presently furnish him therewith, in regard of the Warres hee lately had, to his mightie expences; gaue vnto him foure Townes as a pawn, and security of payment, Namely, Zurich, Schaffhouse, Rhinfeld, and Neuchamp on the Rheme. But they of Zurich, immediately sent Ambassadors to the Emperour, to shew him, that they were incorporated with the Empire, as they could (by no means) be separated from it. Their Letters were shewn to the same effect, read and perused by the Emperour; and then, although hee loued them but a little, because they had taken part with Fredericke; yet notwithstanding hee left them to their owne liberties, and in sted of Zurich, Brissacke was giuen in gage to them of Austria.

The Ambassadors had also brought with them, the Deputies of the three Cantons, whom Lewes greatly affected, because they had alwayes bene faithfull vnto him. These Deputies declared, that the City of Zurich was a louing & friendly neighbor to the Cantons, & had highly serued them many times. Beside, they of Zurich promised, that (hereafter) they would be no lesse faithfull & obedient to Lewes of Bauaria, who was then their onely lawfull Emperour, then they had formerly bene to Fredericke of Austria. This did much offend the Austrians: for, albeit Fredericke had renounced the empire: yet notwithstanding, Leopold, Albert, and Otho his brethren, would not ratifie the agreement, but continued warre against Lewes of Bawaria. By which means Zurich fell off againe from friendship with them of Austria, and was excommunicated by the Pope, in such manner, as for the space of eightene years, there was no exercise of ceremonies (according to the Romane Church) vied in Zurich. The Priests departed from the citizens, some by their owne meere motion, others were expelled by the Bishops, because they refused to administer the Sacraments. There were none but the Cordeliers or gray Friars, who went forth at one gate, and entered immediately at another.

The Citie standing thus excommunicated, and hated by the house of Austria: many Gentlemen, servants vnto that house, much molested the Citizens. Wherefore, in the yeare 1333. they of Zurich, with the men of Strasbourg, Basle, and Berne, besiedged and took a castle on the Rheine, named Schunaw, belonging to the Lords of Geroltsegh, and ruined it, because it was one of the retreats for theecues. The yeare following, the men of Zurich ruined many castles, to wit, Fronstein, on the river of Tofe, and another nere vnto it, called Touff the high. Also Schenenert, on the Limagus, about three miles from Zurich and Schlatt, nere to Eggen, because the Gentlemen to whom these castles appertained, did greatly trouble the city of Zurich.

The next yeare ensuing, the Government of the Common-wealth of Zurich was changed; which proued to bee the cause of great garboiles, and the principall occasion, of allying the citizens with the Cantons of Sweetia. We haue already told you, that the commonwealth was gouerned by 36. men, and in such sort, as twelue commaunded during the space of foure months. Some difference hapned between them and the people, in regard whereof, the people began to demand an account of their administration, especially, of the twelue that were in the second order. Some were accused among them, of robbing and dissipating (in a small time) the publike treasure, and besides, that they had bound the Citie in no meane store of great debtes. Eight of those men, finding themselves to bee hardly clear in this case, retired from the city: the other foure, voluntarily resigned vp their charge. Thus the authoritie of twelue ceasing, they grew to a forme of electing Magistrates, being chosen out of euery band of the tradesmen, and by seuerall nomination.

The Emperour Lewes confirmed this kinde of Commonwealthe by his Letters Parents, and the succeeding Emperours also approued the same. They that had withdrawn themselves from the Citie, yeelding after to the peoples iudgement, were condemned in seuerall fines: and they that sped the best were banished for three yeares, hauing first faithfully promised neuer to make any conspiracie against the citizens. Heereto also was annexed a note of infamy, to wit, that neyther they, nor any of their children, should euer be admitted into Councell. The ancient men and councillors, being afraid of a iudgement so seuer, beganne to distrust their owne causes; so that nine among them forsooke the Citie. This departure of theirs was conuerted vnto banishment, and their goodes confiscated. As for the rest, nine of them were condemned in great fines, and then banished for two yeares: with this brand also set vpon them, that they nor their children should euer be admitted vnto councell. Others, that stood to their tryall, iustified themselves before the people, and were elected to be of the new councell.

The banished men made their retreat to a Towne, situated on the Lake, two miles (or thereabout) from Zurich, named Rasperwill, which at that time belonged to Count John, of the House of Habsbourg. Three yeares before, he had made request to them of Zurich, to accept him as a Citizen: willingly they would, and did (at last) receiue him, although he was Leagued with them of Austria, and diuers of them also were of his parentage. Heereupon, hee listened the sooner vnto the banished men, and made a confederacie with them, vnder certaine conditions; for securitie whereof, hee gaue them the Castle of the Towne in keeping. These banished men being thus commodiously lodged & fortified, began to accuse them of Zurich, pretending to haue suffered great outrages by them; they defamed the Consull and new councell, and to make attempts against the Citie, yling to this effect) the helpe of some of their friends, that remained still in Zurich. Some of them being discovered by the councell, were punished: others fled away secretly, and ioyned with the banished men. And because these banished men had falsified their solemne promises: they were banished perpetually by the Senate, especially they that stood relegated but for a certaine time enioyned them.

Now, because the citizens of Zurich stood in slender security, either for themselves or their goods, since those banished men were excluded the city: diuers times they admonished the Count of his duty, that he being a Bourgeois, ought not to continue his fauour to the banished men, but rather to withdraw all helpe and comfort from them. Perceiuing the Count made no reckning of their complaints, they leuiued another Army, and went and besiedged Rasperwill, the retire and refuge of the banished men. In vaine was this attempt of theirs, because the banished men had great plenty of victuals, and defended themselves valiantly, which made the other to raise their sieg. Gladly therefore they quitted the place, & so much the rather, because the Count of Habsbourg, protector of the banished, and whom most especially they fought for; was not at Rasperwill, but in a Castle called Grimow, which is at the head of Zurich Lake. They disamped thence, & marched with their Army vnto that very place, being conducted by Diethelme, Count of Togge, who was at controuersie with the other, concerning the castle of Grimow.

The Count of Habsbourg (with his Army well appointed) was encamped at Buchberg, whence he came mainly running vpon them of Zurich, who landed suddenly from their Boates; and they granting them no leysure to bee ranged in order of battaile, put all in rout and disorder that were on Land, compelling them to enter their Boates againe, in which confusion they lost not many me, except the Count of Togge, who was taken prisoner. But after that all their troops were ioyned together againe in the middle of the Lake, being moued with anger, and desirous to wipe off the shame formerly receiued: by aduice of their Leaders, they went on shore againe, brauely bidding them the battaile, which they wonne. And such was their successe, that the Count of Habsbourg, and many Gentlemen with him, were slaine in the field: moreover, they carried away in their Boates a mighty booty, & fixe ensignes of the enemies. The citizens of Rasperwill, hearing of this ouerthrow, to reuenge the death of their Lord, they cut in peeces the Count of Togge, who was conuained on Land, so soone as he had bene taken prisoner in the first encounter.

This things hapned in the yeare 1337. And the same yeare, the Emperour Lewes, and Albert of Austria, second of that name, furnished the Cripple, made peace betwene John of Habsbourg, Sonne to the deceased Count; the banished men of Zurich, and the Consull and Citizens of the City, vpon these conditions following. That the banished men should pay to the citizens (as a fine or amercement) the summe of fixe hundred markes of money: remaining still out of Zurich five yeares, during which time, they should not come nere the city, by the space of two miles; which being expired, they should againe be receiued, & their goods remaine entirely to them. The Emperour conceiued, that this new government in the state, would highly strengthen it in these five yeares: for there was appearance of great danger, that if the ancient Councillers were re-established, alterations would ensue in many matters, & nothing else please them, but the old form of rule, as many of their friends and partakers earnestly desired.

This peace lasted not long, for the banished men (fauoured by a great number of the Nobility) made no regard at all of their promises: but molested the citizens, and conspired daily something or other against the city. In regard whereof, by permission of the Emperour, the houses, and all the goods which the banished had in the city, were confiscated. Notwithstanding, the yeare following, by the intermice of Agnes Queene of Hungary, (who was daughter to Albert, first of that name, and after the death of her Father, remairemained in Smets the most part of her time of Fredericke of Austria, and some other of the Cities: peace was renewed betweene the banished, and the citizens of Zurich; yet this was no firmer, or dur'd any longer then the former. For although the banished promised faithfully, that they would stand to the counsell of Zurichs sentence, and pay the fines wherein they were condemned; yet would they not make any satisfaction at all.

Many of the house of Habsbourg, (among others, the Sonne and kindred to Count John, whom they of Zurich slew in the battaile at Grimm) assembled a great number of Gentlemen, offended with the liberty of Zurich, hating that Democraticall government, as being too popular in their opinion: favoured the banished, and provoked them still on against them of Zurich. And they on the other side, for their better maintenance, first of all burned two Castles: one neere to the Tofe, appertaining to the Lords of Landberg, Gentlemen of marke: and the other to the Lords of Schonenberg on an high hill above Elgor, because these places did much iniure them. And to fortifie themselves yet stronger, they combined amity with the cities of Constance and S. Gall. Also, because some differences remained to be appeased with them of Schaffhouse, and war might be moved from thence: they yeelded willingly (by intermission of Ambassadors to some other cities) & in short time after, comprehended them of Schaffhouse in alliance with the cities of Constance and S. Gall. At the same time, they allied themselves also with the Bishop and city of Basile. Afterward they receiued into the number of their Bourgesies, many houses of the Rhodes, or of S. John of Ierusalem: to be supplied and maintained with Gentlemen, and men of warre, as continually (and from time to time) were in that worthy Order of Knights of S. John.

These puissant cities and people round about, being leagued with them of Zurich by new alliances, or reconfirmation of their ancient amity: the estate of the city remained more peaceable, and it seemed, that the banished had lost all hope of ever enjoying the city by power. But in this sleeping time, they conspired very secretly, to make themselves Masters thereof by treason. Count John of Habsbourg, Son to him that was slaine on the day at Grimm, as already we have shewn, was ioynd with them; upon condition, that he should re-establish the banished men, in possession of their goods in the country, and that they should disingage the lands of the Count, morgaged for debts to his creditors. With them ioynd the Count of Toggenbourg, Peregrin Landberg (who some yeares before, had bene at great debate with them of Zurich, though all seemed to be laide asleepe by an agreement made betweene them) the Baron of Murzing, and many Gentlemen, partly pensioners and vassalls to the Count of Habsbourg, who they gladly endeavored to gratifie, & partly as friends to the banished, who had many ancient friends and partakers in the city, some whereof were well acquainted with all the conspiracy, and others also that would ioyne with them, if the first attempt succeeded well. A farther hope also was conceiued, that no meane number more would come to their part, if they did but see the ancient counsellors, namely, such as were greatly indebted, and could subsist by no other meanes. Such likewise, as in this alteration of the state, were not honoured nor recompenced according to their expectation, and who were unworthy to be seene of others, advanced and preferred before them. Then againe, some others, who were weary of the estate in her present condition, desiring nothing more then nouelty: as in all commonwealths are daily to be found, too many such kinde of people. The resolution of the conspirators was, to make vse of the night time, and to plant armed men in all the streetes of Zurich, and to force the houses of Ravalle Brun, Consull also of all the new Counsellors, and the rest of their enemies, to massacre them, seize the city, make themselves Lords therof, and take away the liberties of the citizens.

In this manner, the 24. of February, in the year 1350, Peregrin Landberg, Count of Habsbourg, many Gentlemen, and some of the banished with them, came vnto Zurich. The same ranne through the City, that they came to present a request to the Counsell, in behalfe of the banished. At the same time, diuers armed armed men had secretly slipped into the city, and hid themselves in the houses of their complices. The Counts and Gentlemen had a very great troope of armed Groomes and Pages waiting on them, ready to execute whatsoever their Masters should command them. Moreover, there were sundry companies readily prepared (both of horse and foote) who in the night should come neere the city, and there to be suddenly let in, after the watch-word was giuen. Others should come by Boates, and on that side where the Lake makes a separation of the city: to rush on by impetuous troopes, & hinder the country-men round about (who were very honest and faithfull to the city) that they should not come that way to help or relence it.

All things being thus ordered and appointed, upon the very same night determined for the massacre, the conspiracy was discovered: more by the prouidence of God, then any counsell or industry of men. For God (vndoubtedly) preferred this city, to be (very soone after) the first, for conferring the Switzers liberties, as also, for the retreat of his church.

The chiefe men of this conspiracy, were in the house of a citizen, where they conferred on their affaires, and closely expected the houre of night, when the watch-word was to be giuen abroad. A servant of the house, who neuer had knowledge of this enterprize, being layd vpon a Bench to sleepe, happened to wake by their close whispering, and lending some attention to their talke, obserued their words very carefully, yet siored as if hee had bene in a sound sleepe. So soone as he could conveniently do it, softly he got away, and went directly to the lodging of Raoul le Brun, who was Consull then, recuelling to him at full, what danger hung ouer the head of him, the whole council, and all the honest minded people of the city. He also acquainted him with the watch-word, whereby the enemies should be knowne one to another, in the darke obscurity of the night.

The Consull hauing heard the seruants words, armed himselfe immediately, and went towards the Towne-house: the enemies were going and coming already through the streetes, yet he escaped well among them, because hee deliuered the watch-word readily to them, and so got on to the Towne-house. A servant of his, attired in the garments of his Master, hauing not vnderstood the watch-word, by reason of the great feare and haste the Consull made, was slaine by the enemies before the Towne-house: not so much because he could not giue the word, as for that they tooke him to bee the Consull.

In the meane while, the Consull commanded one of the Officers of the Seignury, to run to the church, and to ring out the watch-bell, after the wonted manner, to signifie the coming of enemies. The Officer seeing the gate before the clock-house to be round engirt with enemies: by a secret doore belonging to the church, got into the clock-house, & rung out the terror to all the city. On the other side, the Consull (himselfe) cryed out aloud on the top of the Town-house, Arme, Arme, the City is full of enemies. Now the Ruer named Limagus, or Limatus, diuides the city in twaine, & those two parts met and ioynd together, by the means of two Bridges made of wood. Immediately, euery one ran to these bridges: but because the planks and boords of the one were not made fast nor nailed, they threw them all downe into the water. By this meanes, all the fury and tempest of trouble, kindled it selfe at the other Bridge, which ioynd neere to the Towne-house.

There is a place of indifferent greatness, at the entrance to the said bridge and house: the enemies got possession of that place, and of another neighboring to it. Heere the conflict grew very sharp, for, from forth the highest roomes of the houses, they of the city hurled downe Tyles and great Stones vpon their enemies, who were also to fight with other citizens, gotten together in great number, and came to ioyne with their best helpe. The Butchers were the foremost men in the fight; for they were then vp in the Butchery (it being builded neere to the Ruer) killing Oxen and other cattell. Hauing heard the noise and out-cries of the Consull, they ran out vpon the enemies, with their Axes in their hands. In memory whereof, and as a testimony of their hardinesse, the common-wealth gaue them a Lyon of Copper or Brass,

The Count of Torgenbourg, beeing with-drawne into a house of one of the conspirators, and perceiuing the danger, fearing also his owne skin-coate; after he had a while consulted with his Host: determined to free himselfe from blowes, resolving thus; that if matters fell out well for his companions, he could easily come in againe among the troopes, and speake to them, as if he had bin always in the crowd. But if it happened otherwise, he would be fure to saue himselfe, & learne to meddle with better businesse. According to this conclusion, himselfe, his Host, and his seruant, well laden with money, got into a small Boate, belonging to a fisherman, named Bax, who should conduct them along the River out of the city. But fearing lest this Bax should discover their flight, the Count commanded his seruant, that so soone as they were out of the city, he should presently kill the fisherman. He being neerer to them then they imagined (by reason of the nights darknesse) vnderstood their purpose and resolution concerning himselfe: wherein he wisely prevented them, by suffering the boat to tile suddenly on the one side, and so they all three together fell into the River.

Mischieuous and wicked counsell, returns many times to the ruine of the author & deuil.

The safety & liberty of our Country, ought to be deare & precious to every man.

Making haste afterward home to his owne house, and waking all the neighbours dwelling about him; hee desired them to take Armes secretly, because the city was in eminent perill, and enemies were hidden in many parts thereof, but he knew neyther how, nor what was their intent. Heereupon, they armed themselves presently, and hearing the Confull still crying, Arme, Arme: waked other friends and neighbours, by whose helpe they got the Bridge, and there raunged themselves orderly in fight against the enemy. It is further said, that the Priests of the great church, being then singing Martins, and hearing this tumult in the night: armed themselves from the houses round about, and entred in among the thickest thronges, fighting valiantly for the freedom & safety of their country. It might so come to passe, that this year the Popes excommunication was first raised, and that after eightene yeares were expired, the Priests entred into the city againe.

Thus the citizens (by little and little) gathered their strength together, for from euery part they came in full troopes, and declaring their valour in so great a need, the enemies that were in the city (constrainedly) gaue way. Fifteene among them were slaine, and more then thirty seven taken prisoners, among whom was the Count of Habsbourg; others saued themselves by fauour of the night. The Baron of Matzingen, and Peregrin Landberg were among the dead. The Count that fell into the water, was there drowned. The bodies of the slaine lay three whole daies on the pavement, exposed to the mockery of all men, and to be trampled on with the feete of euery passenger.

On the morrow, seuteene, the principall men in the conspiracy, were broken, and their bodies laide on wheeles: eightene were beheaded. The Count of Habsbourg, Huldrich, Baron of Bouffers, and some other, remained prisoners. The Army of the Count of Habsbourg, as well that which came on the lake, as the other by land, hearing this tumult in the city, and seeing no man came that should open the gates to them: retired backe in great feare, so that in the morning, the people gathered vp their armes and weapons for warre, which the run-awaies had gladly left behinde them, for their easer escaping.

Matters being thus appeased at Zurich, to prevent any more new troubles in the city: the Confull brought an Army into the field, on the second day of March, & being seconded with supplies sent them by the men of Schaffhouse; they went and besiedged Kasperwill, the Fortresse & retreat of the conspirators. The inhabitants of the Towne knowing that their Count was taken, the banished mangled in peeces, or made fugitiues and vagabonds, and hauing no likelihood at all of succour: on the third day of the siege yielded, and bound themselves sollemnly to the common-wealth of Zurich, promising (for euer after) to acknowledge them as their chiefe, and render them all such duty, as formerly they had done to their Count. The Towne taken, they of Zurich thought they had gotten two aduantages. One was, that from thence forward, no pilling or rauge was more to be made of their country, as oftentimes before had bene, and that the city would now safely be preferred from ambushes and treasons. The other, that the kindred and friends to the imprisoned Count, began to treat on peace: fearing to lose all the country about Kasperwill, because the Towne and the Count were taken.

Heereupon, the Queene of Hungary procured, that truce should be accorded for certaine moneths: but Raoul & Godfrey of Habsbourg, being summoned by them of Zurich to make peace, declared no affection thereto. Considering withall, that diuers Gentlemen, neighbours, but enemies to the men of Zurich, incited them rather to make warre. So all hope of peace being quite cut off, the sixth day of September (the same year) they of Zurich conducted their Army towards the country of the Marche, situated at the beginning of the Lake of Zurich, towards the Sun-setting, then being in obedience to the Count of Habsbourg. The cities of Constance and Saint Gall, sent succour to the men of Zurich, and hauing spoyled & burnt all the country, they besiedged a Castle, called Kasperwill the olde, and followed it so closely; that the besiedged, hauing no more meanes of resistance, yielded, & went away with their liues saued. The Castle was ruined downe to the ground, and they of the Marche promised fidelity and subiection to the common-wealth of Zurich. This done, the Army went to a Towne, called Kasperwill the new. They brake downe the Bridge that ioyned to the Lake, beate downe the Castle, and most part of the walles of the Towne, and hauing heard (for certaine) that Albert of Austria meant to come aid them of Habsbourg with great forces: they set the Towne on fire, and burnt it wholly, not leaving any iote thereof remaining.

At the same time, certaine Gentlemen, named the Wadners of Sultz, dwelling in Alsacia, declared warre against them of Zurich, taking their Merchants, pilling & outraging them by all manner of ways. They of Basle and Strasbourg withdrew, & gaue suppurtance to these wars there. Vpon these indignities, they of Zurich were moued, to seize on about eight score and ten persons of Basle and Strasbourg, that were come on pilgrimage to the Chappell of the Hermitage. As slaying by this meanes, whether they of Strasbourg and Basle, compassionate the imprisonment of their citizens: would expell from their countries those Gentlemen that were the cause of this disturbance. This fell out to proue but a very vaine hope, for these cities and their Bishops, offended with this vniust detention of their pilgrims; ioyned themselves with Fredericke of Austria, Friburg in Brisgaw, Selsstad, Brisac and Colmar. Hauing vniited their forces together, they resolved to make warre on Zurich, and demand their prisoners by Armes. The men of Zurich, finding themselves not strong enough, in regard of their precedent warres, seditions and lesse of mer, which had greatly impaired them in power: deliuered backe the prisoners, and so turned aside this dangerous tempest.

Now because they had suffered great outrages, and saw no likelihood of any better successe to ensue: they sent Ambassadors to Charles IV. to whom they made their business knowne. They told him, that hauing taken (in a iust warre, & within their city) the Count of Habsbourg their enemy, for maintaining their cause against him, they were molested and assaulted by Gentlemen neighbours. But that which most of all greued them, was, to see those Gentlemen assisted by Fredericke of Austria, and other potent cities of the Empire. And because Zurich was an Imperiall City also; they made their recourse to him, as being the sole head of the Empire. They humbly desired him, to lend them both aide and counsell, and to take order by his power and authority, that (in succeeding times) the Princes of Austria, the cities and Towns of the Empire, nor any other Gentlemen might make warre against them, contrary to all right and reason. But rather to permit, that their city might enioy her wonted liberty, in peace and quietnesse: considering, that they were ready (as they ought to be) to answer before the Emperor, to all whatsoever any man could object against them.

The Emperor hauing heard the complaint of them of Zurich, answered the Ambassadors most humanely; that he coueted nothing more, then to haue their liberliberty continue in full perfection, and would do his endeavour, to accord them with Fredericke of Austria, and his associates. But he could give them no succor, nor attempt any thing by force, against the house of Austria, the Nobility of Germany, or the Cities of the Empire: because (at that instant time) they were far stronger then he. Wherefore, they of Zurich should devise to pacifie their differences with such enemies: by some reasonable agreement, wherein he would assist them to his power.

The Ambassadors departed away very sadly with this answer, and came home againe to Zurich. And because (at that time) Albert of Austria, Sonne to Albert, was in Svetia: they of Zurich sent presents to him by Ambassadors, to whom he gave kinde entertainment, and tolde them, that he would come meete them with an ample power, for he desired to be a friend to them of Zurich, and had some matters to acquaint them withall. Afterward, when the Ambassadors came vnto him againe at Bruges in Svetia, he was become an enemy to Zurich, by accusations and reports of the Noblemen, and spake sharply to the Ambassadors, saying: That they of Zurich had done him great wrong in ruining both the old and new Rasperiwills, and spoiling the Marche likewise, because they were in his Seigneury. He therefore demanded, that they should restore what they held from him, rebuilde those places which they had ruined, and repay their pillages with ready money, & in so doing, hee would pardon them all those wrongs.

How the lands of John of Habsbourg belonged to Albert of Austria, in manner of a right by title.

As concerning his maintaining the lands of John of Habsbourg; they belonged to him, in manner following. Garnier, Count of Hombourg, Lord of Rasperiwill the elder, and of three castles, seated vpon one Mountaine named Wartenberg, nere to Basile, dying without children; the succession fell vnto that John of Habsbourg, which was slaine at Grimow. But Cato and Albert, Princes of Austria, laid claime to them, being the stronger (I know not whether they had any other title) and all the other goods of Garnier, including both Rasperiwill the elder, & all the Marche. Nevertheless, they rendred all vnto John of Habsbourg, and he to hold it of them as in Knights fee, and so became their valsaile and pensioner. Thus you see, why Albert of Austria said, they had done him wrong, and wherefore he demanded satisfaction.

The Ambassadors of Zurich made answer, that (from those places) ambuscadoes had beene made against their city, their citizens spoiled and slaine, and in those castles their banished men were harboured. Therefore, seeing they had ruined Rasperiwill, which no longer was an abiding for Noblemen, but a retreat for thees & banished men, they thought it no way meete, that any should be compelled to build it againe, or in the selfe same place. They entreated the Prince to consider seriously on euery thing: they being alwaies ready, to debate their cause before the Princes and cities of the Empire, and in any such place as hee would appoint. The Prince answered them in choller, that this was not a difference which stood in need of any Iudges, to beate downe his castles, and waste the places of his Seigneury. But it all were not reduced againe to the first condition, and full satisfaction made: he would employ all his forces, and constrain them of Zurich to do it. In briefe, he would haue no other debating of this cause, but by the point of the Sword.

The Ambassadors hauing made their answer to the councell of Zurich, & they perceiuing also euidently, that the citie would very shortly be besieged, because all the Noblemen were already in armes: the men of Zurich well knowing, that in expecting aide from the Emperor or the Empire, was meere to abuse themselves; resolved to combine alliance with the Cantons, for the better preferuation of their common liberties. Till then, they maintained themselves in amity one with another, and although in the day at Morgarten, they of Zurich gaue succor to the Duke of Austria; yet notwithstanding, the Cantons were not offended therewith, but rather tooke pleasure, to approve the hardinesse and valour of the men of Zurich in fight.

Hauing then so maine an enemy (in common) against them all to wit, the Duke of Austria; both the one and the other then might easily iudge, that their forces being thus combined together, they had thereby the better means for re-

Innocence such esteem more an art more of profit whereunto attend in this refistance. Moreover, the Cantons were not ignorant that this their alliance with them of Zurich, did highly accommodate them for prouision of victuals; because there was a very excellent market at Zurich, and the Lake was apt to transport both food and Merchandizes. Wherefore, after that the men of Zurich had sent their Ambassadors to the Cantons, to require their alliance in loue, and freely had acquainted them with their present dangers: the Cantons embraced their motion very thankfully, and (soone after) sent their Ambassadors to Zurich, with plaine power to confirme this alliance, which was fully resolved on in the Moneth of April, in the year one thousand, three hundred, fifty one, and engrossed in writing at the beginning of May following. Now albeit Zurich is the first, coming thus into alliance with the Switzers; yet notwithstanding, because it is a citie much renowned and mighty; the first place was giuen to it, and Zurich named to be the first Canton. The men of Zurich (yet to this day) do hold that name and ranke, among all the thirteene Cantons, as well in dayes occasions of the Switzers accounts, as in all Ambassages, and other publike actions whatsoever.

This vnty of them of Zurich, caused warre (so much the sooner) to come vpon them: for the Prince of Austria was already very angry with them of Suits, Pri, and Anderswald, which first of all were leagued together: neuertheless, hee assured himselfe (one day) to bring them vnder his yoke. For, because the country was barren, and not conueniently grounded for warre; there grew some apparance, that (at length) it might bee subdued, albeit they were good Souldiers, and well resolved for fight. But when Lucerna, which was vnder the dominion of Austria, ioynd with them, and then (soone after) Zurich, a free citie, and cheefe of all other in the country: the Prince became much more moued and troubled: for he was not ignorant, how greatly this alliance had strengthened and authorized them of Zurich. And therefore he concluded, to lay hold on this occasion, to make warre on the men of Zurich, and besieged their citie; to eslay if thereby he could vnknit this knot of combination, before any other (following examp: of the former) should make any more new leagues. See heere the true cause of the warre, and I dare maintaine, that no cause (concerning the ruine of Rasperiwill) incited it; because (at all times) when peace was treated on after the warre began: they of Austria neuer viged that article, concerning the building againe of Rasperiwill; but rather that they of Zurich, should renounce their alliance with the cantons.

Thus then, in the Moneth of September, the year 1351. Albert of Austria besieged Zurich. He had encamped with him, Lewes, Count of Brandenburg, Fredericke, Duke of Teck, the Duke of Yfflinge, and the Burgeaue of Nuremberg. The Bishops of Wircebourg, Bamberg, Frisingen, Caire, and Basile sent him succour. He had five and twenty Counts or Earles in his Army, namely; Enrad, Count of Wirtemberg, conductor of the Army; Lewes, count of Ottingen; Frederick, count of Ortenberg; the two counts of Schmanlech: the two counts of Ternanges; the two counts of Furtemberg; the three of Tierstein: they of Habsbourg and Kybourg; Raoul and Herman of Werdenberg; Albert and Henry of Nellembourg; Guillaume of Kilchberg; Immer of Strasbourg, of New-chistle, of Nidow, of Arberg, of Fribourg, of Zolerin, and of Metbourg. Likewise the cities of Strafbourg, Basile, Fribourg in Brisgoye, Soleurre, and some others sent aide to the Duke. It is said, that he had in his Army two thousand horse, and five thousand foote. On the other side, the foure Cantons sent a good Garrison to them of Zurich. The Souldiers and the citizens fortified the city, and made diligent prouision of all things requisite to withstand the siege, and to defend it: so that (on both sides) there were some sallies and skirmishes.

But few daies after the siege, peace was made, by the intermise of Frederick, count of Togge, and of Hertzog Reichberg, commander of Rhodes, abiding at Pateuil, with them of Basile and of Berne on condition, that the Switzers should refer themselves vnto the definitive iudgement of Agnes, Queene of Hungary, to whom, eyther side should send their Ambassadors, and that which was concluded by them, with plurality of voyces, cyther party should ratifie. For this effect, they of Zurich were to giue in 16. Hostages, of the cheefe of

of the City, and Albert promised by his Letters, that no wrong should be done unto them. The foure Cantons would not accept of this peace, alledging, that no trust ought to be given to the Queen of Hungary, who would not faile to giue sentence in fauour of Albert, he being her brother. Neuerthelesse, the men of Zurich, who had a good opinion of the woman, did so presse the other Cantons, that they subligated together the conditions: adding this exception (in common) that their alliance should continue in full force.

The Duke of Austria chose for Iudges, Immer, Count of Strasberg, and Peter of Stoßfelen, commander of Tannenfels. They gaue sentence in behalte of their Master, whereby it was appointed, that they of Zurich were bound, to renew (according to their former condition) the olde and new Rapperswiler, and giue satisfaction to Albert: tending backe Lucerna vnder his government, and surrender also great store of possessions and rights, in the territory of Vnderwald. They tooke away likewise from them of Suits, their right of fishing in the Lake, and their ancient possession and vse of many Forrefts. Finally, they condemned all the five Cantons, in great fines of money: neuer hauing any regard, what wrongs the city of Zurich had endured, by them of Rapperswil, nor other reasons and defences proposed by the Cantons, and by Philip Kyen, Knight, and Peter de la Baume, Consull of berne, their Iudges deputed.

Queene Agnes approved the sentence of Alberts Iudges. She was a witty woman, that had an outward appearance of great sanctity, as we vse to say, from the teeth forward. At all times when she saw her brethren forward to make warre, but greatly vnfurnished; then would she be sure to procure truce or peace betweene the Switzers and them. Onely to this end, that they might assemble their troopes together in the meane time, and bee the better provided for a sudden assailing the at vnawares. Yet all that while, she would still protest, that she did all this for the enioying of peace, and in meere compassion which she had of the Switzers.

Now albeit this sentence was most vniuilly, yet notwithstanding, the Switzers promised to ratifie it. But the Duke being not contented with all this, commanded them of Zurich, to set at liberty (without eyther fine or ranfome) Count John of Habsbourg, their prisoner taken in faire warre, and of whom the Iudges made not any mention. Hereupon, they of Zurich would not yeeld to any thing, by which occasion, the Duke imprisoned their hostages, contrary to his faithfull promise, planted a Garrison on the Frontiers, and prepared himselfe for a new warre.

CHAP. V.

How Glaris, being conquered by the Cantons, came afterward to be accepted into their louing alliance.

HE Switzers seeing that all hope of peace was vtterly frustrated, & that they must needs re-enter into war: determined among themselves, to inuade the country of Glaris, for seare lesse (in that quarter) the enemy would make courses on the lands of the confederates, and especially on them of Suits. Wherefore, the very same yeare, and in the Moneth of Nouember, the men of Zurich, Vri, Suits, and Vnderwald, ioyned together, and led their troopes towards Glaris. Without any blow imitted, they made themselves Masters of the whole country, taking oath of them of Glaris; and in regard of their faithfulness, as also their approued valour in war, which they had well tried oftentimes before; they re- ceiuied them into their alliance.

Glaris is a strait Valley and long, containing a league and an halfe of the Germane measure, neere to the Riuer of Limagus or Limmat: it took name from the principall Towne of all the Country, being engirt on three sides with very high Alpes: hauing the Grifons on the South side, & towards the East, Vri, & Suits to the West, and on the North, the field called the Gris- sons sons country, by which, the Riuer of Limagus runneth along the Valley, and enters into the Lake of Zurich. Glaris had bin subiect a long time, and for the space of many yeares, to the Abbey of Secun, & was giuen to S. Fridolin, by two brothers, named Ours, and Landolphe. They of Glaris paid tythes to this Abbey, and certaine constituted rents, beside taxations of some inheritances. They were not charged with any imposts, or subsidies whatsoeuer: they held their owne lawes, & a councill among their cittizens. True it is, that the election belonged vnto the Abbesse; but the Prouostship or government (both of the Abbey and country) was the Emperours onely, & in his power.

What means the oppression of any people to life, subuerting their liberty, & at length to dispoſe all in their owne pleasure.

Afterward, Frederick Barbarossa gaue it to Otho, Palatine of Bourgogne, from whose successors, it came to them of the house of Habsbourg. Vnder pretence of this authority, Albert of Austria, Sonne to the Emperour Raul, made himselfe Lord of Glaris, in despite of the whole country: who had promised to the fore-named Abbey, neuer to be separated or alienated from it. This vſurpation was the cause, that many Noble families forsooke the country, and withdrew themselves thence, some to Vri, and others to Zurich. They of Austria being well fortified, expelled out of his house the Baron of Suanda, a rich Gentleman, and well beloued in those parts, appropriating all his goods to themselves. They vſurped also the rights of the Maiordome of Glaris, & brought in a nouely neuer before practised: sending Governors into that country, to haue a seuerer eye ouer the people, and to iudge them by proceſſe in law.

Glaris yeelded willingly to the Switzers.

Those Governors were very rude and insolent, so that the people (in despite of the Austrians) yeelded themselves voluntarily to the Switzers, when they came to warre vpon them, and made perpetuall alliance with them. Gautier de Stad, Governour for them of Austria, departed from Glaris, after the inhabitants had sworn fidelity to the Switzers, withdrawing himselfe not far off, namely to Wesen. But they of Glaris chose among themselves (according to their ancient custome) a Maior or Amman, and their vsuall number of counsellors. And because they expected nothing more, but that the Austrians would soone come againe to molest them: they strengthened their walles, and trenched their Valley, neere to a Village named Naisfell, where was the easiest entrance into the country; that needed no fortification, but only there, all the rest being engirt with Mountains round about.

During these alterations at Glaris, in the Moneth of December, they of Zurich marched with their Army towards Bada, where was a great Garrison of the Austrians, that by their often out-roides made much waste on the Lands of Zurich. To requite them with money of the same stamp, they of Zurich forraged the country about Bada, and burnt the Subburbs of the Towne, getting vpon the Mountain, to come neerer to them. But towards Tetiuille, on the Mountain, a Capitaine of the Austrian horsemen, named Ellerbach, made firme the passage with foure thousand men. They of Zurich were no more then 1300. (some say they were much lesse) notwithstanding, they set vpon the enemy, and wonne a very remarkable victory, leauing there 700. enemies slaine, among whom (as is credibly aouched) there were 65. Gentlemen.

The yeare following, Gautier de Stad, not long before Governor of Glaris, hauing leuied an Army, prepared himselfe, to subiect the country again to the house of Austria. Hee tooke occasion to do this, because he had receiued intelligence that two hundred men of Glaris were in Garrison at Zurich. But the other inhabitants ouercame him in a ranged batel, where he was slaine, and a great number of the Nobility, the 2. day of February.

The selfe same day, the Austrians that were at Zug, being gone by Boates to Arre; did let vpon the lands of Suits, but met with the like welcome as Stad had at Glaris. In like manner, all the confederates sent an Army to forrage Berne, and other neighbouring places, from whence the Austrians issued forth oftentimes, to set vpon the Lucernians: As (on the other side) the Austrians put to fire and blood Cusnach, and some other places, yet not without their owne great losse. About the holidays of Pentecoste, the Lucernians, assisted by the three Cantons, tooke (by assault) a Castle, called Habsbourg, seated on the Lake of Lucerna; cut in peeces all them that were there in Garrison, & ruined it quite fro the top to the bottom.

CHAP. VI.

Of Zug, and at what time it came to be comprehended, in league and confederacy with the other Cantons of the Switzers.

IN those times, Zug hapned to be thus comprized in alliance with the Switzers. It is a Towne betwene Zurich and Suits, seated at the foot of a Mountain, rich in pasturages, and vines planted on the sides joyning to the Lake, which aboundeth with plenty of Fish, common to them both of Zug and Suits. It is reputed to be the capitall Towne of certaine people, which accompaied the of Zurich, in the warre of the Cambrians against the Romans. Sometimes these acknowledged diuers Gē-

lemen as her Lords: but afterward, fell into the hands of them of Austria, who, during the warre against the Switzers, maintained there an ordinary Garrison, which did many harmes to them of Suits and Zurich. And this was the cause, that in the year 1352. and the Moneth of Iune, the men of Zurich, with the foure other Cantons, prepared an Army to go against Zug. The Soldiers finding their strength far too weake, would not attend the Switzers coming: but withdrew to Bremgarten, and other places thereabout. But the Townesmen, who would be faithful to the Duke of Austria, maintained the siege for fifteene daies space: neuertheless, hauing received a very violent assault: they yeelded themselves, & took an oath to the Switzers, on this condition. That if within a certaine time appointed, the Duke of Austria brought an Army, to cause the siege to be remoued: they would returne againe vnder his obedience, and stand acquitted of their oath giuen to the Switzers. To effect this business, they sent their Ambassadors, to require succour from the Duke of Austria: he being then in the Abbey of Champ Royal, about fifteene leagues from Zug,

& there the Ambassadors let him vnderstand their charge and message.

It chanced at that instant time, that the Duke was walking in a Gallery, demanding of his Faulconer, whether hee had (that day) sed his Hawkes or no? The cheefest of the Ambassadors, named Herman, taking him at that word, said. Alas! my Lord, haue you not more care of your Subiects, the of Hawks? Especially now, when the enemy hath so strictly engirt vs, as if you send not present supply, constrainedly we must surrender our felues? The Prince returned this answer. It is well, yeeld your felues; before it be long time, we will recouer againe whatsoever wee haue lost. And because they of Zug well saw, that it was in vaine to looke for any comfort thence: they ioyned themselves in vniuy and alliance with the Switzers.

Hardly were the Letters of this alliance written, for combining thus the Cantons by oath: but Albert, Duke of Austria, now the second time besiedged the city of Zurich, about the midst of Iune. But at the end of the Moneth, by intermise of the Marquesse of Brandebourg, peace was made, on these conditions following. They of Zurich should set at liberty John of Habspourg, their three yeares prisoner, without eyther fine or ranfome. Also, that the Duke of Austria should acquit (frank and freely) the hostages of Zurich, whom he had likewise imprisoned. They of Zug and Glaris, absolved of their oath taken to the Switzers, should (as before) yeeld obedience to the house of Austria. In the meane while, nothing should hinder, but that the alliance of the Switzers must stand firme.

In the time of this treaty, John of Habspourg came forth of prison, without paying any ranfome; but the hostages of Zurich were not released, according to (worn promise: for before they could get forth, they were compelled to pay sixteen hundred crownes for a ranfome, & yet could not enjoy eyther peace or safety. For so soone as the Count of Habspourg was released, hee gaue Rapperswill, and the places neighbouring about it, to Albert of Austria, who immediately fortified Rapperswill, and planted a Garrison there, whereby a new warre was engendered. For the Soldiers of that Garrison ranne in on the Lands of Zurich, and slew fifty men at Hereby we may plainly perceiue, that the Duke of Austria did but seeke occasion, whereby to begin the warre againe. The year following, as the Ambassadors of Suits were gone (in name of the five Cantons) to require of them of Zug, the obligatory oath of their alliance, according to the Articles of pacification: they of Austria expelled them away with outrages. In regard whercof, they mustred their forces together againe, and made themselves Masters of Zug the second time, and then commanded the citizens, to giue their oath to the Switzers. In the same year, 1352. the sixteenth day of March, Berne ioyned it selfe in alliance with the Switzers. But we are to speake somewhat in this place, concerning this city, which is the most powerfull among all them in Swetia.

CHAP. VII.

Of the building of Berne, the situation and condition thereof, and how it was yeelded to the Empire.

Berthoul, first of that name, & the last Duke of zingen, builded the city of Berne, and being offended with the noblemen, who had caused his male children to be poisoned in their youth: he submitted it to the Empire, & affranchised it. The Emperor Fredericke the eleuenth, ratified the Dukes will, and after the death of him, in the year, 1218. a Governour was sent to Berne, named Otho of Ranenbourg, in name of the Empire. But some yeares after, for good seruices done by them of Berne to the Emperor: hee gaue them much greater priuiledges and franchises, exempting them also from hauing any more Governour.

In the troubles and confusions which happened in the Empire, the Count of Kybourg, Lord of Burgdorff, strove to abolish the cities liberty, leaguimg himselfe (for that purpose) with Gentlemen his neighbours, and the Towne of Fri-

bourg, which Berthoul the fourth had builded. And his Son had giuen in charge to both these Townes, to continue friends for euer. As concerning the occasion of this war, it grew thus. The men of Berne had bought certaine Lands beyond the River of Ar, & began to prepare a bridge, which the Count would not suffer, hee being Lord beyond the River. Whereupon they of Berne (desirous to make themselves as strong as their enemies) did put themselves into the protection of the Count of Sauoye, who repelled the attempts of the Count of Kybourg, and hauing obtained peace, enlarged the compasse and roundure of the city. Then after warre was moued, betwene the Count of Sauoye, and the Duke of Bourgonne, the Count promised the men of Berne, that if they carried themselves valiantly, and he prospered in his attempt; he would grant them whatsoever they would demand of him. They performed their duty so well, that the enemy was discomfited: and then (as in recompence) they desired nothing else of the Count of Sauoye, but their ancient liberty, and he granted their request, and kept his promise most faithfully with them. After that time, they of Berne were alwayes friends, and allied to the house of Sauoye.

The City being reintegrated into her wonted liberty, before they entred into league with the Switzers, had many and very difficult warres, as well for conservation of their liberty, as enlarging their limits. They gaue a battaile to Godfrey of Habspourg, in the year, 1241. but that was to their owne disadvantage, because the enemy was far greater in number. Moreover, Raoul of Habspourg, accompanied with them of la Tour and de Gruyere, besiedged (two severall times) the City of Berne; vnder colour of accusing them of Berne, that they had violated the publicke faith of the Empire, in taking prisoners, and euill entreating certaine Lewes. Albert of Austria, Sonne to the Emperor Raoul, did twice bid them battaile before the city, and many citizens were there slain.

The men of Berne had diuers wars before they came to be in number of the Cantons.

A great league and combination made against the City of Berne.

slaine. In the yeare 1291. the Counts of Sauoye, Neuberg, and Grugere, the Bishop of Lausanna, the Lord of Tour, beside some Townes and Gentlemen, made a league against Berne: but by the aide of the Counts of Kybourg and Arberg, as also the city of Solleurre, the men of Berne wonne a mighty battaile, at a place called, The hill of Thunder. Aldrich Erlach was cheefe of the Bernish Army in that warre. During the yeares following, many of the Castles, neighbouring to the city, were taken in war, and demolished by them of Berne. They also had victories in the warres moued in the vale of Simnia, and in many other places, against the Noblemen that much molested them, whereby they greatly enlarged their limits. Also the inhabitants of the vale of Hafell, who were at freeliberty, ioyned with them of Berne. This happinesse of theirs, so enflamed the malice and enuy of the Noblemen against Berne, as thereon ensued the memorable battaile giuen at Loupen.

The famous and memorable battaile giuen by Count and Gentlemen, against the men of Berne at Loupen.

Many Counts and Gentlemen, hauing leuiued a well prepared Army, of sixteen thousand foote, and three thousand, five hundred horse, at the least, went and besiedged Loupen, which is a small Towne appertaining to them of Berne, who were about five thousand, assisted with three hundred men of Vri, as many of Suits, as many of Vnderwald, and as many of the Vale of Hafell, Rasoul Erlach being chiefe of these troopes. This small number overcame the enemy in a ranged battaile, nere to Loupen, where dyed in the fiedle, the Count of Sauoye, who was sent to the Campe by his Father, onely to treat on peace: but the other constrained him to make one in the battaile. There were slaine also, the Counts of Nidow, of Arberg and Valentia, fifteen hundred horsemen, among whom were fourescore Gentlemen of marke, and about three thousand foote. This battaile was fought the 21. day of Iune, in the yeare 1339.

A fortunate and successful pursuit of victory, against them of Kybourg and many townes more.

After this successfull day, they of Berne made warre (to their aduantage) against them of Fribourg, who were vassalls to the house of Austria, and also to the Gentlemen about Fribourg. For at Schoenenberg, they of Fribourg were ouerthrowne, and lost many of their men, their country forraged, and the Subburbs of their

Towne burnt. Signow, Lugnow, Burgdorff, Longuall, Pyneith, Arberg, Erlach, Nidow, Tum, and other Townes and great Villages, were either spoiled, or taken by them of Berne. Finally, Agnes Queene of Hungary, made an end of this warre, by means of a peace which they compounded. In all these warres, the men of Berne euer felt, that Gentlemen, no better then vassalls to the house of Austria, most laboured to oppress them: whereas (contrariwise) the amity of the Switzers did highly aduantage them. But in the meane while, and contrary to their hope and expectation, they were drawne into a new warre; wherein they of Vnderwald ioyned themselves with their enemies. The Lord of Engenberg, and the Prouost of the Abbey situated betwene the two Mountaines, were Bourgeois of Berne. They were Governours or Bayliffs also of that country, which lies nere to the Mountaine of Brunie, and the Lake of Brientz.

It came to passe, that they of the country, accounting the government of these two Lords to be rude and harsh: began to mutiny against them, and after they had called to their aide the men of Vnderwald, who were nere neighbors; they tooke the Castle of Engenberg, in absence of the Lord, set it on fire, and denied the Prouost such duties and tythes, as they were accustomed to pay. They of Berne sent Ambassadors, to exhort them of Vnderwald, not to succour such seditious persons against all right and reason. But they of Vnderwald made no reckoning of this aduertisement, but went and encamped with the seditious at Brientz. On the other side, the men of Berne, hauing required their allies of Solleurre, Tum, Sienne, and Morat to send them succour, and it being sent them; marched with all their troopes to Brientz, gaue battaile to the seditious and them of Vnderwald, compelling them to flight, and retire into the neighbouring Mountaines. They of Vnderwald (storming at this disgrace) called their confederates of Zurich, Lucerna, Vri, Suits, Zug, and Glaris to helpe them: but they of Berne sent their Ambassadors to those Cantons, offering the iustice & equity of their cause, and to haue it tried before them.

Heereupon, a day was held at Lucerna, where where the Deputies of the Switzers, hauing heard the reasons alledged on either side, commanded them of Vnderwald, to renounce their alliance with them of Brientz. On the same day, the men of Berne made a perpetual alliance with the three Cantons, Vri, Suits, and Vnderwald. Now, although this alliance is made but with three, yet Zurich and Lucerna are comprized therein. For the three first Cantons bound themselves to succour them of Zurich & Lucerna whensoever they called them, and to bring with them the men of Berne, who by the same alliance are tyed thereto, if Zurich and Lucerna do desire it. In reciprocall manner they of Zurich and Lucerna, promised solemnly, to go asist (with all their power) the men of Berne, if the three Cantons call them thereto.

The third time of fledge made to the City of Zurich.

Immediately after this alliance made, the city of Zurich was besiedged agayne the third time. For, Albert of Austria, accused the Cantons before the Emperour Charles the fourth; who hauing heard the answer of the Cantons, made a truce, vntill his returre from a voyage, which hee was constrained to vndertake, about some affaires of the Empire. Being returned, he came to Zurich, where he heard either parties, and directing himselfe vnto the Switzers, especially to them of Zurich, he aduised them to renounce this alliance: adding withall, that the city was Imperiall, and could make no alliance without consent of the Emperour. But the confederates rendred a sufficient reason for what they had done, exhibiting their priuiledges, and making it manifest, that the alliance contracted between them, could not any way preiudice the rightes of the Empire. Seeing he could not driue the Switzers out of this league, then he made his re-courte to Albert, desiring him to sell Lucerna, Glaris, and Zug vnto the Empire, because the difference did concerne those three places especially. But Albert audaciously answered him; That he would rather buy some Townes, if the Emperour would sell him any, then let him haue any of his for money.

A proud answer of Albert of Austria to the Emperour.

Once againe the Emperour pressed the Switzers, to suffer him to end the difference, and promise to tye themselves to such orders as he should set downe, assuring them that Albert would do the like.

But the Switzers would not consent thereto, without plaine exception of their priuiledges; and the Emperour vrged his authority, without any reuerfation: by the which meanes, all this long imparlance serued to no purpose, but only that a truce was taken for some time. Which being expired, the Emperour being incessantly importuned, ioyned with Albert of Austria, and besiedged Zurich. The besiedged (by diuers ambassages) intreated the Emperour, not to presse thus into the house of Austria: for they desired nothing but conservation of their priuiledges, and would not reiect any composition whatsoever, if it were reasonable.

Then the Emperour began to summon Albert to listen to a pacification; which hee would not doe: in which respect, the Emperour raised the sledge, and returned home. That which also moued him hereto, was, because his Camp stood composed of soldiers, who were (almost all) prest forth of Imperiall Townes and Citties; & (in his opinion) bare more affection to the Switzers, then to the house of Austria, albeit those souldiers (dur the sledge) would obey none other then the Emperour. After the Emperours departure the duke of Austria also speedily got him gon: hauing heard, that the other Cantons had set forth supply vnto them of Zurich. Neuertheless, hee lodged his troopes in Townes, Villages, and Castles round about, enioyning them, not to suffer the Cantons to haue any rest, but continually to make incursions on their Lands.

The siege raised from Zurich by Gods most singular providence.

At length, in the first year of this war, by authority and intermise of the emperour Charles the fourth, peace was concluded betweene the Prince of Austria, and them of Zurich. Now because it would seeme a troublesome matter, to insert heere the whole Tenure at large; we will be satisfied with a breefe Summary of the Articles, which are these following.

Peace made between them of Zurich, and the Duke of Austria.

Articles of Peace concluded on betwene the Duke of Austria and Zurich.

2. They of Zurich shall not receive into the

the number of their Bourgeses such as remaine under the domination of the Duke of Austria: but if any will retire themselves to Zurich, they may be receyved. Provided, that they bee of the number of them, which the Citie might receive, before this peace was made.

3 Such as hold any other way then in service, shall be under the iustice of the lords of those Fees. And they which make use of another mans possessions, shall surrender them, or shall stand bound to answer the same in Law: except it be for the goods of the banished.

4 From hence forward, they of Zurich shall not ally themselves with the servants of the Duke of Austria: or contrariwise, they shall helpe to recover his rights.

5 If any difference happen to be mowed, betweene the Duke and the Cantons: It is ordained before hand, that some Iudges shall consider on the cause.

6 Those alliances which the Switzers haue made together, shall remaine in their full power and integrity.

There are diuers other Articles in this pacification: but I am onely contented with these, as beeing the principall and cheefest.

It fell out, that diuers interpretations were made vpon this agreement, which likewise began new contentions: yet they were still qualified, before they came to hand-blows, for either sides purfe being emptied of money, and their forces sayling, made them vnwilling to heare of any more warre. Albert Bucheimer, Lieutenant to the duke of Austria, pressed them of Zug, to giue their oath of fidelity vnto his Prince, which they would not do, but with exception of their alliance made with the Cantons, or else to stand acquitted by the sayde Cantons, to whom they had giuen their faith. This difference was referred to the Emperor Charles the fourth, who finally gaue iudgement, that they of Zug should stand exempted from alliance with the Cantons: because (quoth he) the Articles of pacification doe declare, that the Switzers shall not possesse any of the Dukes Townes, neyther hinder any way his government in them.

Now, although this sentence was greatly greuous to the Switzers; considering, that in one of the Articles, the alliances made, were (by name) excepted, and onely ordained, that no new Alliances should be made with the vassalls to the house of Austria: yet notwithstanding, they were so ouer-glutted with war, as they weryvpon the point to leaue Zug to the Duke of Austria; if they of Swits (who had not (as yet) signed the peace) had not opposed themselves against it. They then lodainly gathered their troops together, and went to Zug, demanding againe the faith of the Citizens, who (for their part) had sent their Deputy to Swits to require confirmation of the faith first giuen. This done, after some long debating and consulting, it was at length concluded; by means of the Lorde of Torberg, that truce should be confirmed for the space of eleuen yeares, which was till after the decafe of Albert. During this truce, they of Zug and Glaris continued allyed with the Switzers, and al that while were thereunto subiect, acquitting themselves of all duties due to the house of Austria. The Duke received from Swits a man, from foure yeares to foure yeares, whom hee confirmed Amman or Maior at Zug: And he gaue as Gouernour vnto them of Glaris, Godfrey Mulser of Zurich. Afterward, the truce being expired, it was againe confirmed for a longer time.

The sonne of Albert, named Leopold, greatly hated the Switzers; but he durst not meddle with them, leant hee should gaine as little thereby, as his Father had done. And therefore he would worke his will by others, setting the Switzers at variance with the Englishmen, who hauing spoiled the country about the heime, entered into Smetia, where they did as much harme to the Austrians, as to the Cantons. But hauing bin beaten in some encounters, after they had forraged in Swetia, and all the countrey about Mombelizar, Bisile, Strasbourg, and run into diuers other places, they retired home to their own houses, & hapned Anno 1376.

Six yeares after, war was mowed against the Count of Kybourg. Hee was enforced to take (by treason) the Towne of Solluerre, allyed with the men of Berne, and at the very same time, they of Austria would haue surprized Dun and Arberg, Townes appertaining to the Canton of Bern. Consequently the Count of Kybourg made made open war vpon them of Solluerre, to whom they of Berne and the other Cantons sent supply. The Duke of Austria, who (so lately before) had made alliance with the Switzers, fortified (vnder hand) the Count of Kybourg, and (contrary to his faith) furnished him with vi-uals, and other necessities for warre. Neuertheless, the Count was not able to endure the burthen of amity agreed on betweene them of Solluerre and Bern, but sold them Burgdorff, for the summe of forty thousand Crownes.

The Duke of Austria had a difference, in what manner I know not, with the Imperiall Cities and Townes. They made a league, wherein Zurich, Berne, Solluerre, and Zug were comprehended: but the Duke brake all in sunder by his cunning devices, pacifying himselfe amiablely with the Townes of Suaba and Franconia. And as for the Townes on this side the Rheine in Halatia, hee conquered them in one battell. This victory did to aduance his hopes, as he began to consult with himselfe, how to bring the Townes of Smetia vnder his obedience, and the occasion of the warre grew thus. Peter of Torberg, Gouernour of Wolhouse, and in the Vale of Emilbuch; and Herman Grunenberg, Gouernour of Rottenbourg for the Duke of Austria, who had engaged these places vnto them, tyrannized on the people, and did many outrages to the neighbours of the Lucernians. The people being tyrannically dealt with all, sent men to Lucerna, to desire acceptation into their Bourgeship. But the two Gouernours hauing discovered it, caused the Deputies to be hanged, and all them that had anie hand in the matter, recompensing them with death, that had faithfully employed their paines, to giue life againe to their languishing country. Moreover, they imposed new passage Tolles at Rottembourg on the Switzers, or else they might haue no passage there.

The Lucernians, too much prouoked by so many iniuries, being ayded by the men of Swits, Vri, and Vnderwald: made themselves masters of Rottembourg: the 29 day of December, in the yeare, 1381: spoyleing the Castle, which Grunenberg had forsaken. They did likewise beate downe the walles of the Towne, and filled vpp the Ditches: for feare least the Austrians should lodge any Garrison there, wherewith to molest the Lucernians againe. Some short while after, they of Sempach were receiued into Fellowship Bourgeship with the Lucernians; & two hundred men were put in Garrison by the Lucernians, into the Towne of Kichenfee: but the Lieutenants to the Duke of Austria, hauing lodainly sent an Armie, tooke this Towne by assault, cut throats of the whole Garrison, put most part of the inhabitants to the sword, burned all the rest along, in the same fire wherewith the Towne was embrased; shewing no pity to aged, sicke women; or children. On the other side, al the Cantons, except Bern, took a place in those parts, named Meyenberg; & there planted a garison but the Austrians (faining a flight) drew the Switzers soldiers forth into the open field, where they slew fourescore and one of them, and compelled the rest to retire speedily into the Towne. The Cantons aduerted heereof, called their people together, set fire on the Towne and Castle, leaving not a iote of them vnruined.

These beginnings and entrances into warre, seemed to threaten the Switzers with a farre greater confusion: & therefore, they of Austria made their preparations carefully, yet with great pomp, and every day (by Letters and Heraldry) denounced warre against the Switzers, at the beginning of the ensuing yeare. The Switzers considered likewise on their owne affaires, and provided to set vpon all those enemies, which had enclosed the round about. The men of Berne, who had not boudge as yet, being solicited by many messages from their confederates: ruined two Castles, to wit, Torberg, and Kopping, belonging to Peter of Terberg. They of Lucerna, Vri, Suits, and Vnderwald, spoyleing the Castle and Towne of Woolhouse, as also Liele, Rinsch and Baldy. The men of Zurich ioyned their forces with the Cantons, and after they had made some courses & waste in the countries neerest to their limies: in retiring backe, they tooke (by assault) the Castle of Rumelange, and set it on fire. And because the Duke of Austria made the mustering of his people, especially at Brug & hada, neere to Zurich: it was imagined, that he would go and besiege that Citie also. And this was the reason, why the four Cantons sent sixteen hundred men to succour them of Zurich.

Duke Leopold understanding that such a Garrison was at Zurich, marched so dauntly with his army towards the Cantons, which seemed then naked of the most part of their troops. But this enterprise was discovered by the spies, & therefore left the city of Zurich, in the citizens guard, and returned back those sixteen hundred men which marched under their Ensignes day and night; and so diligently, that they arrived at Sempach, even at the same instant as the duke came to lodge his troops there. That day was the ninth of July, and battell was given the very same day, wherein Leopold sonne to Albert the wife, and Nephew or youngest child to the Emperor Albert, was slain in open field, with six hundred seventy six Gentlemen, whereof there were three hundred and fifty more remarkable then the rest by reason of their Helmes and Burganets, beautified with Coronets and goodly plumes. After so faire a victory, the Cantons began to extend their strength thoroughout all Switzerland, and chastised such as hadde forraged their country, pilld the Citizens, & moved Warre vpon no occasion: many Castles were ruined, and many Towns taken.

Trace fully agreed vpon for the space of a year, but being expired new quarrels arose againe.

In the year, one thousand, three hundred, fourescore, and seauen, the second day of the month of February, truce was agreed on for a year, by the entremise of some Townes. The times of truce being expired, the citizens of Wesen, on the Lake de Rine, deliuered vp their Citie to them of Austria, who slew the Switzers that were there in Garrison. Afterward, the enemy (with great forces) to the number of eight thousand at the least, set vp on the Landes of Glaris the ninth day of Aprill. Some say, that they were about sixteen thousand men, conducted by Donatus Count of Togge, Peter of Torberg, John of Klingenberg, John Counte of Werdenberg, Lord of Sargans. This last man made choise of two thousand men, which he brought by Beglinge, to enclose the Switzers, and make them turne their backs with shame.

A bargain made, but without any certainty.

The other marched boldly on towards the Walles, which they of Glaris had fortified and made fromg their countries entrance the year before, gaying thereby such assurance of the wall, as the victory was almost intirely in their hands; yet they beganne to pillage, and burne all that was about them. Meane while they of Glaris met together in a neere neighbouring Mountaine, to the number of three hundred and fifty, and thirty beside, which they of Suits had sent from the nearest valley. This ouer-little Troope, by greatnesse of courage and resolution, met with the enemy in a verie narrow passage, where they saluted them with such impetuous stormes of great stones, & wherof the place afforded no scarcities, drawing them into a place more open, they pressed and pursued on them with such extreme boldnesse, that the great armie was forced to flight; after they had renewed the charge eleauen several times, as the Annales of Glaris do testify, for, so often did the enemy labour still to set vp on them.

The Count of Werdenberg, looking from the height of a Mountaine (which hee had betaken himselfe vnto) and perceiving the ouerthrow of his associates, saued his owne stake, as wisely as he possibly could. There were two thousand enemies slain in this battaille, and about five hundred were drowned in the Lake: because the multitude of Rinne-wayes, brake downe the Bridge in their haile, whereby they should passe from Glaris to Wesen.

After this battell, the Cantons showed themselves still in many other skirmishes against the Austrians, taking towne and Castles, either by force or composition: but they fought no more battells. For by entremise of the Cities of Constance, Vberlingen, Rauenbourg, & Rottuile, truce was taken for seauen yeares: and afterwards it was prolonged, euen so farre as for the space of twentie yeares; and finally, peace was made for the terme of fiftie yeares.

Peace being established for such length of time, brought some more ease & quietnesse to the Cantons. But in the year one thousand, foure hundred and one, the war of Appenzel began, & continued seuen whole yeares. Appenzel is a Region of Switzerland, seated neere vnto the Alpes, towards the East, and on the Head of the Lake of Constance. At this day, it is one of the thirteene Cantons; but as then it was no way allyed with the Switzers: it is only acknowledged (as a Lord) the Abbot of S. Gall, who was then called, Cuno de Seouffen. Some difference happened between the Abbot and them of Appenzel, and after it had long time bene debated in Lawe before Iudges; they fell at length to pleade theyr cause at the swords point. The Townes neere to the Lake of Constance, did take part with the Abbot, who had funded them from the men of Appenzel, with whom they were allyed and combined. The Abbot hauing leuiued an army of the inhabitants of those townes, gaue battell to the men of Appenzel, who ouer-came them, droue them in disorder, with great losse of their men.

After this foile, they of S. Gall, of Appenzel, and of Suits, associated theselves together. The Duke of Austria ioynd with the Abbot; but they of Appenzel proued still victorious in all other encounters. And after they had conquered a great part of the country about them, ruined many Castles, and taken diuers Townes: at length they compeld the Abbot to craue peace, & leaue them in their wonted liberty.

Seuen yeares after these troubles were ended, a new warre kindled it selfe, betweene Frederick of Austria and the Cantons. The occasion was, because Fredericke had carried away (from forth the Council of Constance) Pope John the 22. He was put to banishment from the Empire, and excommunicated by the council. By this decree of the Emperour, and of the Council, the peace for 50. yeares was broken, the Cantons absolved of their Oath, and commandement given them to take armes against the Emperour: which they did, and toke in that warre Libersheim, Bada, and other places belonging to them of Austria.

In the year, 1422. the Switzers ledde their army by the Alpes, and by the Grisons, to besidge Bellizona; it being a Towne which the Count of Monfax had sold to them of Suits, Fris, & Vnderwald. The Duke of Milaine seemed to say, that this place appertained to him; and thereupon tooke it by intelligence. To recover it againe, the Switzers conducted their army thither this year, then in An.

A new warre happening betweene the Cantons, and Fredericke of Austria.

A war of the Switzers, for the recouerie of Bellizona, from the duke of Milaine.

no 1425. and the year following 1430. But they could not take the Towne notwithstanding, they made haucke, and forraged the Valleyes round about neighbouring, and belonging vnto the Duke of Milaine.

But in the year, 1436. they of Austria, by cunning trickes and subtle devices, raised a great ciuill warre among the Switzers. First, betweene the Canton of Zurich and the men of Suits, to whom (soon after) the other confederats ioynded themselves. The Duke of Austria (first of all) ranked himselfe with them of Suits: and then (soone after) made alliance with the men of Zurich, and gaue them assistance. There were some encounters, and the Switzers besiedged Zurich: but there was no battaille more memorable, then that which (not long after) was given at Bafile, the year, 1444. and the 26. day of August.

The Dolphine of France, who was afterward King, named Lewes the 11. had brought a puissant army betweene Montbelliard and Bafile: provided partly by the praides of Pope Eugenius, to breake the Council of Bafile, and partly by the emperor Fredericke, as wishing well to the Switzers. Sixteene hundred Switzers entered into battell against that great armie, and made a terrible slaughter of them. True it is, that all the sixteene hundred men were slain likewise, as being ouerborne with the meere multitude of their enemies: but they brake the whole armie in such sort, as they forooke all Germanie immediately, to get themselves into France againe. This memorable day, might well be compared with the battell of the Lacedemonians, at their passage of the Thermopylae, considering the magnanimity of so small a number: who, for the safety of their country (euen all Germanie) opposed themselves valiantly, against an infinite of enemies. In these ciuill Warres were made many Truces, which was the cause, why such as haue written thereof, do not agree together in the computation of the yeares. The common opinion is, that this war lasted seuen yeares: but it began in the year, 1436. & firme peace was made and ratified in Anno, 1450.

A year after this peace, the Abbot of S. Gall made alliance with foure Cantons of

of the Switzers. And the yeare following, they of Appenzel allyed themselves with seauen Cantons. And againe a yeare after, the City of Saint Gall, with fixe Cantons. Consequently, and in the yeare one thousand, foure hundred, fifty foure, the men of Schaffnau allyed themselves with the fixe Cantons. But I shall make better mention of these alliances heereafter, and in apert manner.

These alliances were no sooner made but a new warre beganne to shew it selfe, against Sigismund Duke of Austria. Pope Pius had excommunicated him, I know not vpon what occasion, and fo incited the Switzers to warre. On the other side, the Lords of Grandier, brethren of Graz, a Towne in Styria, hauing bene dispoiled of their goods by Sigismund, desired ayde of them of Zurich, who had receyued them into the number of their Burgesses. Then the Switzers went and assaulted Winterthur, tooke Rapperswil, Diesfrow, Frauenfeld, and Turgau. In the end, peace was made, Anno 1460. by the meanes of Lepes Duke of Bavaria. Afterward, in the yeare, 1466, certain Articles of peace & mutuall amity, were set downe in Wittenberg. Ten yeares after, war was renewed against the Duke of Austria, so that the Switzers led their troopes towards the Towne of Mulhouse, on the Frontiers of La Franche Comté. This Town had made alliance with the Cantons some moneths before: and in the same yeare, a Towne vpon the Rheine, neere to Basile, named Walzhut, was besiedged by the Switzers.

In the yeare one thousand, foure hundred, seauenty foure, began the Switzers warre against Charles Duke of Burgogne. It grew hot, and wonderfull sharp, in the yeare seauenty fixe, for two battailes were fought, in both which the duke was vanquished; but it tooke ending at the beginning of seauenty seauen, by reason of the Dukes death, who was slaine in Lorraine. The Princes of Austria were the sparkes to kindle this war. For Sigismund Duke of Austria, hauing ill performed his businesse in warre, which he maintained so long a time against the Switzers, was constrained to agree with them, although much against his minde. In the meane while, to torment them by some other meanes, he engaged those Landes which hee helde in La Franche Comté (as Montbeliard and Basile, neighbors to the Switzers) to Charles Duke of Burgogne, the most potent Prince of his time, aduenturous, and of an high hand. Sigismund periwaded himselfe, that (as manie times it falls out among neighbours) some difference would shortly grow betweene Duke Charles and the Switzers: for they had sent Ambassadors to the Duke, to pray him renew the ancient amity of the house of Bourgogne with the Switzers, and confirme the Articles of peace, not long before concluded with Sigismund, in so much as concerned the engaged countries. But the ambassadors could neuer gaine access to the Prince, in regard of their hinderance by Hagenbach, chiefe Minion to the Duke of Bourgogne, and established Governor by him ouer those countries. This Hagenbach was the principall fire-brand wherby to kindle this war; for he gaue many outrageous words vnto the Switzers, & daily kept company with theyr enemies, as Heudorff, Eptingen, and some other Gentlemen, who had threatened the Switzers with war.

Hee tyrannized also cruelly in those pawned countries, so that the poore subiects who were able to performe no more, intreated most earnestly Duke Sigismund, their ancient Lord, to disingage them, & receiue them againe vnder his gouernement. This request was quickly granted them by Sigismund, a Prince verie benigne, and (for his facility) fir-named the Simple.

But the Duke of Bourgogne desired not to purre the money againe. And on the other side, the tyranny of Hagenbach still increased, so that hee grew inupportable to the people, & neighboring Lords. There were some other thornes between the Switzers and the D. of Bourgogne: because Cousin Ramont being seruant vnto him, had sent away diuers chariots from them, laden with Hides. In the meane while, King Lepes the eleuenth, who desired not greatly the Dukes life, and had proueed (neere to Basile) the valour of the Switzers horsemen, made alliance with them. And although himselfe would not meddle with the warre, yet he could vbet on the Switzers, and (by vnderhand trickes) furnish them with money, to the end that necessity should not inforce any pacification. He accorded Sigismund likewise with the Switzers, and made an Alliance betweene them. Soone after, René Duke of Lorraine, Strasbourg, and Basile, with theyr Byshoppes, Colmar, Slestadt, Montbeliard, and some other cities, ioyned themselves likewise into this confederacy.

During this time, Hagenbach was taken in a place, named Brissac, and the D. of Austria hauing consigned the money at Basile, for which hee had engaged his countries, re-entred vpon possession of them, and (by sentence) caused Hagenbach to be condemned, and his head publickly fennit off. Contrariwise, Duke Charles made warre vpon the byshop of Cologne, pretending, that the Princes Office, or protection of the Byshopprick appertained to him, and therefore planted his sledge before Nuss, aboue Cologne. The Emperor Fredericke, accompanied with the Empires forces, encamped nere vnto him, to fight with him. And, according to right and maiesty of the Empire, sent vnto the Switzers and their confederates, to assault (on their side) the Duke of Bourgogne, that his forces might be broken and scattered. But immediately after, hee shewed himselfe to bee of the house of Austria, and (consequently) an enemy to the Cantons. For so soone as the Switzers were entered into Bourgogne, and had won a batell, and taken some Townes, hee made peace with the Duke of Bourgogne, wherein the Princes of the Empire were comprized, and the Townes which had succored the Emperour in this warre. But the confederates were excluded, to wit, Duke Sigismund, Duke René, the Cantons, and the forenamed Townes.

Duke Charles, being deliuered from the warre which hee had against the Emperour and the Germaines: turned all his forces vpon the Switzers, and theyr Allies. There were some encounters on either side: but the very greatest efforts and valour, shewed themselves in three battailes, whereat the Duke himselfe was present in person. The first was fought at Grandson, neere to the Lake of Yuerdun, which (at this day) is called the Lake of Newcastle. This Towne had bene taken by the Switzers, and re-taken againe by them vpon composition: neuertheless, the Duke of Bourgogne (contrarie to his promise) hanged and drowned the Souldiers of his Garrison; but (soone after) hee receiued wages answerable vnto his owne perfidie and cruelty, the Switzers overcoming him in a field of bat-taille. True it is, that then hee lost not many of his men, for the Cavalerie sustayned, and meere ly covered the Infanterie being broken and disordered, and the Switzers had not their Horsemen there, because they came not at a convenient time: yet notwithstanding, the Duke of Bourgogne lost his baggage, wherein hee had great store of Riches and Treasure.

Then afterwards, there was another battaile fought at Morat, neere to Berne: the Switzers (after a great ouerthrow of their enemies) wonne the day, and it is sayde, that eightene thousand Bourguignons lay slaine in the field; and to this day, there is still to be seene huge heapes of dead mens bones, as a credible Teitimony of that victory.

The third battaile, was fought before Nancy in Lorraine, besiedged by the duke of Bourgogne: but the Switzers (set in succour vnto the Duke & ene of Lorraine, (who had fixe hundred men at the battle) well nere all Frenchmen well provided) eight thousand foot, and the other confederates three thousand more. With all these forces Duke René gaue battell to Charles, who had many more to attend him: neuertheless, he was overcome, & (in flight) slaine by the Switzers, and so (with him) dyed all this warre. A yeare after, the Switzers passed the * Leopontine Alps, which mountaine is now called S. Godard, & went to gine battell to the D. of Milaine, in a place named Tornico. The occasion of the war, was, because the inhabitants of the valley towards Tornico, subiects to the Canton of Vri, complained of diuers outrages doone them by theyr neighbours, who molested and troubled them in the vse and possession of certaine Forrests. The Switzers Ambassadors, being vnable to reconcile this difference, the men of Vri, craued succour of theyr confederates, and ledde their Armie to Belluzona. But because they could not besiedge it in regard of the winter: they leste fixe hundred men in Garrison at Tornico, which is not farr from thence.

The *Millane*s came in great troops, to set vpon the Garrison of the Switzers, which being shut vp in the firaies of the Mountains; the more speedily and easily slew foueteene hundred of them, and chased the rest quite out of the Valley. This battaile was fought about the third day of November, 1478. And in the Month of December following, by the intermise of the King of France, peace was made between the Duke of Millane, & the Switzers. In the same year, Pope Sixtus made alliance with the Switzers, and before other priuiledges, he gaue them also strong pardons. Two yeares after, the Switzers sent feuen thousand men to aide King Lewis the eleuenth, according to the tenour of the alliance before contracted. But they hauing passed so farre as Chalons, the King (who had obtained the height of his enterprife) hauing then no occasion elsewhere to employ them; sent them backe againe with very good recompences: where-with many of them were so earnestly allured, that they stroue among themselves, who should first take pensions or wages of the French.

The yeare after, they of Zurich, Berne, Lucerna, Fribourg, and Solleurre, made a particular alliance, because they conceived, that their associates had carried themselves inhumanely on their behaife, in the war against the Duke of Bourgonne. For the forenamed cities and townes had bin at great charges, as well for conduct of their victuals, as also the carriage of the Artillery: moreover, they furnished more people, then the other cantons did. Neuerthelesse, when they shold diuide the spoile and booty, which was very great and rich; the cantons that had defraied nothing, neither brought any such number of men, tooke their part of the booty by equall portion. In regard of which iniury (as they pretended it) and some other light offences; these cities and townes, desiring to provide particularly for their owne affaires; allied themselves onely together. But the other cantons were heereat greatly offended, especially, they of Vri, Suites, and Vnderwald: maintaining, that it was not law-full for the Lucernians, to make any new alliance without their knowledge and consent.

This matter was debated diuers daies together, in a Councell holden at Stantz in Vnderwald; and finally by the meanes of an Hermit, named Nicholas of Vnderwald (who was then in verie great authority among the Switzers, by their reposed opinion of him, that hee was a holie man) the parties were accorded to conditions, to witte: That the fore-named Townes should depart from that nouell alliance, and altogether (by a common consent) should agree on causes then debated; as that Fribourg and Solleurre, should bee receiued into the number of the Cantones of Swetia, so that there should be tenne Cantons: And because the former eight (which were and are called the olde Cantons, because they allied themselves together before the other) had made a bodie of a Commonwealth together of the Switzers, for the space of fixe score and nine yeares, or thereabout; I will heere set downe a Summarie of the a titles of the alliances which those olde Cantons made, and of that which was subscribed vnto at Stantz by a common consent among the Cantons.

A briefe Summary, of the Alliances and Confederations, made betwene the 8. ancient Cantons of Swetia.

He principall & first Chapter or Article of the leagues and alliances, doth concern the aide and succour which one ought to giue another, against such as wrongfully shall assaile them: wherein all things are verie well ordered, gouerned by equity, and according to reason. For, to the end that no warre may be lightly moued, and vpon small or slender occasions; it is first of all ordained, that the Cantons which are offended, shall make knowne the merite of the cause to the Councell in generall for that Canton established. And then, if it do appeare, that offence and out-rage is done, it may demand succour and assistance.

Conditions concluded by the Hermit, and Cantons, for a general consentment.

The first Article of the leagues, concerneth mutual succour, and publique assistance.

Concerning the alliance of Glaris.

Every Canton is not allied with all the rest.

Vi, Suites, and Vnderwald.

The Lucernians in their necessity.

All the Cantons haue not their rights alike.

In some other alliances, namely, that of Glaris, this knowledge is deferred to other allied Cantons. After that the equity of the cause hath appeared, & the outrage receiued: the Canton interessed, may require the Confederates to come and helpe it. In the interim, the Canton may not make recourse to whom it liketh best; but onely to that which is allied to it in some especiall manner. For (as I haue hitherto shewne) euery one of the Cantons is not allied with all the other. In the first place, concerning them of Zurich, allied by antiquity with fix of the cheefest Cantons; they may demand ayde of all those fixe. Since then, they made alliance with them of Berne and So (by consequent) they are bound likewise to giue them assistance, being thereto required. The Bernishmen may call vnto their assistance, them of Vri, Suites, and Vnderwald, by reason of ancient alliance: and they (reciprocally) may call to their ayde, and for their other confederates the Canton of Berne. But by reason of the new league, they of Zurich and Berne, must require ayde one of another. The Lucernians (in times of necessitie) may haue recourse to the men of Zurich, Vri, Suites, Vnderwald, and Zug. They of Vri, Suites, and Vnderwald, may call all the other Cantons. And they of Zug haue the same right as the Lucernians, that is, to require aide from the Cantones of Zurich, Vri, Suites, Vnderwald, and Lucerna. They of Glaris, haue recourse vnto the Cantons of Zurich, Vri, Suites, & Vnderwald.

Now, although that all haue not their rights alike heerein; yet notwithstanding if one Canton require one or two of his allies to come and succour him: all the Cantons must assemble together, because they which are first called, shall giue aduertisement to the other. But, about all things, they shall send their Ambassadors to the Chappell of the Hermitage, or to a place named Kienholz, and if question bee made of an acte, which concerneth the men of Berne: they must advise altogether (by all meanes) to appeale the difference in friendly manner, or according vnto right, or (if it may not so bee done) how they may assuredly giue suc-

cour. Their alliance speaketh expressly, that such as are called vnto assistance, shall not vse any fraude or deceit, neither any frivolous or vaine excuse, but to assist with all their power.

And because it may so happen, that a Canton shall bee so sodainly assailed at vnawares, as the enemy may stoppe all the passages, and so (by consequent) the Canton can compass no meanes of crauing succour, neyther by Letters or Ambassadors. For this it is provided and expressly ordained, that in such a case, and when most neede is of speediest helpe: the confederate Cantons, shall assist with all their forces, euen as if they had bene (by name) called thereto. In the alliance with them of Berne, it is ordained; That if the enemy assaile the higher countrie, the confederates shall make spoile on the other, vpon the Landes of the enemy: thereby to scatter his forces. And the same to bee done in the higher countrey, if the enemy intrude vpon the lower. They that are called to succour, shall come at their owne expences, and without any wages. Onely in the alliance of Berne, with Vri, Suites, and Vnderwald, mention is made of Wages. Namely, of a Sol Tournois (each day) for euery man on foote. Neuerthelesse, if the Warre be in the countrey of Ergow, then they of Berne shall pay nothing. But there is a Village or Hamlet, neere vnto the first Lake of the Riuer Ar, which is called Punderfer beyonde which, such foote Souldiours as come to assist the one or other party, shall receiue that aforesaid Wages.

If the warre last of any continuance, and that they must besiedge and batter some Towne, Village, or Castle, and the same is fully concluded and agreed vpon, by common consent and aduice of the Cantones: then that Canton, in whose fauour, and on whose limites, the Towne or Castle of the Enemy is besiedged, shall pay onely the charge and expences, as well for munition, powder, conuoy of Artillerie, Pionners, as all other things necessarie and requisite in a batterie. Neuerthelesse, if the Warre bee vnderaken, not onelie in the name of one Canton, but of vnder name of the Switzers whole Commonwealth:

then they shal euery one pay their shares alike.

Likewise it comes to passe many times, that some such as dwell far off from Swetia, doth offer wrong to the whole Nation, or to one part in particular; in the meane time, no knowledge is had how to pursue this warre, eyther because the enemy is too farre distant, or keepeth no certaine abiding, where he may bee dealt withall. For such, it is ordained, that if (by any occasion) they, their goods, or any of their complices can bee apprehended on the lands of one of the Cantons: hand shall be laid on them, & they constrained to satisfie them whom they haue offended. Finally, to preuent & hinder, that none shall abuse, or be abused by the Swissers Soldiers, leading them whether they list: in many alliances, the limits wherein some stand bound to succour other, are prescribed and determined. The limits are partly to the Cantons confines, according to their extendure forth, or a little more further out: but they may not passe the ancient bounds of Swetia.

The second Chapter or Article, is touching publicke differences or controuersies, between two Cantons or more. Forasmuch as it cannot be otherwise, but the very best friends and confederates, may sometimes haue cause to disioyne & sunder: our predecessours did denie, to stay the consequence of such differences, to wit, that no warre should follow, as fearing lesse alliance and kindnesse might thereby perishe, & vterly be broken. First then it is ordained, that the other Cantons shall send their Ambassadors, to take order, that the variance may amiably be ended, or according to right, and it is established to be administered in manner following. Each party shall chuse two Judges of his owne Canton, to whom they shall promise by oath, that without any affection or loue to their country, they will iudge on the difference. To these foure Judges, a fifth must be added, named Vniptre or Superarbitrator: who is elected sometimes by the Iudges, and sometimes by the parties. If the one canton will not vndergo iudgement, nor suffer his right to bee examined: the other cantons stand bound by alliance, to succour him that consents, that the contro-uerfie should bee ended by the Arbitrators.

The third Chapter or Article, concerneth alliances. The foure first Cantons do determine, that it is not lawfull for any one among them (without the will & consent of the other, to bind themselves by Oath, or make alliance with any, whofoeuer it is. Likewise, in the alliance of Glaris, it is saide, that they may not make any alliance or confederacie, without consent of the other Leaguers. For otherwise, the other Cantons may referue to themselves, the liberty and authoritie of making new alliances, yet leauing (in meane while) the ancient stil in full force. They kept also the freedom, for increasing and diminishing their alliances, by a publicke and common consent. And ordained in like manner, that these alliances might bee renewed by writing, or by word of mouth, and to bee confirmed by Oath, if neede required, from five or ten to an hundred yeares. If this might not bee done commodiously, yet notwithstanding, they were to be obserued firmly.

In the fourth place, are added exceptions; because certaine Cantones, which anciently did concerne the Empire; as Zurich, Berne, Vri, Suites, and Vnderwald, excepted the Empire, and the rightes thereof, from which they pretended no derogation by this alliance, in any manner whatsoever.

Lucerna and Zug, excepted the rites of the Duke of Austria. By the alliance of Glaris, are excepted all rights and deuoiues due vnto lawfull Lords and Magistrates. Likewise, in all these confederations, are excepted the ancient alliances, rights, priuiledges, and customes of the Cantons, together with their Castles, Villages, and Hamlets: so that those rights remaine found and intire to euery one.

Now, although the other Chapters and Articles are not of any such importance; yet notwithstanding, they tend to maintenance & conseruation of peace and quietnesse. There is one for the punishing of homicides or Men-killers. Hee that killeth any one of the Confederates, shall loose his head: except hee can make good proofe, that hee did it in defence of his owne bodie, and for safetie safetie of his life. Whofoeuer shal be condemned and banished from his Canton, shall stand banished and excluded also from the countries of the other Cantons: and whofoeuer lodgeth or asisisteth any such person, shall be guilty and punished in some other nature.

There is another Article, which prohibiteth the exacting or vrging of names to wit, if any Lay-man attempt to pay himselfe in his debtes, by the name or meanes of Iudges of the Church: onely causes Matrimoniall, and manifest Vltury, are to be referred, and sent to the Court for the Church. No man shall exact a pawne of any one, except of his debter, or him that standeth pledge for him. Neither shall he receiue pawns of his owne priuate authority, but by consent of the Iudge. No one shall engage himselfe for another man.

Concerning iudgements, it is ordained, that each man may haue, & assigne his Iudge. He that shall not appeare according to the assignation, but falleth into default, and interesteth the contrarie party by his absence, shall pay his charges. Causes shall be pleaded in the Audience Hall of the Canton, where the aucte makes mention of the deed doing. Iustice is to be done without fraude or deceite. And euery man shall content him selfe with the iudgements, Lawes, and customes of the Canton, where his cause is pleaded.

Although that these Articles, and other such like, may seeme to bee of small consequence: yet notwithstanding, because thereby (oftentimes) great debates do arise, yea, warres with our alliances, in discouering them distinctly & at large, it contents me (for mine owne part) that I haue thus briefly & summarily toucht them.

The Tenor of the Arrest or Agreement made at Stantz.

Here, we ordaine, that no one of the eight Cantons, either by it selfe, or aided by others shall enterprize to make war on any one of the said Cantons, or any other joynd there-with in this alliance. Neither shal offer any wrong to their bodies, goods, Townes, Countreys, or people, nor robbe or despoile them of any thing to them appertaining. If any one of the eight Cantons shall do otherwise (which God forbid) and outrage any of the other. To the end it may bee remedied, and order giuen, that our alliance may remaine firme, so that wee may liue together in peace like Brethren: all the other Cantons shall ranke themselves with that which is offended, and conferre the rights thereof, in good faith, and without any fraud. And if some particular person, or many together, shall doe wrong or iniurie vnto some other particular body: that then speedily, and without any contradiction, they shall be chastised by their Magistrate (in what place soeuer it is) according to the quality of the offence, and as they haue deserved. Neuerthelesse, if any one shall commit such insolences vpon the iurisdiction of another, and moue it to be troubled, answere may bee made him in the very same place, and he iustly punished, according to the right and custom of the country.

Secondly we say, that hence forward, none shall attempt to make anie assembly, and therein to purpose anie thing whatsoever (either secretly or publicly) in the Cities, Townes, or Countries of Swetia, whereby any damage or danger may ensue, without making it first known, and with the consent of the Lordes of that Canton. Whofoeuer swerue, and endeouere to make any such assembly, or shall fauour it, either by worde or deede, shall bee chastised by the Magistrate, according to the exigence of the act, and that without the least hindrance or delay.

In like manner, and by common consent, we expressly ordaine, that (honour and oath reserved) it shall not be lawfull for any one, to encite the subiects of any Canton, to do any thing derogatorie, to the obedience due to the Magistrate, or moue the people to any disobedience or reuolt. And if the subiects of any one of the Cantons, shall bee rebellious against the commandements thereof: that then the other Cantons shall succour it faithfully, and reforme those subiects to their duties, according to the agreement of our alliances.

Of insolencies committed on the iurisdications of other men.

The 2. Article concerneth assemblies or Conuenticles without knowledge & consent of the Magistrate.

For disobedience to Magistrates, or infringing their orders and decrees.

The third Article concerneth the Military discipline of the Cantons, answerable to that of Sempach.

Thirdly, because that after the battell of Sempach, our Ancestors resolved upon some ordinances, concerning matter of warre: it seemed good to vs, to explicate in this agreement, that which is perpetual, even the principall Article of those ordinances, and in regard of our selves and our successors, to set it downe as followeth. If one Canton or more, do bring an Army into the field, marching with colours displayed against the enemy: all they that march vnder those colours, must continue together for the fight, as honest men ought to do. And according to the example of our Ancestors, what necessity sooner is enforced, be it to fight in ranged battaile, in skirmish, or otherwise, how short or long soever the time be: it is to be carried according to the orders Military, made after the day of Sempach.

The fourth Article concerneth matters of contracts passed long ago by our Ancestors

In the fourth place, we haue ordained, that those contracts passed long time since, by our Ancestors, as concerning Ecclesiasticall persons, and other things, in the year, one thousand, three hundred and seuentie; shall be obserued inuolubly, firmly, and from point to point. And to the end, that the memory thereof may be perpetuall, at all such times as our alliances may be renewed by oath: those two transactions and ordinances, concerning affairs of warre and Ecclesiasticks, together with this amiable agreement, shall be publickly read, among and with the Articles of alliances. But to the end, that yong men, and they of meaner yeares also, may the better remember our alliances, and obserue them the more faithfully; we haue agreed, that hereafter (from five yeares to five yeares) the alliances shall be renewed throughout all the Cantons, by oath, which shall be given for this effect.

For yong men and they of vnder age.

The fifth Article concerneth booties conquered in warre, & the ranfomes of prisoners.

Finally, we haue accorded, that when any warre happeneth, all the booty conquered from the enemy, and those fums payed by prisoners for their ranfomes: shall be distributed (by equall portions) among the number of Soldiers, which the Cantons or Townes haue in the Army. But the Cities, Townes, Castles, Countries, passages, anuall renewes, iurisdiccions, and other things of the same nature, though conquered in warre, shall be equally parted or diuided among the Cantons, according to their ancient custome. If we permit any of these things to be bought or solde to any; the money payed, or arising thereby, shall be distributed among the Cantons by equall portions.

We haue determined and published this louing agreement, and in this manner, that all such as haue or shall carry Armes with vs, all Subiects, citizens, inhabitants, confederates, and parties ioyned with vs, may haue their iust portion in the booties. But as for Cities, Towns, Castles, Countries, men, renewes yearly, iurisdiccions, ports, and conquered passages: such things doe belong to the Cantons onely. We make exception in this accord, of our perpetual alliances, intending that nothing thereof shall be infringed; but that this present transaction shall be inuolubly maintained, yea, faithfully and without any fraud, for the confirmation and manutention of our alliances.

This Attest was ratified with the consent of all, in the yeare, 1481. in the house for particular alliances of our Townes: And by common accord, they of Fribourg and of Solleurre, were receiued into the number of the Cantons. And then the common-wealth of the Switzers (for the space of twenty yeares) stood composed of ten Cantons; whereto consequently, Basile and Schaffhouse, and then Appenzell were added. But before we speake of their alliances, we must say somewhat as concerning Fribourg and Solleurre: then will we summarily declare, what they did, after their receiuing into alliance.

Of the Towne of Fribourg; who was the first founder thereof: And how it came into league and alliance with the Cantons.

The originall of the Towne of Fribourg.

The diuers deportments and carriage of the Fribourgers.

Fribourg fold for the King of the Romans.

The perpetual alliance made between the Fribourgers and the men of Berne.

Fribourg is a Towne, seated vpon the River of Sana, builded by Herthoult, fourth of that name, Duke of Zeringen, some few yeares before Berne. These two Townes maintained themselves long time in amity: but after the Dukes death, Berne became subiect to the Empire, and Fribourg fell into the hands of the Counts of Kybourg, that dwelt at Bourgsdorf, which was the cause, that (by succession of time) they tooke their affection to them of Berne. First of all, they were prefer'd in the warre with Godfrey, Count of Kybourg, against the Bernians. Soone after, their friendship was renewed againe, but yet with this exception, that if the Lords of Fribourg were at discord with Berne, the Fribourgers might follow their Lords part, without any prejudice to that louing accord. Some short while after, the Count solde

Fribourg to Raoul, King of the Romans, and from thence forward, about the space of two hundred yeares it remained vnder the dominion of Austria. During which time, the Fribourgers being conducted and commanded by them of Austria, were present in many fought battailes, giuen to the Bernians at Loupen, at Schonenberg, and elsewhere. Againe, afterward they renewed (diuers times) their ancient alliance and amity with the men of Berne. In the yeare 1413, after they had bin tormented (in many kindes) by Noblemen, they contracted a perpetual alliance with the Bernians: and yet notwithstanding, continued subiects to them of Austria. This amity endured forty five yeares, at the end whereof, warre being moued betweene the Prince of Sauoye, and the Fribourgers: they of Berne followed the faction of the Prince of Sauoye, to whom they had bene allied, and stood friends a long time. There were some courtes on eyther side, and a battaile fought neere to Grierts, wherein the Fribourgers had the worst. The yeare after, the Ambassadors to the King of France, of the Duke of Bourgonne, and of the Cantons, made a peace. And the yeare following, Albert of Austria being come to Fribourg; some certaine men of the Towne comploted with him, to make warre vpon the Bernians. Matters grew on so forward, that there was some apparance of sedition, and one was ready to run vpon another: if the men of Berne (by a singular providence and adreffe) had not appealed the commotion, by the sending of their Ambassadors.

Albert perceiving that Fribourg fauoured the Cantons, and leaned to that side, and that the citizens, who enioyed the priuileges of their Ancestors, obeyed not entirely to what he commanded them, and that oftentimes (according to their alliance) they followed them of Berne, and went in warre with the Cantons: he began to lose all hope of remaining any longer Master of the Towne. For this cause, the chiefe Master of his household came to Fribourg (sent by the Prince as some say) where he caused instantly to be noyed through the Towne; that the Prince wold very suddenly come thither, how soone he knew not. Heerevpon, he borrowed and got together, all the siluer Vessels, Tapitrics, and such like costly moueables, to adorne that house in the Towne, where it was saide that the Prince should alight and lodge. But (by vnder-hand meanes) the Master of the household, caused those goods to be secretly transported out of the town.

The day being come, of the Princes appointment to be there, he rode forth with his horsemen, as it were to meet his Master, accompanied with the worthiest men of the Towne. Being farre enough off, no Prince came; but only such horsemen as he had sent before, to attend the Master of the household, and the charge he had. When they were come into a place of security, he saide to them of Fribourg,

The enemies of peace put themselves forward into the greatest danger.

bourg, who rode in his company to honour the Prince, that for the confidence they reposed, in their league made with the men of Berne, and combined amity with the Cantons: they were rebels to the Prince, and therefore it stood with reason and iustice, that the Prince should get what he could from them: as namely, the silver vessels, and the other goods brought from the Towne.

Speaking these words, hee galloped away with his traine to meete the Prince with the spoiles of Fribourg. But the citizens, being thus vnworthily handled, made a far stricter alliance with the Bernians, and ioyned themselues also with the confederates, vpon certaine conditions. So that during the warre against the Duke of Bourgogne, the Cantons sent a thousand men for Garrison into Fribourg. And the Fribourgers likewise, were present in the batailles with their confederates, against the Duke of Bourgogne, carrying themselues very valiantly in that warre. Afterward, they were receiued (with them of Solleurre) into the number of the Cantons, as heereafter we shall tell you.

CHAP. IX.

Of the City of Solleurre, being one of greatest name in Suetia.

Solleurre is one of the most ancient cities or townes in all Suetia. It is called by many, the Sister of Treuer, which was builded (as the ancient Annals doe make mention) in the time of Ninus. The olde Roman inscriptions, which are yet to be seene at Solleurre, do testifie the antiquity of the city. But by the warres and courtes of the Allemaignes, Hunnies, and Francians in Gauls, vpon the declination of the Romane Empire; Solleurre was ruined, as many other cities and townes were in like manner. But after that the Francians became Lords & Masters, it was rebuilded, and yielded in subiection to the Bishop of Genewa. For it is said, that in the Church or Temple of S. Vic- tor, neere to Genewa, these words are found written.

Acta sunt hæc regnante Domitiano, Episcopo Genensensi, quo tempore etiam Castrum Salodorense Episcopatus Genensensis subditum erat, &c.

These things were made and done, in the time of Domitian, Bishop of Genewa: during which time, the Castle of Solleurre was subiect to the Bishop of Genewa, &c.

In the times of the Allemaigne or German Emperors, Solleurre was daily numbered with the Imperiall cities & townes: yet (notwithstanding) in such sort, as the collidge of the chanons enioyed the principal priuiledges and franchises. And it is saide, that they haue the same rights as the chanons of Zurich.

The Dukes of Suaba were Pro-nobles or Governours of this city, as likewise of other Imperiall townes in Suetia. They of Solleurre (in ancient times) made an alliance with the Bernians, I cannot well tell in what year; but since that time, the two cities haue borne good and loyall amity together. And (almost) in all the warres the Bernians had: the men of Solleurre euermore succoured them with happy successe.

Vpon the contention moued betwene Lewes of Bauris, and Fredericke of Austria, which should be Emperor of them both: they of Solleurre tooke part with Lewes, by which occasion, the Pope excommunicated them, and then they were afterward besieged by the Duke of Austria. But they of Berne sent them foure hundred men for their Garrison. Moreover, they had warre against the Count of Kybourg, who wonne a battaile of the, by treason of one of their citizens. Finally, in the year, one thousand, three hundred, fifty and one, they made a perpetual alliance with them of Berne, & continued alwayes good friends with the other Cantons. So that after the warre of Austria, wherein Leopold was slaine; they made peace and alliance with the house

CHAP. X.

Of the Switzers wars against them of Millaine, against the Venetians; and at the conquest of Naples.

HE men of Fribourg and of Solleurre, being admitted into ranke with the Cantons; the Switzers made these warres ensuing. In the year, one thousand, foure hundred, eighty and seuen; Iustus de Sillum, Bishop of Sion, leuied an Army of Valachians and Switzers, which he led beyond the Alps, against the Duke of Millaine. But the issue of that voyage was vnfortunate, because the Duke ouerthrew them: so that they were enforced to returne home againe to their owne houses, after they had lost very many of their men.

The year following, the Switzers sent succour (according to the tenour of their alliance) to Sigismund, Duke of Austria, against the Venetians. And then afterward, they were in pay with the King of France, Charles the eight, who had renewed the alliance, which his Father made with the Switzers. They were first in Bretaigne, where the King won a great victory against the Duke, at Saint Aubin. Then againe in Italy, when Charles conquered the kingdome of Naples. And at Formio, when hee gaue battaile to the Princes of Italy, that were leagued against him. In all these warres, the Switzers did good and faithfull seruice vnto the King.

In the year, one thousand, foure hundred, & ninety, another ciuill warre kindled it selfe in Suetia. The Abbot of S. Gall, had begun to build a new Abbey at Rosack. The citizens of S. Gall, they of Appenzell, and the subiects to the Abbot (partly moued by a kinde of deuotion, as vnwillingly that the bones and reliques of S. Gall, should be carried any where else; and partly also for their owne profit, fearing lest the packs of linnen cloth (which grew to great gaine among them) should be transported to Rosack conspired together, and at vnawares, went out in Arms, and ioyning together in troopes, went to beate downe the new building, which was not (as then) fully finished. The Abbot not a litle moued with this injury, called the foure Cantons, wherto he was allied, to aide him. The sixe other Cantons, mediators for peace, exhorted the of S. Gall, to decide this difference with the Abbot, by course of right in law. But because the confederates alledged, that great wrong was done them, in building a new Abbey, and (by that means) abolishing their ancient priuiledges; therefore consequently, they had iust occasion to vndertake Armes, and would not haue it debated in iustice. The foure Cantons with some other people of their allies, brought their troopes to Turgau: but this warre was appealed without blowes. For first of all, they of Appenzell made peace with the Switzers, who took from them the Valley of Rheussce. Then afterward, the city of S. Gall being besieged, peace was made betweene the citizens & the Switzers; by the means of George, Count of Sargans, Gaudenius, Count of Metsch, and the Lords of Constance. In like manner, the subiects to the Abbot were reconciled, after each one had paid his fine.

Some short while after, followed the last warre against the house of Austria, which the Switzers called, the warre of Suaba: the Emperor Frederick did spread the seeds abroad, but after his death, his Sonne and Successor Maximilian, gathered them together. Fredericke had procured, that certaine Princes, Lords, and Townes should make an alliance, which they rearmd, The great league of Suaba: and (among other matters) to oppresse especially (as was conceived) the liberties of the Switzers. The Emperour was was chiefe of this league, which was beneficiall to Germany in one kinde: for by that means, the wayes were more free & assured, theuere were taken and punished, and their castles and places of retreat beaten to the ground. There had bene (long time before) some enmities betweene the Switzers, and some of their neighbours, vassalls to the house of Austria.

Day by day the fire lay kindling, and the Switzers suffered insupportable iniuries and outrages. On the other side, they of Austria, grieved the Grisons with nouell charges, and had cast them out of their ancient possessions in some places.

Vpon this occasion, and to provide for their owne security, against the violence of their enemies; the Switzers and the Grisons made a perpetuall league together.

A league of

and Grisons, against their enemies.

Moreover, King Lewis the twelfth, desirous to recover the Duchy of Milaine, which he auouched to belong vnto him: purchased the amity and alliance of the Switzers, who in such a perillous time, thought good not to refuse it, neyther to let to fit and apt occasion slippe them.

Diuers victories of the Switzers.

Many goings and commings were betweene them, to pacifie this businesse, and the parties on eyther side took arms, in the yeare, one thousand, foure hundred, ninety nine. Many encounters they had in this warre, and the Switzers still remained victors: except once, when they were put into route, neere to Constance.

But they recovered their honour againe the same day, hauing freshly recollected their forces, and then giuing battle to the enemy, enforced him to forsake the place. Moreover, they and the Grisons, in eight other as great encounters as skirmishes, had still the aduantage: as at Mont de Lucé, at Trefse, Harden, Fraßenz, on the plaine of Malsä, nere to Basile, in the Forrest des Freres, in the vale of Leime, and lastly, at the Castle of Dornach, appertaining to them of Solowere.

They of Austria, being tired and spent with so many losses, came finally to a composition; by the intermise of Lo- douicke Sforzza, Duke of Milaine, who sent thither the Vicount Galeazzo. And so peace was made, vpon this condition, that the liberties of the Switzers should remaine in their integrity, and they were confirmed in the possession of all those places which they had taken before from them of Austria. In like manner, the jurisdiction in criminall causes, at the command of Turgaw, which they of Constance had enjoyed vntill that time, was giuen to the Switzers.

Thus you see the last warre (except that of the Grisons against John Iaqués de Medicis, Lord of Musl) that the Switzers had to this present time, to maintain the liberties of their countries, against the violence and force of forraigne Princes. They were afterward present in many other warres, and wonne renowne of being hardy and valiant men: but those warres were made partly in Italy, partly in France, vnder authority and command, eyther of the King of France, or of the Dukes of Milaine. For immediately after the peace made with them of Austria; the Vicount Galeazzo began to make secretly a leuée of Switzers.

Contrariwise, the King of France demanded succour all openly, according to the tenour of the league, which was granted to him. Notwithstanding, contrary to the will and Edicts of the leagued Lords; Galeazzo enrolled five hundred Switzers, by the aide of whom, together with an army of Lance-Knights, which he had got together, Duke Lodouicke recovered Milaine.

Soone after that, the Frenchmen being come with a puissant Army to besiege Nouars, the Switzers that were then in Garrison, perceiuing it to bee a place, not of defence, nor well munit, nor wherein they could any way resist the enemy; agreed to depart, and repaired home to their owne country. The Duke tooke the habite of a Switzer Soldier, and mingled himselfe among the rest, only to escape: but happening to be knowne and discovered, by a certaine man named Turman (who afterward was hewed in peeces) he was taken and led prisoner into France, and kept in the Castle of Loches. great wrong to the Switzers, that impute to the whole Nation, the faulte of one man onely. If they will charge all them that were with the Duke, because (maulgre his will) they composed with the French: yet (for all that) they must not couple the whole Nation of Switzers, with them in that action. Considering, they that did the deede, were not sent by their Cantons, to succour Duke Sforzza; but followed his faction, against the Edicts of their Lords. Hereeto may be added, that they appeared not to be partiall, or hare-brained in the busines, when they departed by composition.

In the same yeare, when these things were done beyond the Mountaines; Huldreich, Duke of Wirttemberg, made an alliance for twelue yeares, with the common-wealth of the Switzers. In like manner, the Emperor Maximillian renewed the hereditary alliance, made formerly by Duke Sigismund, with the cantons of Zurich, Berne, Vri, and Vnderwald. In the yeare, one thousand, five hundred and one, two potent cities on the Rhine, namely, Basile and Schaffhouse, were ioyned to the number of the Switzers cantons.

CHAP. XI.

Of the City of Basile, and diuersity of opinions, how it receiued that name: As also the originall and antiquity of the City.

*A people of Belgia, neere

Rhene.

HE City of Basile, capitall & cheefest in the country of the * Rauracians, is the very greatest of all the cities and townes in Sweetia. It is not knowne at what time it was first of all built. Amianus Marcellinus maketh mention in his history of it, calling it Basilica, and testifieth, that the Emperor Gratian erected a Fort hard by it, to bridle the courtesies of the Allemans. There are some other, who do thinke that it tooke name of Basilica, Mother of the Emperor Iulian. Phlegonius, the enfranchised seruant of the Emperor Adrian, maketh mention of Basilica, in a little Tract which he wrote of admirable things, and of people that liued long: but it is not well knowne, whether hee meant this city or no, whereof we now speake. But the opinion of them is most probable, that hold the city of Basile to take name, from one of the Romane Colonies, sent by Augustus into the country of the Rauracians, before named.

But Basile is in the number of the free cities of the Empire, and hath obtained (for very long time) verie franke and liberall priuileiges, from the Romane Emperors. The Bishopricke and Vniuersity encreased the renowne thereof. And as it is a neighbouro to the Switzers, so hath it bene likewise very carefull for maintaining it selfe in amity, long time before it came to bee allied with them. For after the Pope had excommunicated the Emperor Lewis of Bawaria (in which case all Germany was combusted with great troubles) they of Basile made alliance, and promise of mutuall succours, with them of the three first Cantons; and afterward, in the yeare, 1327. with Zurich, Berne, and many other cities and townes of Germany. In the yeare one thousand, three hundred, forty five, they made a particular alliance (for 2 yeares) with them of Zurich, and then renewed it for three yeares after. Againe, in the yeare 1365, by the procurement of Leopold, Duke of Austria, an Army of Englishmen came and forraged the country of Halstatia, besieged Strasbourg, and threatened Basile with the same behavior, because the citizens of the lesser Basile, engaged by the Bishop to the Duke of Austria; would not submit themselves wholly to his will.

On the other side, Basile being not strong for resistance of an enemy, by reason of an earth-quake, which had cast downe the walles and many houses, and fire had consumed and done as great harme: Zurich, Berne, Lucerna, and Soleurre sent a strong Garrison to Basile: so that the Englishmen durst not besiege the city, but retired thence, because the Emperor Charles the fourth, also brought an Army against them. In like manner, in the warre of them of Basile, against Katherine of Bourgongne, the widow of Leopold, in the year one thousand, foure hundred, and nine, the Bernians & they of Soleurre sent succour: the other Cantons employing themselves carefully, to accord them with the house of Austria. Moreover, at the time of the councill of Basile, when as Lanes the Dolphin of France, brought a great Army into Germany, to breake the councill, and made warre on the Switzers, by the instanc & working of the Duke of Austria, who had procured him to come: the Switzers maintained and defended the city and councill, against the encountering of a strange enemy; as an example very remarkable, it being not above sixteen yeares, since they had cooped with great troops of the French. True it is, that they all (well neere) lost their lives there: but yet they did fo weaken their enemies troops, that he tooke part with the which fled fastest.

They being thus auoyded, the men of Basile ioyned their forces with the Switzers, and so made warre together on the Duke of Austria. In like manner, when Charles, Duke of Bourgongne, made himselfe so terrible, and affrighted all the world, they of Basile ioyned in alliance (for ten yeares) with Strasbourg, and other cities on the Rhene. Afterward, with Sigismond, Duke of Austria; René, Duke of Lorraine, and with the Cantons. In this warre they shewed themselves both faithfull & valiant, for their confederates. Finally, a great warre being moued betwene the Emperour Maximilian, the Switzers and Grisons: they of Basile remained neuters, without giuing succour to eyther side, nor receiued their Garrisons; but they furnished them both with victuals and munition. In this war there was a battaile giuen (almost) against the walles of Basile, afterward at Dorneck, where the Switzers wonne a faire victory ouer the enemies, whom they did beat backe to the gates of Basile. But during all this war, the citizens of Basile fauoured equally both the one and other side. To conclude, by the diligence of Lodouico Maria, Duke of Milaine, the Ambassadors on both sides met at Basile, & peace was made betwene the Emperour and the Switzers.

The Switzers allowed well of this expedient, in the men of Basile during this warre, and the Emperour Maximilian (for his part) seemed not to improoue it. But the Noble-men, who were deadly enemies to the Cantons, held Basile (almost) in the ranke of a foe, because the city did not then shew it selfe openly, as an enemy to the Switzers; and not onely the subjects to the house of Austria, but many more, who till then had beene citizens; with-drew themselves to the Count of Ferrara, and about Montbeliard, into Halasia, and to Brisgow, countries appertaining to them of Austria. Being in those places, they ceased not to outrage (both with words and deeds) the inhabitants of Basile, who being moued with such indignities; the yeare after the war ended, to wit, one thousand, five hundred and one; made a perpetuall alliance with the Cantons, and so were left in peace with their neighbours, who stood in awe of the Switzers succour.

CHAP. XII.

At what time Schaffouse was receiued into the number of the Cantons; and the antiquity thereof.

*S*chaffouse, accepted the very same yeare, to be numbered among the cantons, is not of so great age and antiquity. It is seated on the Riuer of Rhene, within Germany, and yet notwithstanding, the Bridge is in Sweita. In the time of the Emperour Henry the third, the Counts of Nellenbourg builded there an Abbey, which standeth yet to this day, and it is thought, that it gaue a beginning to the citie: as likewise the cities of S. Gall, Lucerna, and many more in Germany, haue deriued their originall from Abbeyes. The Rhene is also another cause of the cities encreasing, continuing so for some thousand of yeares since, beneath the citie, where wherewith it is (in a manner) enclosed. It falleth downe from a very great height, with such a dreadfull noyse, and remouing vp againe into the ayre so vehemently, that it maketh there a continuall fogge or myst. And for this cause, and the vncapableness of any Boats to passe there, all such as descend downe the Lake of Constance, and from Cella on the Rhene, are constrained to discharge at Schaffouse, which hath beene conceived by many, to giue that name to the City, to wit, of a Squisse, or of a Boate, which the Germanes call Skiff, or Schiff, thence to be termed Schaffouse. Neuertheless, the vulgar sort, taking vp a false etymologie of the word Schaff, which signifieth a Sheepe; haue grounded their opinion strongly thereon, and forged Armes also of the same nature. There is a great tole or custom gathered in this City, especially for the passage of Salt: which appertained in ancient times, and before the foundation of the City, to two Noble Families, to wit, of Turn, and of Stad, which remaine yet to this day at Schaffouse.

At the beginning, the principall dominion or sway of the City, belonged to the Abbot, who elected and chose one halfe of the Magistrates; but (by little and little) they exempted themselves from his gouernement, and obtained many good priuiledges and franchises of the Emperours. But Lewes of Bauaria (weakened by long warres) could not pay the Duke of Austria, such monies as he ought him, according to an agreement made betwene them, which caused him to alienate and sell Schaffouse, together with some other Townes, and so (by that means) it became dismembered from the Empire. After that time, Schaffouse remained subiect to the Dukes of Austria, for the space of fourescore and five yeares, euen vntill the councill of Constance: for then Fredericke of Austria, because hee brought Pope Iohn the two and twentieth out of the councill, was banished by the Emperour Sigismond, who caused him to bee so narrowly pursued, that all his goods were partly pillied, and partly confiscated to the Empire, without any other meanes of helpe.

In this warre, Schaffouse became re-ruined to the Empire; and the citizens (hauing giuen a good summe of money, to the Emperour) obtained great priuiledges vnder Letters patens: and therein was plainly expressed, that (thence forward) their City should not any more be alienated from the Empire. But Fredericke the third, of the house of Austria, being Emperour: laboured to subiect it againe, and that the city of Schaffouse might remaine to his successors. And therefore hee permitted Duke Sigismond, to compell the citizens to sweare fidelity to him; which they refused to doe, but with exception of their priuiledges, and they would not receiue the Princes Ambassadors into the city, but vpon that condition. Contrariwise, the Ambassadors pressed them earnestly, to oblige themselves to the Prince, without any exception, and propounded certaine Articles, for the maintenance whereof, they required oath: threatening the citizens with very great harmes, if they would not yeelde to that which they demanded of them.

The men of Schaffouse, seeing the Ambassadors persist still in their opinion: to make good their owne parr, receiued the Switzers Ambassadors into their citie, and made alliance (for some yeares) with them of Zurich, Berne, Lucerna, Suits, Zug, and Glaris, so that the Ambassadors of Austria returned backe, and performed iust nothing.

Before this, they of Schaffouse were in good amity with the Switzers, and from the yeare, one thousand, three hundred, forty five, made alliance (for some time) with them of Zurich. But because they were subiects to the house of Austria, against whom, the Switzers had (well neere) continuall warres: they could not then entertaine firmly this amity, but were compelled, to go in war against the Switzers, vnder the Ensignes of the Austrians. But after this last alliance, they were very good and faithfull friends vnto the Cantons, and bare them company in many warres and battailes. For immediately after the alliance (till then) had not any particular acquaintance.

The tenour of this alliance, is (almost) answerable to that of the ancient Cantons. For in the first place, they binde themselves to aide one another. Afterward, they establish a forme of judgement, for reconciling or auoyding such differences, as should happen between them of Schaffouse and the Cantons. Then followeth in what manner debts ought to be paid, & what meanes are to be vsed in such cases. Then for the punishment of homicides, or men-killers. The last Article concerneth the new & ancient alliances, to wit, the one side shall make no new alliance, without the will and consent of the other: And that the ancient alliances shall alwayes be esteemed of most advantage, & to preceede all the other.

After all this, the warre of Bourgonne hapned, and some yeares consequently, that of Suba, moued by the Emperour Maximilian, against the Switzers. In both these warres, they of Schaffouse did their duty exceeding well, furnishing men and money for the weale-publike: by which meanes, they entred into the good grace of the Cantons, much more then ever they did before, and wonne great honour. Also, the yeare after the last warre, to wit, 1501. they made perpetuall alliance with the Switzers, and were enrolled in number of the Cantons, obtaining the 12. ranke or roome.

Naples, vnder King Charles the eight: so their fortune proued little better in this last warre. They, who (during the first warre) were left in Garrisons, in strong places and Fortresses of the Kingdome; dyed of diseases for the most part. Such as escaped in this warre, in recompence of their traualle, brought home to their owne houses, that villainous contagion of the Pockes, which afterward was tearmed the Spanish disease, the Neapolitane cull, and the French Pockes: At the last war they were ouercome in two batailles, and lost a great number of their men. The yeare 1507. the Cantons sent succour vnto the King, who (by their meanes) made himselfe Master of the field, which the Genewayes had planted in a Mountaine, that commanded ouer their city, which (soon after) yielded it selfe.

At the same time, the Emperour Maximilian demanded men of the Switzers, and they promised him a leuue of 6000. men, provided, that he should not leade them against the King of France, their alie: but because he would not accept this condition, the leuue remained, and was not made.

Soone after, to witte, in the yeare 1509. the league of alliance betweene the King of France & the Switzers,ooke ending, and the Emperour, Pope Iulius the 2. the Kings of France and Spain, leagued themselves together, and made warre on the Venetians, wherein the Switzers serued the King of France for wages. The yeare following, Pope Iulius made alliance with the Switzers, by the meanes of Matthew, Cardinall of Sion, who immediately after the alliance concluded, led sixethousand Switzers into Italy; vnder pretence of defending the lands of the Church, against the Duke of Ferrara. But his true intent was, to surprize and expell the French out of Milaine. The Switzers hauing discovered his purpose, would not follow the Cardinall against the French, and their Lords had likewise forbidden them: so that the Pope sent them into Suetia, without paying them their wages, wherat they were very highly discontented.

In the yeare 1511. perpetuall alliance betweene the Switzers, the houses of Austria and of Bourgonne, was renewed. On the other side, the Ambassadors of France desired the Switzers to renew the alliance with their King: but the most part of them were displeased, because so soone as the first alliance was expired, the King had denied them all their payes and yearly pensions.

And albeit that a very great number among them, were no found well-willers or friends to the Pope, who likewise had not payed them: yet notwithstanding, fearing lesse hee should excommunicate them, they durst not alie themselves with the King of France, who then was enemy to the Pope. Hereupon, hapned a disgrace to be done them by the French, for they had taken at Lugano, a Herald of the Switzers, with letters from the Seignieur about him: first, they drowned him, and to despight the Switzers, the Coate of Armes, which the Heralds and Officers to the Cantons vse to weare, they sold at open port-sale, or out-cry, as we commonly call it.

The Switzers, in the very strongest of winter, led their Army ouer the Alpes, where hauing burned some Villages, they returned backe againe, without performing any other memorable deed. But the yeare following, Pope Iulius (who had lost a great bataile at Rauenna, at encountering there with the French) called them to helpe him, and therefore they sent into Italy, an Army of twenty thousand me. They being ioyned with the Venetians (then reconciled to the Pope) tooke at their artiuall Cremona and Paula, driving the French out of the whole Dukedome of Milaine, so that nothing remained to them, but only the Castle of Milaine. In regard of these worthy exploits, the Pope gaue the Switzers the title, of Defenders of the Church; enriching their Standards with diuers Images, and publicly gaue to the whole Nation of the Switzers, two great Standards, which they call, Paner, that is, The Sword and Bonnet, as a noted mark of liberty. Maximilian Sforza, re-established in his paternall domination by the Switzers succour: made alliance with them, and gaue to the Cantons Lugano, Locarno, Mendrisin, and the Vale of Madia.

He gaue also to the Grisons, their confederates, the Vale Telina or Volturna. Likewise Charles, Duke of Satouye, whose predecessors had particular alliance (long time before) with some of the Cantons:

made alliance with all the Switzers, for 25 years after following.

In the same year, the King of France solicited the Switzers, to become againe allied with them: but because hee would not set free the Caste of Millaine, and some discovery was made beside, that his Ambassadors laboured to corrupt some particulars by gifts, and to buy their voyces for faire money layde downe; they were commaunded to depart out of the Leagued countries; and so the warre was renewed again. For the King sent a great Army into Italy, under the conduct of the Lords of Triunife and Trimouille, who besieged Maximilian Sforza in Novara. Hee was then accompanied with foure thousand Switzers, to whose ayde, eight thousand more were sent. Their vanguard being arrived at Novara, and they within being ioyned with them, they gaue the battell to the French, vanquishing & drifiting them out of Italy. Guichardin the Italian, an Historian much renowned, writes that the Switzers won such honor by this victory, as many have made no difficulty in equalling this happy successe of theirs, with (almost) all the braue exploits of the Greekes and Romanes. Notwithstanding, the field was deere enough bought by them, because fourteen hundred Switzers were there slaine, and the most part of them by the Cannon, before that they could come to handye strokes. Which made the people of Suetia to murmur in many places, and all blame fell on them that tooke part with the French: so that diuers withdrew themselves from Suetia for a time onely, and two only had their heads smitten off in those mutinies and commotions: for the rest, all was well pacified, without any effusion of blood.

After this victory of the Switzers, the Emperor Maximilian, quitting the amity and alliance of the King: aduised the Switzers, to enter France by Bourgongn, with an army of six thousand men; where (wel-neere) sixteene thousande other voluntary ioyned themselves, together with some troopes of horse belonging to the Emperor, vnder the conduct of the Prince of Wirttemberg. There they besieged Dijon, the capitall City of all Bourgongne. But the Loide of Trimouille, an olde Capitaine, being not of strength to defend well the place, agreed with the Switzers, on conditions, that the King should acquit whatsoeuer he pretended to the Dukedome of Millaine, and paye them (at certaine appointed times) fixe hundred thousand Crowns for assurance whereof, he gaue them foure Lordes of marke, as hostages, with whom the Switzers departed thence immediately.

Nowe, although it was a matter most palpable and notorious to all men, that this composition warranted the kingdom because that Dijon being taken, the Switzers might haue run vp so farre as to the gates of Paris, or ioyned themselves there with the English; and beside that king Leues hadde not a sufficient Army to make head against them; yet notwithstanding, he would not ratifie his composition. For he would not admit (by any meanes) that his rights to the Dukedome of Millaine, should be so much as talk of. The Switzers seeing themselves thus handled, and highly offended with such slye trickes: threatened to kill the Hostages, except the confirmation might be brought within a certaine time. Neuerthelesse, the winter grew extreame vpon them, and yet they refused to re-enter France in the month of Nouember: But the King sent his Ambassadors, who laboured (by all meanes) to make a perpetual peace with the Switzers. In the meane while, they could no way ioyn, because the conditions which the King propounded, were very unreasonable: which was the cause that the time spent it selfe in dayes and deliberations, in meere talke and friuolous disputes, whereby the enterprize of marching into France, was quite broken. Concerning the rest of these meetings and assemblies, they were thus considered on, that in the month of December, the same year, they of Appenzel were added to the Cantons number, and held the thirteenth place.

CHAP. XIII.

Of the Originall of Appenzell: how it took that name. The Lawes, Customs, & manner of gouernment there obserued.

Appenzel is the name both of a Country, and of a Village. The country is situated somewhat about S. Gall, between the high Mountains, and on the Frontiers of the Grisons country. The inhabitants liue (scatteringly) in Villages, and among the number of them, there are eight chiefe and principal, which haue euery one their Temple or parish church.

The maine head of all is the village of Appenzell, whereof all the rest of the countrey beareth name. This Countrey was sometimes vnder the gouernment of the Abbots of saint Gall, and because they alwaies vsed to dwell in the chiefe town or village, wher they builte a very strong Castle, named Clawx: the village was therefore cald Appenzel, which in Latine is, Abbatis Cella: that is to say, The Chamber or dwelling of the Abbot.

The people of Appenzel aimed at liberty, first by armes, and after peace made, they bought liberty for themselves & their children, by meanes of a great sum of money, which they paid to the Abbot. They had wars which continued seuen yeares, against Cuno de Stouffen, Abbot of S. Gall; to whom the towines about the Lake of Constance, and belonging to Frederick D. of Austria, the bishoppe of Constance, the Count of Wirttemberg, & many Counts & Gentlemen gaue succour. Yet they of Appenzel would not yeild themselves for all this, but being ayded by the Citizens of S. Gall (who at the beginning, were partakers with the Abbot, but afterward ioined with them of Appenzel, won som battels, tooke fise Townes, and more then sixty Castles, part whereof were quite ruined. In this war, they leagued themselves with the Switzers, who were enemies vnto the house of Austria. Some say, that they allyed themselves with Suits and Claris onely; but others doe maintaine, that it was with Lucerna, Vri, Suites, and Vauderwald. This Warre tooke ending in the yeare, 1408. and by meanes of the Emperour Emper, agreement was made between them of Appenzel and their enemies, in the City of Constance.

This being done, the men of Appenzel framed a forme of gouernment to themselves, which yet they hold vnto this day. For till then, each village had her ensigne, and her estates apart, or by it selfe. Now there was but one Ensigne, one assembly of their estates, and one Council, composed of the most honest people, and the notable persons in all the Villages throughout the countrey. Then three yeares after the peace was made, the Abbot of Saint Gall attempted a new suite against them: but then they made alliance with Zurich, Lucerna, Suits, Vauderwald, Zug, & Clar, which so offended the Abbots of Saint Gall, as, about the yeare one thousand foure hundred twenty fise, Henric Mansdorf (then Abbot) prevailed so far, that they of Appenzel were proscribed by the Emperour, and excommunicated by the Pope. Banishment was no great hurt, or inconuenience to them in any manner whatsoeuer, because the countrey (being round engirt with Mountaines, and not Trafficking almost with any bodie) no inuasion could bee made vpon them. As concerning the excommunication sent from the Pope, they refused in an assembly of all the countrey, not any way to care for it. And therefore they expelled all the priests (that obserued the command of the Pope) out of their Countrey, and would not permit them to administer the Sacraments: amongst all which they killed but one.

The Abbot of Saint Gall, perceiving that this course did him not any seruise; and that (on the other side) the men of Appenzel ranne verie fiercely vpon such, as durst teagme them to be excommunicate, and ruined the Castles of manie Gentlemen. Finally, by helpe of the Bishoppe of Constance, and the Noblemen of Sabab, hee accused them before the Electours of the Empire, imploring theyr helpe and aide in this extremitie. The Electours sent to the Switzers, and to

But the Switzers would not make any war on their neighbours and fellow citizens: but rather laboured to make peace, which was agreed on foure yeares after this ex-communication, the men of Appenzell hauing bene (before) overcome in two encounters, by the Count of Toggenbourg.

This peace lasted not long, for the Gentlemen, neighbours to Appenzell, about the Lake of Constance, assembled a great number of horsemen, wherewith to invade them of Appenzell. But they disappointed their hope, and got before them; possessing themselves of Rineck, & of the Vale of Rhegnsee, in the year, 1445. The Lords of Hagenwil, who helde that country in pawne or pledge: caused them of Appenzell to be censured with banishment, by the Imperiall Chamber established at Rotwil. But gaining nothing by the bargaine, they solde them their right, for the summe of fixe thousand crowns, and tooke off the censure. In the year, 1452. they made perpetuall alliance with seauen of the Cantons, and (after that time) ioyned themselves with the Switzers, in the warres against the Dukes of Austria, of Bourgonie, and the league of Susa, wherein they shewed themselves both faithfull and valiant. CHAP. XV.

Concerning the alliance made betwene the five last Cantons; And a breuiste of their Articles, binding them together in confederacy.

ALL the latter cantons, except Rafle, long time before their receiuing into this ranke, were allied to the other ancient Cantons, and then afterward, at sundry times they were receiued and numbered with the cantons, according as wee haue noted already.

Now those Cantons doe hold this right about their confederates, that they deliberate, and giue aduice in their dayes of consultation, for all occasions concerning (in common) the common-wealth of the Switzers. They haue a share or part, in all commodities and discommodities of the comminality. They gouerne (in equall authority) all the Baluicks by them obtained, and partake equally and publicly, all booties gotten in warre. For the rest, the Articles of alliance of the old Cantons, and latter with the first, are almost alike.

The first and principall Article, concerneth mutuall succour or assistance, wherein there are diuersity of clauses. The Cantons which shall be called, ought to succour their associate or companion, without any fraud or delay. If a Canton be so suddenly engirt by the enemy, as he cannot call the other, neither by Letters nor Ambassadors; yet shall not they forbear (for all that) from giuing succour, and in as speedy manner, as if they had receiued expresse aduertisement. If the latter Cantons doe conceiue, that a wrong is done vnto them; yet notwithstanding, they shall moue no war against any person, without the will and consent of the olde Cantons. If their enemies will debate their cause in iustice, and accept the Switzers for their Iudges, or others of equall and indifferent iudgement: the Canton may not attempt to pursue his right by Armes. Euery one of the Cantons, at their owne charge and expences, shall come to succour the other, and send such numbers of men as they would haue, and according as they shall see it commodious, wherewith the other Canton must content it selfe. In like manner, the limits are prescribed, wherein the auncient Cantones stand bound to send helpe to the new: And the limits are the confines of the Cantons, as they then stand. There is likewise mention made, concerning charges and expences, at the besiedging and battering of Townes and Castles. And the Lawes agreed vpon at Stantz, touching the partage of booties, which also are herein confirmed.

Moreover, there is mention made, concerning actions in cases of injuries betweene particulars, and what Iudges they are to take note of in that kind. Then for the exacting of names: Concerning commerce, and free Traffike, and what bargaining ought to stand free for buyers, as well on one part as the other. That no Canton shall receiue the citizens and subjects of another Canton: till they be first left at liberty, by them vnder whose dominion they were before. That the new Cantons shall not make alliance with any whosoever, without consent of the olde Cantons. If war is moued betweene the old Cantons, the latter shall remaine as newters, and labour onely to agree the parties. Each Canton shall keepe his or her ancient priuiledges, rights, and customes in their true integrity.

Behold the principall conditions of the latter alliances, wher namely it is decreed that the new Cantons shall not moue any warre, without aduice of the old, neyther refuse that which is right, nor any honest condition of the country, and other such like things, concerning warre, are established fully. And because that the most part of the latter Cantons, are vpon the limits and euen out (as it were) of Smetia; they ordained, that no one shoulde attempt to make any warre, except it were for some matter of very great importace: and so much the rather, because it is very hard to conduct and maintaine an army in those quarters.

CHAP. XVI.

Here we are to speake of the Switzers wars in Italy, when the French undertooke to recover the Dukedome of Milaine, &c.

The death of Lewes, the 12
K. of France,
after whom succeeded Frances de Valois.

N the yeare of our Lord, one thousand, five hundred, & fiftene, King Lewes the twelfth dyed. He had newly fought by his Ambassadors, the amity and alliance of the Switzers. Neuerthelesse, in the meane time, he made great preparation for war, pretending to recover the dukedome of Milaine. Frances de Valois, his kinsman, and his sonne in law, came after him (as successor) to his crown; who following the deliberation of his father, had also his minde and eye fixed on the Milaneses. The Switzers (on the other side) allied with the Emperour Maximilian, Ferdinand King of Spaine, Sforza Duke of Milaine, and with Pope Leo the tenth: undertooke to defend Milaine against the French. Wherefore, after they vnderstood the King of France his preparation they sent (at their first leuy) six thousand men to the Duke of Milaine. Afterward, the tenth of Iune, they made another leuy of 13000. men, which they sent also to ioyne with the first.

King Frances passed ouer the Alpes in the meane while, by vnaccustomed waies, shunning the Garrisons of the Switzers, which were vpon the vusual passages, and entred into Italy, with an Armie verie potent, of French and Germanes. This was the reason that the Cantons sent twelue thousand men more thereto, so that the campe of Switzers onely, consisted of one and thirty thousand men. Now, although the Kings troopes were well provided and reloued, yet they would not hazard any thing, nor set vpon so great an Army of Switzers as being such indeed as hardly (at any one time) had so manie euer before bene in the field. Here vpon by their Deputies, they began to treat on peace with the Colonels of the Switzers: who likewise (for their part) were not far off from it in disposition, because they considered, that their confederated princes did not march on roundlie with them.

For first of al, their wages was not paid them, according to promise. Moreover the Emperour had not sent his companies of horsemen, as he stood bound to do by the confederacy. And contrarywise, he had not prohibited the Lance-Knights (which hee might haue done in regard of his authority) from going in seruice with the King: but suffered them (by troopes) to depart from Germany, and enter into France. Finally, although the forces of the Pope and King of Spaine were neere-

yet notwithstanding, they could hardlie be perswaded to passe the Pas, and ioine themselves with the Switzers. Beside, there were messengers going and coming betweene the French and them, & from them to the French. Wherefore, the Switzers seeing themselves without money, and forsaken of their Confortes: made peace in the village of Galleras, with the Deputies to the King of France, vnder honest conditions. Which having bene confirmed by some Cantons, immediately twelve thousand Switzers took their way to Coma, and returned home to their country, without tarrying for the rest, who likewise prepared to depart the next morning. But the Duke of Millaine would not accept the conditions of this peace; and the Cardinall of Sion, (a great and perpetuall enemy to y French) laboured by oblique meanes, to break & frustrate all.

It came to passe, that by cunning tricks and ployes, the thirteenth day of September, the Switzers of the Guard to the Duke of Millaine, and some others beside offended with the King, in the night time brake in vpon the French, sending worde instantly to aduertise their companions, in what danger they were, and incited their present succour. The other, imagining that it would be a great shame vnto them, to forsake their friends in such a neede, and being made to belecue with all, that the French had begunne this boyle, went with all their troopes to assist them. The fight was very sharp on all sides; but the night parted them. In this charge was slaine Frances, the Lorde of Bourbon, the Lord of Imbercourt, also the Count of Sancerre, the Prince of Talemand, sonne to the Lorde of Trimoille, the Lords of Bussy d'Amboise, and manie other: which made some to holde opinion, that the Switzers were Maisters in this conflict, and a brute ran thorow Italy, that they remained conquerours. But the very same night, the King hauing mounted his Artillerie on their carriages, leuelled the battalions of the Gascoignes and Germaines, re-assembling the horsemen of their Regiments, and sending Bertolomeo d'Aluiana with the Armie of Venetians: very early in the Morning, he gaue battaile to the Switzers, whom he vanquished, after they had lost manie of their men.

The Switzers seeing the victory in a contrary hand, withdrew them-selves to Millaine; yet in such sort, that their retreat fauoured not of flight. For, they brought backe the Artillery which came out of Millaine, and marched in ranke of battaile, hauing their wounded Men in the midst among them, and going but a very softly pace: yet in all the French Army, not a man, eyther Horse or Foot, durst pursue them. On the morrow, hauing left the Duke of Millaine fiftene hundred men, to strengthen his garrison in the Castle, they returned into Swetia, by the way of Coma. But, by reason of their foile, the French recovered the dukedom of Millaine.

The Emperour Maximilian contested hardly to take it from them againe, & the yeare following, he ledde into Italy (to effect that hope) an army of Germans and Switzers: but he could doe nothing, and so was glad to come backe again immediately. As for the King of France, hauing well felt how deare a price this victory cost him: he neuer ceased till hee hadde made peace and alliance with the Switzers in the end. Perpetuall peace, betwene the French and the Switzers, was made in the yeare one thousand, five hundred, and eightene, the last day of November: and the alliance was confirmed three yeares after, to wit, in Anno one thousand, five hundred, twentie and one. The Articles both of the peace and alliance, are set downe in their due place, heereafter following.

nefly sollicited by the rest, to ioine in this league with them: yet for all that, they could neuer bring them to the point of yeelding to this alliance. In the first place, the yeares going before, Mathen, Cardinall of Sion, who came verie often to Zurich: by his Orations and perswasive speeches, had wholly estranged them from the French. On the other side, Huldreich Zuinglius, being then a principal minister at Zurich, in his ordinary preaching and Sermons, ceased not to turne the people, from taking wages to goe in warre seruices. Shewing by arguments & remonstrances of great weight, that it was not lawfull for a Christian man, to set himselfe to sale for a price of money, and go shed the blood of such as are (oftentimes) innocents, and neuer did him any manner of wrong. He sayd, they ought to follow the manners of the ancient Switzers, who (by their manhood) had planned liberty in their country. All which while, they wholly estranged themselves from such course of liuing, their liues wer maintained by their trauell; neuer binding themselves vnto any Prince, neither hadde they any freedome that was to be sold.

And as hee had words verie readie at command; so he approved by great store of sound reasons and arguments, that such alliances did but enserue & meerely prostitute the liberty of the Switzers to forraigne Kings and Princes. So that the men of Zurich, being (otherwise) people of peace, and little addicted to martial affaires; were much moued with his speeches, and abhorred this new League. On the other side, the Captaines that hadde bene in the warres in the times of King Charles the eight, and Lewes the eleuenth, dissuaded them from the league, as being farre vnlike to the alliances with former Kings. For, in precedent times, after that the Switzers had well vnderstood & comprehended the occasion of the war; they made choise of such Captaines and soldiers as they should send to the king, according to their promise. But in the New League, the Cantons neither chose Captaines nor Soldiers, neither cared what became of all, what the occasions of the warre were, nor whether they were iust, or no. But, if the King were to deale with any people, he chose such Captaines of the Switzers as himselfe pleased, and caused them to come whether he thought good. By which meanes, the Cantons had not any power ouer their Men for warre, except they might counter-mand them, when any warre was moued in the country.

Moreover, many saide, that this new League was contrary to the ancient and perpetuall alliances of the Switzers. For, in the first Article they stand bounde, to guard all the Prouinces of France, against all enemies whatsoever they are. True it is, that the first alliances were exempted, but immediately is added, that if the ancient allies begin to make warre vpon the French, the Cantons ought to fend succour to the King, against the other: whereon ensued (as it seemeth) that if any one of the Cantons, or of the Confederates, could not haue reason (in friendly manner) of the King of France, and would pursue his right by Armes; the other Cantons are bound to warre on him, according to the new League, and contrarie to the promises of the ancient alliances.

Moreover, it is not any long time, since the Switzers denied their troopes to the Emperour Maximilian, alleading (for their excuse, because he would haue had them serue at his Coronation) that they were occasioned (for many reasons) to keepe their men of warre (as then) at home in their owne country. Therefore it appeared to them verie vnfitting, that they should then allye themselves with the King, who would make a Leuye of them, so soone as the alliance was concluded.

They conceyued also, that it would be farre off from their ancient grauity and magnanimity, if they should league themselves so stricktly with the King of France; of whom (but a yeare and an half before) they had written vnto the Electors of the Empire; that it was no way expedient that he should govern the affaires of Germanie, so that if he should be elected Emperour, they were not minded to giue him obedience. And, as concerning the commodities of the alliance, which many did make lowd proclamations of: there were others of opinion, that the profite would fall into some particular purses, and especially of such, as enriched themselves by the pensions of France; but the Commonwealth of the Switzers would be no way benefited by the bargain, as very easily was to be proved.

For in the first place, the country had no need of any strange horsemen or infantry, having worke enough to doe in nourishing their owne breed for that employment. Moreouer, the hope of helpe, and money from France, robbed the Switzers of all their true force and courage. In following the example of their predecessors, they were best to let their hope leane and rest vpon God, to serue and honour him in sincerity of heart, and vprightnesse of conscience. That not onely hope in God, would faile and diminish by such a League, but also it was to be feared, that it would very strongly break and corrupt their ancient manners, cause all husbandry to cease, giue ouer honest trades and exercises, and engender nothing but idleness. And then is easily known what followeth dissolution in diet and apparrell, drunkenness, whoredomes, adulteries, thefts, and blasphemies. For these are the fruites of warre, and the Arts that are learned in the armies of strange Princes.

For a small conclusion, the euent and successe of precedent alliances, haue both instructed and guarded many (especially the men of Zurich) to weigh well & consider on nouell combinations. For, albeit that some fewe did sufficient seruice to the nation, as that which was made against the Duke of Bourgongne: yet notwithstanding, the most part of those alliances, brought it into great extremities. Because in such strange warres they lost many of their people: or els in those countries, they were rudely hurried and agitated, by factions and seditions. For these reasons, and diuers other considerations, the inhabitants of Zurich could not (as then) be induced to ally themselves with the King of France.

But the other confederates, who were not of any such opinion, maintaine what they did, by reasons enow. First, they declared, and would prouoe it, that euery voyage in war was not condemned by the word of God: but that many holie persons had made wars; wherein they were aided and succoured by others, as in like manner they had assisted their Allies. Secondly, that the war of the Switzers was not mercenary nor vendible; because they went to the seruice of a King onely, (with whom they were ioynd by an honest alliance) with the will and consent of their Lords.

Thirdly, that if the King should moue a warre, which all men knew to be vniust; then it remained in the power of the Lords of the Leagues, to deny him succour. But if the occasion were doubtfull and vncertaine: the souldier had nothing to doe to make any curious inquisition thereof: it only appertained to the King and his Councell, to render a reason for it. Fourthly, that the Switzers Countrey was greatly peopled, but narrow, hard, & barren in many places, and could not furnish for many men with nourishment: wherefore the commodity was not to be condemned, which the King had offered voluntarily.

To these we will adde, that the Switzers ought to consider, with what neighbors they were enclosed, from wherof enuyed them, and others pryed into their Liberties: so that it was both well and wisely done, to fortifie themselves with strange succour against them, and that trust and hope in God, did not prohibit the vse of humane assistance. Also, this was a means to traine vp the Switzers in martiall discipline, which is necessary for all Commonwealths: and in regard wherof, warlike people haue euermore bene highly respected. Finally, although that some alliances haue discommodited the Countrey; yet notwithstanding, the Switzers haue sped well in the more part, especially, in those which they had with the kings Lewes the eleuenth, Charles the eight, and Lewes the twelfth. And therefore they must needs expect a happy yssue of this which they contracted with a King powerfull & fortunate.

This was the discourse then made concerning aliance with the Frenches: I learned of my predecessors, which liued in those times. The selfsame question hath bene often and seriously debated & handled, euen in my time, by men well grounded in the affaires of State, to whome (as yet) I referre the further knowledge of the case.

hitherto wee haue shewne what the Cantons & confederates are, making vp a whole body of the Switzers Commonwealth, and what hath bene the estate and condition of euery one of them before they were leagued. Also, for what causes, at what times, and with what conditions they assembled themselves in a body politike. Now we will discourse of the associates of this Commonwealth, according to the same order: and we will heere shew, wherefore, when, and vpon what conditions they allyed themselves with the Cantons. And because the City of Saint Gall was the first ranke, wee purpose to begin with them.

The City of Saint Gall took the name at first of one Gallus, a Gentleman of Scotland.

Gallus, the City of Saint Gall, was named, after the name of Scotland, or Scholl, named Colman, who came into France, and thence transported himselfe into Germany, to a place called Tuggen, neere to the River named Limagus, at the mouth of the Lake of Zurich. There he preached the Gospel with great zeale and affection, to the people of the Countrey, then bewitched with diuers kindes of Idolatry. Hee continued (soone after) at Bregents, at the mouth opening of the Lake of Constance: next, at Arbonna, and in diuers other places of Swetia, for the space of sixteene years, or thereabout. Conzo Duke of Swabia, hauing called him to bee Bishopp of Constance; he would not accept that charge: but counselled the Duke to giue it to one of his schollers, named Iohn, whom hee thought to be more fit for the place. As for himselfe, about the yeare six hundred and thirty, he retired into the Mountaines, about the Lake of Constance, into a very solitary place; and in the very same plot or square of ground, where the Cite and Abbey of S. Gall now standeth: hee builded a little Cell or house, wherein he spent the rest of his dayes, with some of his schollers, in the studie and meditation of holy matters.

After the death of S. Gall, his schollers liked well to liue in that place, and according to his manner of life: neuertheless, without making profession then of any certaine rule or order. But the Kings of France, and the Dukes of Swabia, taking delight in their deuotion, did them many kinde Offices: where by the number of these religious men encreased, & (by little and little) the small silly house of Saint Gall, became conuerted into an Abbey. For fourescore yeares after the death of S. Gall, they requested Counte Bertrand, Governor of the countrey for the Kings of France, that hee would giue them an Abbot. He sent them a Priest, named Omer, bred and brought vp in a Colledge, called Coire of the Grisons, and towards Pepin, Prince of France, to come to Charles Martell: who following the aduice of his father, established this Priest the first Abbot of Saint Gall, and then (first of all) the Monkes made profession of the rule of S. Benedict.

Gallus refused to be bishopp of Constance, and preferred one of his schollers to it.

Some former examples were not altogether warrantable.

Arguments for alliance of the Switzers with the King of France, against those formerly alleged by the City of Zurich.

After that time, the abbey became verie rich and powerfull, so that the Abbot of that place, was sette in number of the Princes. And in ancient times, he was vnder protection of the Emperours, who tooke the Gentlemen of Suaba to be Governors of this abbey. Afterward, warre being kindled betweene the Abbot, and them of Appenzel: the Monkes well perceived that their Conuent stood in neede of some good Protectours, because the Townefmen or Cittizens of S. Gall, who were (as within the abbey) ioyned with them of Appenzel, who were also fauored by many seruants of the Abbot.

For this cause Gaspard de Landberg, then the two and fiftieth Abbot (by the aduice and counsell of the Monkes) requested the Cantons of Zurich, Lucerna, Suites, and Glaris, to receiue him into their alliance: establishing them patrons, fathers, & defenders of his freedom, & of all his goods, possessions, vñances, and priuiledges. This right is perpetuall, and at all times, and as often as a new Abbot is to be elected; hee promisseth this accord, and that al the places of this Seigneury, shall alwayes lye open to these foure Cantons, and they to haue free access thither. And if difference shall happen between him and any other: he shall commit it (continually) vnto the hearing of the foure Cantons, and be iudged by them.

The successour to Landberg, named Huldreich, and fir-named Le Roux, added to this first alliance, that the foure Cantons should send (one after another) one of their Councell, that should remayne two yeares with the Abbot, to bee Capitaine of all his country. He gaue assistance in pleadings and iudgements, & the morty of all fines remained to the Switzers. Moreover, it was ordained in this alliance, that in all warres the Abbots subiects should goe to the succour of the 4. Cantons. As concerning that which Abbot Huldreich renewed, and the League also, ioyning himselfe more strictly vnto the foure Cantons, the cause was thus. Sometime before, the Cittizens of Saint Gall, they of Appenzel, and the subiects of the Abbot, had conspired together, and ruined the abbey of Rosach, which the Abbot had newly builded. So that the foure Cantons hauing sent for the other Cantons to their assistance, defeated the Abbot in his rites, and reprooued his aduersaries very stoutly. This association endureth yet to this day, and although al the Cantons are not at agreement with the Abbot, as concerning matter of Religion; yet notwithstanding, according vnto the articles of alliance, they send him a Capitaine, who manageth and gouerneth ciuill causes, conseruing (in this regard) the rights and priuiledges of the Abbot.

Covenants of alliance kept, though not in Religion all alike.

CHAP. XIX.

Of the Towne or City of S. Gall.

THE Cittie of Saint Gall, oweth her original and encreasing to the Abbey, and hath bene enfranchised by the Emperours, who vnted it to the Empire, and gaue it many priuiledges and immunities. In the time of the Emperour Arnould, the citie began first to be enclosed with walles: as fearing the courses and surprizals of the Hungarians, and both it and the Couent were vnder the Empires protection. The citie was subiect vnto the Abbey in many things: meane while, the citizens had their rites, which they augmented by their industry, & by means of the Emperors liberalities.

Now, when the number of citizens, and the riches of the Abbey beganne to increase: many debates and contentions also rooke Original, betweene the abbot and the citizens. Oftentimes, the Townes round about the citie, and the Imperial chancery, set them at agreement again. Sometime likewise, they were glad to satisfie the Abbots demands with money, and encreased their liberties, by buying their rights of him. But when they of Appenzel moued warre against Abbot Cuno de Stouffen, the men of S. Gall beganne to take part with the Abbot, and got nothing for their labour but blowes, which caused them (soone after) to make alliance with them of Appenzel. This warre being ended, and some other after, abbot Landberg, being made a fellow-Bourgesse with

CHAP. XX.

Of the Leagued Grifons.

IT is generally agreed on that the people of the Grifons are very ancient. For some ages before the birth of our Saviour Iesus Christ, the Tuscans being driven from their houses by the Gauls they possessed the Alpes, vnder conduct of their captain, named Rhatius, for whose sake they called themselves Rhatians. Heretofore this country extended it selfe greatly in length & largenes, so that the Roman Emperours made two Rhatian Provinces, named the first & second Rhatia: which comprehended not onely the Alpine regions, but also a great part of Suaba & Banaria. Now it is well knowne, that this first Rhatia beginneth at 4 soures of Rheine, & taketh a sufficient great quarter of the Alpes, and all the valleyes on both the sides. Almost all the people ther are (to this day) called Grifons; and in former times they were teamed Gris: as likewise the Allmains gaue them the same name, & call them betide, Strawpundter, that is to say, Leagued Grifons. For, in regard that these Rhatians are Leagued, not onely with the Switzers, but also among themselves, and that of verie long time, we call them Leagued Grifons, & some times the Switzers names them simply, Pundter, that is, Confederates.

Wee are to obserue three leagues of the Grifons. The first tooke name of her antiquity, and of the situation of the country: for they called it, The High League, or high Grifons. It containeth nineteene Communities or Fellowshippes, among whom (heretofore) the Abbot of Disentis, and the Baron of Rhatia, & the Count of Misauk held the chiefe rank;

but the families of the 2. latter are expired. Neuerthelesse, among them in common, they which possesse the Castle of the ancient Barons of Rhatia, are called Lords of Rhatians, a title which (some short while after) the Lordes of Marbrée took, and after them, they which are named Plantes. They of Tauferscher, Linimer, and Masoxertal are the principall people of this league.

The second is called, The League of Gods house. I thinke it to be so termed, because the bythop of Coire is comprized in this league. It also comprehendeth nineteene Communities; two whereof doe speake the Germane Language; the other, vñe the Rhatian or Grifon, which is their mother tongue, & cometh neere to the Italian. The principall people of this league are the city of Coire, which is the bishops See. Also they of Pregaul and of Engadin, out of which countries run two renowned riuers, to wit, Etich and Imn.

The third league hath ten Communities, and is called, The League of ten Iurisdiccions. Therein are comprized them of Rhuchenberg, and of Tunlesch. The former two leagues had (at the beginning) amity and alliance a certaine time, vñth the Cantons neere to them. For, in the yeare, 1419. the bythop, the Chapter, & the citie of Coire, made Alliance vñth them of Zurich for one and fiftie yeeres. Also, they were sometimes allyed vñth them of Glaris. And the Grifons of the high league, wer long time confederated with them of Vri. Then after, with them of Gods house they made a perpetuall alliance vñth feauen of the Cantons. But the thirde League is not comprized in this alliance, and yet notwithstanding do entertaine this amity and society with the confederates, euen as firmly and faithfully, as if they stood solemnly bound thereto.

First then, in the year 1497. the high league, more properly called, The Grison league, made perpetuall alliance with seauen Cantons: and the year following, the league of Gods-houfe ioyned it selfe with them, by this occasion following. Some yeares before, the league of Gods-Houfe had had certaine great differences, with the dwellers in the county of Tyrol. In the end, by the will of the Emperour Maximilian, it was decreed; that the parties should chuse an equal number of Iudges, to take knowledge of their variance, and that Thomas, Bishop of Constance, should be Arbitrator about all the Iudges. But while the Councellers to the King delayed to end this discord, the Bishop of Constance dyed: and in his stead, Maximilian subrogated Fredericke, Bishop of Ansbouze. But the Kings councellers taking no knowledge of this other Arbitrator, prolonged (from day to day) the decision of the suite, as before they had done: all this while molesting the Grisons and charging them full with nouell impositions.

They perceiving no cessation, depu- ted two of each league, and sent to Innspruck, insisting that this difference should end, according to the order of the Emperour Maximilian. Which the councellers pretended not to know, albeit diuers of them, and (among the rest) the chancellor was present when the decree was set downe. Yet notwithstanding, because the Deputies should not be sent backe without answer; they assigned a day at Velcure in Lent the next yeare ensuing. In the meane while, they of Austria planted Garrisons vpon the Frontiers, and strong Artillery in diuers places, making (vnder hand) their preparation for warre. For they had appointed that day exprefly, because they would fet vpon them at vn- awares, & verily ouerthrow the Grisons, no way standing on their guard: where- in the Bishop of Caire lent his helping hand to them of Austria. But the league of Gods-Houfe, hauing discovered the enemies intent; sent men to the cantons, who kept then a day at Zurich, and gaue them to vnderstand this eminent danger.

The Ambassadors declared, that beside the olde quarrels, new differences were moued, betwene them of Austria and the Switzers, so that there grew an appearance of warre: therefore for the profit & security both of the Switzers & Grisons, it seemed good, that they should be allied together. For by that meanes, the Grisons should easily expell the enemy out of their country: although they gaue them but little ayde, or almost none at all. On the other side, the Switzers should haue a Bulwarke to back them, and so might the more strongly make head against the enemy. The Cantons, who had bin well affected to the Grisons before, and knew those Mountaine-bred men, to bee a warlike disposed people, and how beneficiall this alliance would be both to the one and other: concluded and established a perpetuity of loue with the Grisons, in the year 14. 8. and the Moneth of December, and the Articles of the alliance are these that follow.

The Articles of alliance, betwene the Switzers and the Grisons.

1. First, that they shall be friends, & giue mutual succour one to another.
2. The second Article concerneth the agreeing of differences, which may happen betwene confederates.
3. The third is, that no man shall giue or sell away, those actions that he hath against his debtor, or the answerer, or surety for him.
4. The fourth concerneth retailles, according to one anothers trading: And to bee freely in the Markets, without standing bound to pay any new tributes.
5. That neither the one nor other side, shall make any new alliance, wherein these Articles shall be comprised, but with exceptions: And that in times of warre, the one side shall not make peace, except the other be therein comprehended also.

These are the Articles and principall points of the alliance. But the yeare following, the warre of Suaba happened, wherein the Grisons valiantly defended their Frontiers, against the men of Austria. And by the ayde of their people, many times in like manner, and by the assistance of the Switzers, diuers braue batailles were were wonne against the enemy. Yet after these victories hapning on either side, peace was (at length) made in the city of Basle, with the Emperour Maximilian; in which peace, the Grisons are also comprised. By this meanes, the beginning of the alliance was wholesome and happy to both parties, and afterward, in many wars where the Switzers were present, vnder wages of strange Princes their confederates: the Grisons alwayes marched as kinde companions with them.

It came to passe, that in the year one thousand, five hundred, thirty and one: John Iaques de Medicis, who afterward was Marquisse of Marignano, getting v- surped possession of the Castle of Musf, vpon the Lake of Coma, and hauing taken Clauenna from the Grisons, forraging the country thereof: many Cantons, according to their league of alliance, sent succour to the Grisons: by meanes whereof, the enemy was overcome at last, and driuen far off. In our time, the Grisons were allied with the French, and with the cantons of Swetia, and went to warre together for the King: yet in such sort neuer the selfe, that they send oftentimes a regiment separated of the Switzers, & which hath his Colonell & Capitaine in chiefe.

CHAP. XXI.

The Alliance of the Valaisians, or people of Valois.

THE name of Valaisians, or them of Valois, comprehends three distinct people, enclosed within the most high Mountaines, and dwelling in the Valley, from the source of Rheine, so farre as the Lake * Lemanus. They were anciently called Viberines, Sedusians, or Segusians, some say, Sebusians, and Peragrians. At this day, the Viberines and Sedusians, are called the high Valaisians, and are diuided into seuen Diocesses, or Wards of ten Parishes. The Peragrians, or lowe Valaisians, are subiects to the other: but the Bishop of Sion is Prince of all the country, hauing the souerainty both temporall and spiritual, and he is called Count, or Governour of Valois. We haue described in another Tract, apart by it selfe, not onely this Valley, but likewise all the most remarkable things of the Valaisians.

Five Wards or Diocesses of the Valaisians, made first alliance with Lucerna, Vri, and Vnderwald, in the year 1417. They were then in warre against a Bishop, named William de Raron, and his Father Guiscard, whom they had (by a popular tumult) forced from their houses. The Bernians gaue assistance to the Bishop and his Father, who were of their Bourgeoisies: And for this cause the Valaisians desiring to haue succour elsewhere: allied themselves with the fore-named 3. Cantons. Now fearing lest this might be an occasion of breeding quarrell betwene the Bernians, and the three Cantons allied with the Valaisians: the other cantons, who were as neutrals to the business, laboured so earnestly, that the difference was pacified, and the Lords of Raron re-established in their goods. Before this alliance, the Valaisians had made one (for the space of ten yeares) with them of Berne, in the year 1250. Again, after this warre, they contracted another alliance (for certaine time) with the Bernians. But in the year 1475. they made a league defensive and offensive. And in the same year when wee wrote this History (to wit, 1575.) an hundred yeares being expired, after the beginning of this league: they renewed and confirmed it on either part, by magnificent Ambassadors. Two yeares before they were leagued with the Bernians, they made a certaine agreement with them of Vri, Suits, and Vnderwald.

To conclude, in our time, vpon great differences moued, concerning matters of Religion, Ceremonies, life and manners of the Cleargy, whereof reformation was required, Swetia being diuided into contrary parts; Adrian, Bishop of Sion, and seuen Wards of the Valaisians, in the year 1533. made alliance with seauen Cantons, in the Towne of Fribourg, which Cantons made profession of the Roman Religion, as namely, Lucerna, Vri, Suits, Vnderwald, Luz, Fribourg, and Sollemre. In this Alliance (ouer & beside that which is used in the other) it was especially agreed, that they should aide one another, to maintain the vied and approued Religion, to wit, that of the Romane Church, against all them that would depriue or violence it.

CHAP. XXII.

Of Rotwill, or Rotuill.

Some haue imagined, that Taxagatium, whereof Ptolomy speaketh in his Geography, was Rotwill or Rotuill, which Glareanus calleth Erythropolis, hauing changed the Al-

man or Germane word, into a Greek word: but they much deceive themselves. For Ptolomy placeth Taxagatium in the country of the Grifons, and Rotuille is situated beyond Danubius in Germany, on the left side of the River Alera, and very neere to the Spring-head of both those Floods or Riuer. This city is sufficiently renowned among the Imperials, for therein is a chamber of the Empire, which is vulgarly called Hofricht, whereunto all the round neighbouring countries resort, for causes of appeale. Such as are contumacious, and fayle of their appearance there; are sent (by sentence of the Iudges) into banishment from the Empire. It is said, that this chamber was established by the Emperor Conrad the third, and that it is 424. yeares since.

The first alliance that they of Rotuille made with the Switzers, was in the time of the Emperor Fredrick the third, in the yeare 146. This alliance was renewed diuers times betweene them. At last, in the yeare 149. they contracted perpetuall alliance with all the Cantons of the Switzers. During the warre of Suaba, they of Rotuille (engirt with enemies on all sides) shewed themselves alwayes faithfull to the Switzers; offering them amiably and liberally all their riches and men: which the Switzers could not accept, but only desired them, to defend their city against the enemy. Now in regard that Rotuille is situated along the limits of Swetia, and that succour cannot bee brought to one another, but with danger, considering, they must passe through other mens lands: the alliance speaketh expressely, that they must be careful for drawing any warre upon them, or vpon any of their confederates.

And first of all; It is said, that they may not make war with any whosoeuer, without the knowledge and consent of the Cantons. They shall giue no succour to any person out of Swetia, without the will and consent of the Cantons. Moreover, if they would haue reason by Arms, for any iniury or out-rage done vnto the; they must attempt nothing, but by aduice of the Cantons. If their enemies will vndergoe iudgement, such as the Cantons shall thinke to be honest and equall: the men of Rotuille must also consent thereto. If warre chance to bee moued among the cantons; they of Rotuille are to follow that part, which the most part of voyces do allow. The cantons are to conuerue (with all their power) the Imperial chamber of Rotuille, which (in the mean while) shall vse no authority against the Switzers, or any of them. And if any stranger shall cite or summon thither a Switzer; they are to make knowne, and he likewise, how farre he is to bee defended by priuiledge. In breefe, they are not to molest any Switzer in that iurisdiction.

CHAP. XXIII.

Of Mulhouse.

Mulhouse is a Towne in the county of Ferrara, or (as some do hold opinion) in the Territory of Basile. It is thought in ancient times it was called Aribinium. For in the Guide or Director of wayes, appointed by Antonius Augustus;

this place is set betwene Augusta Rauraca (which is Basile) and Vruncim, which some do thinke to be called at this day, Ensisheim; then Mount Brissac, Heluetum, and Strasbourg are named. In times of antiquity, Mulhouse was in number of the Imperiall townes: but the Bishop of Strasbourg was Governor thereof, also of the Towne

Towne of Colmar. It came to passe, that warre happened betwene Raoul of Habsbourg, and the Bishop of Strasbourg, wherein Mulhouse was taken from the Bishop, & the Castle ruined. After which time, Mulhouse was againe re-obtained, and numbered among the Imperiall Cities and Townes.

Her first alliance with the Switzers, was made about the yeare 1464. For in regard that the neighboring Gentlemen molested the Towne, and narrowly watched all occasions to assault it: the citizens made alliance with them of Berne, for fiftene yeares, as also with Fribourg and Sollemre, and by meanes of the Bernians intercession, the other seuen Cantons tooke the Towne into their protection. Vvhich proued so displeasing to the Noble-men, that these priuate enmities conuerted themselves (soone after) into open warre: which caused the Switzers immediately, to send and plant Garrisons in Mulhouse. Afterward, all the Cantons brought their troopes into the field, and came with great assistance to releue Mulhouse.

In the end, hauing besiedged the towne of Waldshut, appertaining to the house of Austria: they compelled the Gentlemen, to come to some equall conditions of peace. Afterward, they of Mulhouse were receiued for fellow-Bourgeses with them of Basile, and thereby more strictly vnitied to the Switzers. Nine yeares after, the 19. day of Ianuary, they made alliance with all the thirteene cantons. The conditions were all alike to the alliance of Rotuille, as well in regard of warres, as leagues with strangers.

CHAP. XXIII.

Of Bienna.

Bienna is at the ende of a very pleasant Lake, abounding with plenty of fish & round engirt (on all sides) with goodly Vineyards. It is vnder the gouernment of the Bishop of Basile; and yet it enioyeth lawes and regiment a part by it selfe, as also liberall franchises and priuiledges.

The first alliance of the Bienna, was made with the men of Berne, in the yeare 1303. to ridde the country of certaine robbers and theeues, which wandered there in so great numbers, as almost no way had any security for passage. In this alliance, they of Strasbourg, Basile, Fribourg and Sollemre were also comprized. Three yeares after, in regard of some great differences, which they had with their neighbours: they made a particular alliance with the Bernians. Their third alliance was made in Anno 1352. and fifteen yeares after, because John de Viana, Bishop of Basile, (a man of turbulent spirit) would not suffer any of his neighbours to liue in quiet: they of Bienna, desirous to provide for their owne ease and tranquility, ioyned themselves more strictly with the men of Berne, by giuing each to other the right of fellow-Bourgeses. The Bishop very angry at this vniion, mustred together some troopes of horse, and (at vnawares) ranne vpon them of Bienna, and clapt vp in prison the Authors of this association.

When the men of Berna heard of this deede, they came to succour their fellow Bourgeses, tooke (by force) the Castle, which the Bishop had in Bienna, set the prisoners at liberty, and made warre vpon the Bishop, as also on them of Sollemre, his associates. In this warre, they tooke and ruined many places, which were in subiection to the bishop.

Jul. Caesar, Lib. 1.
The situation and antiquities of Geneva.

It is neere to the limits of the Switzers, at the end of the Lake Lemanus, and an issue of Rhone commeth into it. Not only the words of Julius Caesar, but also many antiquities there found, do testifie the ancientnesse of the city. Many famous Monuments might haue bene seene there, but that the city was oftentimes ruined by enemies, and much destroyed and defaced by fire. For I finde in ancient chronicles, that in the time of Helioababul Geneua was embraced with so fierce a fire, as hardly was any one house to be found, that stood free from it. The Emperour Aurelianus restored the city againe, being so pitifully disfigured, granted it great priuiledges, and gaue it the right of fairs, and of the Empire, because it was situated most commodiously. Hee called it Aurelia, according to his owne name: but after his death, shee took her ancient name againe. Afterward, it was forraged (as many other cities were) by diuers barbarous Nations, intruding themselves into France. And some 250. yeares after, or thereabout, within the space of 7. yeares, fire tooke it in such terrible manner, as the most part of the city was quite ruined.

The Bishoppricke of Geneua, in former times had very ample priuiledges & franchises: yet notwithstanding, the citizens held their liberties to themselves, and alwayes carefully conserued theyr leagues perpetuall with the Bishop, according as they were left vnto them by their ancestors. The Counts of Geneua were great enemies to their liberties: who (neuertheless) were vassalles of the Bishoppricke, and held their Earldomes of him by fealty. So in like manner were the Counts of Sauoye; but the citizens maintained their rights and priuiledges courageously against the Counts.

In the yeare 1420. when Amias, the first Duke of Sauoye, laboured to obtain of Pope Martin, by way of entercchange, the right and superiority (as they call it) ouer the city of Geneua: the Bishop named John de Pierre-fixe, made an agreement for him, and all his successors with the citizens, that he nor they should at any time consent, that the liberties of Geneua should be exchanged or alienated. If eyther he, or any of his successors did otherwise; the citizens might hold and ranke him or them in the number of traitors and conspiring enemies. Some while after this, the Emperour Maximilian, hauing amply published his Sonne in law, Philibert, Duke of Sauoye, Vicar of the Empire in those parts: then againe, Philibert and his brother Charles, strove to subiect Geneua vnder their awe, pretending the title of this new right, and priuiledges of the Vicarship, giuen in former times to the Counts of Sauoye, by the Emperour Charles the fourth. Who (notwithstanding) tooke from Count Amias, all action, power, iurisdiction, and preheminence, ouer the city and territory of Geneua.

While these practises and conspiracies of the neighbouring Princes lasted, they of Geneua maintained themselves heedfully in amity with the Switzers, and (diuers times) made alliance with the Bernians and Fribourgers, for certain yeares. At length, they combined alliance and fellow-Bourgeship perpetually, with the of Berne, and confirmed it more strictly, in the yeare 1536. Then in regard of the religions alteration, the Duke of Sauoye, and the Bishop of Geneua, made war vpon the citizens, they being succoured by them of Berne. This alliance hath bene (since then) renewed, and many friendly motions made, to alie Geneua with the Cantons: but I know no reason, why it is not executed and done.

CHAP. XXVI.

Of New-Castle.

HE City of New-Castle, is seated in the country of the Aunisien, vpon the lake which is called the Lake of New-Castle, at the head whereof is another little Towne, called Tuerdun. New-Castle is both a city and country, and the Count thereof was chosen by succession of the Counts of New-Castle: but since, saue to the Counts of Hochberg, the Marquesse of Rozelin, and to two Dukes of Longueuille. During the warre betwene King Lewes the twelfth, and the Switzers, the men of Berne (in name

This order the other cantons continued, except that of Zurich, who hauing lost their ranke: at the returne of it to their turne againe, they should command at New-castle two yeares together.

But when the time drew neere, Jone of Hochberg, widdow to the Duke of Longueuille, preuailed so much, as (with certaine conditions) the county was surrendered back againe, in the yeare 1529. Sometime before, this county had bene allied from the Cantons of Berne, Lucerne, Fribourg, and Solleurre by meanes of some Articles, which were confirmed againe vpon this restoring or surrender. At this day, the counties of New-castle are particularly allied with the men of Berne, or the Bernians.

CHAP. XXVII.

Of those people that are gouerned (in common) by the Cantons of the Switzers.

Ee haue appointed for a third part of our Switzers common-wealth, those people that are gouerned (in common) by the Switzers.

The cause & reason of this instant argument.

It is necessary then, to say some-what of the time, and by what title, they became subiects to the Switzers. Among them there are some Townes, which wee may tearme stipendiaries: because (at their own proper costs and charges) they march along in warre with the Switzers. Neuertheless, they gouerne themselves by their owne lawes, and make election of their Magistrates; & yet the maine souerainety appertaineth to the Switzers, to whose Lawes and Edicts, those Townes stand bound to obey. Anciently they belonged to the house of Austria, but during the warres against that house, the Switzers became Masters of the neighbouring countries, and these Townes yielded themselves to them vpon certaine conditions; to wit, that they should be as well subiect to them, as to the house of Austria, their ancient priuiledges saued and excepted. Those Townes are Bada, Bremgarten, Frauenfeld, Mellingen, and Ruperswil.

CHAP. XXVIII.

Of Bada.

Bada is a Towne vpon the Riuer Limagus, or Limmathus, and so called, in regard of hot waters, whereof there are many Vells or Fountaines in that place, whereunto men and women vse to resort (in great numbers) from diuers countries. For this cause some haue called it the Towne of Baths, others, the Castle. According to custome of our Elders, who called Eaths, those places where there were hot Springs and Fountaines: so may wee tearme this, the Switzers Baths. As in Italy there are the Baths of Statiell, and others: In France, the Baths of Aix, of the Consueues, and of the Turbes. In Germany, the Baths of Spach or Spaw, and of Aix. In like manner, Bada, a Towne of the Marquise of Bada, in a certaine inscription, is named, The Bathes: And in the inscription of Wettingen, they of Bada are called, The citizens of the Baths.

This Towne is one of the most ancient of Swetia, by the testimony of Cornelius Tacitus, who tearmeth it a Towne or City, hauing in abundance, and with great pleasure, very wholesome waters. The same Author saith, that the Romans took notice of a Garrison in the Castle of Bada, and reputed it selfe to be a Garrison: for the Mountaines which close & ioine together in that quarter, do locke vp the country. To passe out of Germany and Swetia into France, and into Italy, wee must goe through Bada, then ouer the lands of Zurich; from thence into the country of Ergow, and thwarte ouer Swetia. In ancient times, this Towne had two Castles, one seated vpon an high Rocke, which is nothing now at this day, but old decayed ruines (being spoyled and defaced by the Switzers, as we shall declare anon.) And the other at an end of a bridge, where The testimony of Cornelius Tacitus concerning Bada.

Bada ioyned to the house of Austria, & reuoluted to the Switzers.

By what means Bada came into the Switzers.

A Councell of war, & their answer returned vnto the Switzers.

In the selfe same councell it was decreed, that men should not stand bound to keepe Faith with them that were called hereticks.

where (in our time) dwelt the Bayliffes or Gouernours, which were sent thither by the Cantons. Bada hath had (in former times) Counts, the race whereof are quite extinct, and their successors have bene the Lords of Habsbourg, who ioyned that Countie to the house of Austria, and diuers other goods. But from the house of Austria, Bada came into the Switzers hands, at the time of the Councell of Constance, in manner following.

Fredericke of Austria, brought Pope John the 22. out of the Councell, & maintained him against the Emperour and the Councell. For which cause, by the Decree of the Councell, he was excommunicated, banished from the Empire, and his goods confiscated. The Emperour himselfe, with an assembled Army, from the Townes and Cities of Germanie and Suaba, the Duke of Bawaria, and some others, made warre vpon him. Also commandement was giuen to the Switzers, on behalfe both of the Emperour and the Councell to assaile Fredericke with all their forces. Whereof they made refusal, alleging that they could not doe it, and their honor faied: in regard of the peace formerly made (for fifty yeares following) with them of Austria, confirmed by Oath and Letters Patents. The Fathers of the Councell made answer to this excuse of the Switzers: that Fredericke was an enemy to the Church, excommunicated and banished by publike order: This warre concerned the good of Church, who was offended and iniured (in her members) by Fredericke.

Wherefore, if in this cause the Switzers vnderooke Armes, according to the command of the Emperour, they should do a good and holy worke. They should also well consider with themselves, how much it would wounde their honour, if (in contrary opposition) they continued idle excuses, which would wrap them vp in the same censure and condemnation with Fredericke. Out and beside all this, according to the aduice of the Ambassadors of England, Denmarke, Sweden, Normay, Bohemia, Polonia, and Princes, Gentlemen, and Lawyers, the Emperour declared, that the Switzers might (with a good and safe conscience) make warre vpon Fredericke, notwithstanding the peace made. Because that the Subjects of the Empire, in all actions doe except expressly or covertly, the right and Majesty of the Emperour.

The Emperour sent a copy of this arrest and decree to the Switzers, enioyning them againe to make war on Fredericke, and by the same meanes adiudged to the empire, all that which they of Austria had engaged to them before. Promising also, not to make any peace with Fredericke, till the Switzers were first reintegrated into their former agreement. The Switzers being then perswaded with such reasons, leuiet their Armes: but because they were to Warre in the name of the Emperour, and of the Romane Emperie, they demanded wages of the Emperour: declaring, there was no reason, that they should furnish themselves at their owne charge, and the fruites of the victory fall into other mens hands; and that their wealth was not sufficient to furnish such expences.

The Emperour thought this demand to be made in equity: neuertheless, because he was somewhat empty of money, he agreed with the Switzers, that all the goodes of the house of Austria, which they possessed already, or could conquer in this warre; they should enioy it in the Empires name, vntil they should be paid their wages, and charges during the war. By especiall Letters, the Emperour exhorted them of Zurich to enter the field, and granted them (in title of Fee) the Countrey which is beyond Mount Albius, named the Free Prouince, which they of Austria held. According hereto, the yeare one thousand, foure hundred, and fiftene, about the fiftenth day of April, the men of Zurich, with their troops well prepared; went to besiege a Towne seated on the Riuer of Russ, named Mellingen and on the third day tooke it by composition. From thence they went to Bremgarten, where the Cantons of Suits & Zug ioyned with them. They of Bremgarten, (by example of the other) yielded themselves to the Switzers, vnder protection of the Empire.

At the same time, the Lucernians tooke a Towne named Sursey. The Bernians, assisted by them of Sollewre, Bienna, the Countie of Nen-castle, and some others beside, got into their power Lofingen, Arberg, Aron, Lenzbourg & Brug, to together with the countie of Ergow. As for them of Zurich, after they had taken the forenamed Townes, they besieged Bada. All the other Cantons, except Bern ioyned with them, for they of Austria held no place in Sweuia of greater strength then this: and the Garrison of Bada had much ouer-travelled the Switzers, especially them of Zurich, and this was the reason, that the Cantons resolved to force both the Towne and Castle. As for the towne, after it had bene beaten with the Cannon, for the space of three weekes, without ceasing, it yielded. But the foldiours still defended themselves in regard of the fortresse, and held out well, after reddition of the Towne. The Switzers on the other side, hauing receiued succour from them of Berne, did dayly beate the place, and pressed the Garrison to yeelde themselves. At length, the Souldiers hauing no more stones, arrowes, darts, nor any other munition proper for defence, truce being granted for some dayes: vpon condition, that if within a limited time Fredericke of Austria did not deliuer thē from this siege, they would quit the place, and deliuer the castle into the power of the Switzers.

While these things were in working; by the intercession of the Duke of Bawaria, and the Burggrau of Nuremberg, Fredericke was reconciled to the Emperour Sigismund, who sent immediately his Ambassadors to the campe of the Switzers, to giue them command for the ceasing of warre. But the Switzers feeling yet the outrages which the Garrison of Bada had done vnto them, so soon as the truce time was expired, so pressed them within, that two dayes after Pentecost, the castle was deliuered to them, which they burned and quite ruined, as soone as the enemy had auoided it. On the Morrow, the Count of Togge, Ambassadour from the Emperour, being arriued at the Switzers campe, to command them agayne, that they should giue ouer armes, found the castle to be taken and spoyled. This strooke somewhat deadly vnto the Noble mens hearts: but they had no occasion to complaine, because the Switzers had done nothing, but in case of open & lawfull warre.

Then, as the Emperour was ready to go for Spain, to fetch thence Pierre de Lune, that he might be Pope, who afterwards was called Bene the eleuenth; beeing in need of money, because his cofers were emptied (hauing disbursed great payes, without any intermission in the precedent warres, and for the affaires of the Councell) he engaged to them of Zurich, Bada, Bremgarten, Mellingen, Sursey, and the Lands to them belonging. Also to them of Berne, the countie of Ergow, which they had taken, as already hath bene declared: yet paying a great sum of crowns. At this day, the countie of Ergow is possessed by them of Berne onely. The yeare following, they of Zurich made a part to that which was engaged to them, ouer to the Cantons of Lucerna, Suits, Vnderwald, Zug, and Glaris.

From the beginning, the men of Vri would not haue any part; as thinking, that the detention of these places, contradicted the treaty of peace made with Fredericke. But after they vnderstood the reasons of their confederates, who protested (in themselves) the same desire of observing the peace: but that by command of the Emperour, and of the Councell, they vnderooke armes. Next, that by the will and consent of them both, they possessed now those places for wages, and price of warre-seruice, and held them on the faith of the Emperour, the soueraine Lorde; yet for a great summe of money, which they had layd out & disbursed. The men of Vri hauing heard these Reasons, and other of the like Nature, entred into part of this engagement. The Bernians also were receiued in at the length.

CHAP. XXVIII.

Of Bremgarten, and Mellingen.

Bremgarten is a Towne, situated on the Riuer of Russ, which encloueth it in the midst almost, in forme of a demy Island, a great Germane mile beneath Lucerna. It appeareth by the ancient priuiledges of this Towne, that it was (heretofore) numbered among the Imperials. Neuertheless, it became (afterwards) subiect vnto the Counts of Habsbourg, then to the Princes of Austria descended of them. But it is not well knowne at what time, neyther by what title, they came to make themselves Lords thereof.

A description of the situation of Mellengen.

Mellengen is a little small Towne vpon the selfsame Riuer, about half a German mile below Bremgarten. It hath alwayes beene vnder the dominion of the Counts of Habsbourg. These two Townes were taken (as Bada) in this war which the Switzers made vnder the Emperours name, and then afterward, the Emperour Sigismund pawned it to the Cantons: vpon condition, that all their ancient rights, priuileges, and customes, should remain entire, and the Citizens to yeelde the same dutie to the Cantons, as formerly they had done vnto the Counts of Habsbourg, and Princes of Austria their Lordes. At this very day, both these Townes are vnder gouernement of the eight first Cantons.

CHAP. XXX.

Of Rasperwill.

The forme & situation of Rasperwill.

AS concerning Rasperwill, it is a town on the Lake of Zurich, wherein dwelt (sometimes the Counts of Rasperwill, who had to their successours the Countes of Habsbourg, that gouerned likewise in these quarters. In the year 1458, the Switzers became masters thereof. There were then two factions in this town, the one of Austrians, and the other of Switzers. Duke Sigismund, tooke some of the Switzers partakers, and brought them as prisoners to Impruk. The rest amazed at this deede, fled into Swetia; but by entemise of the Cantons, they all re-entred Rasperwill againe. For the Cantons protested out a lawde, that they would come and assault the towne, except the prisoners might be enlarged, and the banished receiued.

How Rasperwill became ioynted to the Cantons, and so afterward continued.

It came to passe the year following, that the Switzers made warre on them of Constance, who had done them some dishonourable outrages. Peace being made, as they of Vri, Suits, Vnderwald, and Glaris returned homeward to their houses, they demanded victuals for their troopes, and passage thorow Rasperwill, which they easily obtained by the pursuite of their partakes. But being entred more strong, and in greater number then the Citizens (the most part whereof were Switzers in affection) they compelled the Citizens to sweare fidelity to them. So that from that time, Rasperwill remained in the power of those foure Cantons: who (neuertheless) left the citizens to the same liberty as they had vnder the Dukes of Austria.

CHAP. XXXI.
Of Frawenfeld.

TWO yeares after the taking of Rasperwill, the seauen Cantons then being in warre against Sigismund, Duke of Austria, tooke Frawenfeld, the chiefe town in all the country of Turgow. There were reasons and occasions enow, whereby this warre was vndertaken and attempted. The Duke had imprisoned Cardinal Cusano, byshoppe of Brescia, and because he did not release him, so soone as Pope Pius (who formerly was named Aeneas Sylvius) sent him command to doe it, hee was therefore excommunicated. But, because this Thunder-bolte did not dismay him, and he appealed from that sentence, to the next Councell: the Pope commanded the Switzers to defend the Churches rights, and to set vpon Sigismund. The Cantons, who had as much credite with the one, as with the other, obeyed the Popes command: but there happened other occasions to induce this warre.

The towne of Winterduer, in the countie of Kybourg, appertaining to the Canton of Zurich, was subiect to the Duke of Austria. There is euery year in that place a Fayre, on the day of Saint Gals, the sixte of October, whereat the Countrey people round about doe meete in great numbers. They of Kybourg being come thither, the gates vnder that against them, vpon a sinister suspicion of the inhabitants, that they of Zurich would surprize the Towne, during the Faire time, & had therefore made some preparation.

Now, as the Bayliffe established by the Canton of Zurich in those quarters, required that the Gates might be set open, and that they of Kybourg might haue free trading, according to their accustomed manner, promising that the town should

It is now called both Bada and Austria.

Violence and cruelty is deaf, and will not heare any iustice.

A new Garrison is planted at Winterduer, which soon after was besieged.

should receiue no endamage; notwithstanding all this, no credite would be giuen vnto his words. As a counter-change of this iniury, they of Zurich prohibited their people from bringing either victuals or merchandizes to Winterduer. The Duke of Austria on the other side, standing vpon his guard, placed a garrison in the towne. These things happened before the excommunication from the Pope.

But yet there was another occasion for the moouing of this warre. There were two brethren, Gentlemen of mark, of the country of Stiria, named Vigilius, and Bernard Gradler. They of Austria, had informed them from their houses, and depoyled them of all their goods: without excepting so much as the dowrie belonging to Bernards wife, who was of the house of Starckenber. After they had solicited the Duke a long time, to restore their goods againe, and neuer could obtain so much, as that hee would admit but what iustice did allow at length, they withdrew themselves into Swetia, and were receyued as Bonnegesses into Zurich. Afterward, hauing brought a little town, called Eglisow, they made warre on the Duke of Austria, assisted by the men of Zurich. The Duke placed a new garrison at Winterduer, but after the troopes of Zurich were drawne thence: some difference fell betweene the Garrison, and the inhabitants of Kybourg. So that once more they of Zurich (having demanded succour of their confederates) went forth into the field, going to besiege Winterduer. At this time then, to wit, in the year, one thousand, foure hundred and sixty, Diesenhorn, a Towne on the Rheine, in the country of Turgow, this country also, and Frawenfeld were conquered, and reduced vnder the power of the Switzers.

CHAP. XXXII.

Of the nine Baylywicks, or Gouernments.

The Baylywicks gouerned by the 7. first Cantons, and others with them.

THE common Baylywicks, are gouerned (in part) by the seauen first Cantons, and partly by some other with them. There are nine Baylywicks, or Go-uernments in all, to wit, the Countie of Bada, the three Prouinces, Turgow, Sargans, the Rheghes, that is to say, the valley of Rheine, which they call Rinthal, Lugans, Locarna, Mendris, and the vale Madia. The foure last are beyond the Alpes, in Italy, towards the Millanne: & speak Italian; the other the Germane tongue. Sargans, and the valley of Rinthal, are on the Frontiers of the Grisons: the other 3. are seated within the confines of ancient Swetia.

CHAP. XXXIII.

Of Bada and Turgow.

IN this manner (then) were the Towne and Countie of Bada, Turgow, and Frawenfeld, by the Switzers conquered; at such times, and by those means, as formerly hath bene related. The Cantons of Zurich, Lucerna, Vri, Suits, Vnderwald, Zug, Glaris, and Berne, commanded at Bada. They are Lords of Turgow, except the Canton of Berne, which hath no part therein. As concerning the taking knowledge of criminall causes, the Emperour Sigismund tooke it from Fredrick of Austria, at the time of the Councell of Constance, and engaged it to the City of Constance, which kept it till the year 1499. when the Emperour Maximilian attributed that authority to the Switzers, by a treaty of peace which hee made with them, and therefore the seuen first Cantons about named, are Lords of Turgow. But concerning the knowledge of crimes, appellations and fines or amercements, which may happen, as oftentimes they doe: that appertaineth to the tenne first Cantons, who made warre against the Emperour Maximilian, and the League of Suaba.

CHAP. 34.
Of the three first Prouinces.

NOW, to speake of the three Prouinces, which are along beyond the Riuer of Rass (to distinguish them from the free Prouince, beyond the Mountain Albins, which was giuen to them of Zurich, by the Emperour Sigismund, as we haue already declared before:) they were taken by the Switzers, at the very same time when

The manner of their Conquest hath bin already secared.

Criminal causes thus away with. Emp Signation.

The authority belonging to the ten first Cantons.

Concerning the situation and true name of the free Prouince.

The reason why the name was thus giuen them, according to the authors opinion

when Bada was conquered. Heere let me tell you, that we call certaine Castles & Villages, which lye along the River of Ruß, both aboue and below Bremgarten, free Prouinces. This name was giuen them (in mine opinion) because that the three villages, to wit, Meyenberg, Richen-see and Ergow, had anciently kept (each one) her iurisdiction, Magistrates, and Officers by themselves: so that they seemed as three feuerall Prouinces, nowe ioyned all into one. In times past, all that quarter was called the Countie of Rora, and so it was named by Henry the 5. Emperour, in a priuiledge of the Abbey of Muren. The castle belonging vnto the Countes of Rora, was in the Towne of Aron.

Some difference among the Cantons, concerning the conquest of the free Prouinces.

At such time, as (by command of the Emperour and the Councel of Constance) the Switzers made warre on Fredericke of Austria, they of Lucerna conquered those places, which are along the River of Ruß, and namely that countie of Rora. After the warre, when they contended vvhould be Lords thereof only: the Cantons of Zurich, Suits, Vnderwald, Zug and Glaris opposed against them, and in diuers dayes held at Beckenried, Vnderwald, Suits, and in the campe before Bremgarten, they shewed, that (from the beginning of the warre) the Cantons had agreed, that they should be Lords (in common) of all places in the countie of Ergow, that should be won in that Warre. Now, although the Lucernians maintained, that they had giuen charge thereof to their Ambassadors; yet notwithstanding, after the testimonies were gathered both of the one side & other, the Lords of Berne being appointed iudges of the variance, pronounced, that these 5. Cantons had part in all the country.

The Lucernians pleaded their Title in right of their Ambassadors.

Tenne yeeres after that, by consent of the fixe Cantons, they of Vri were ioyned with them, and hadde a great part also in that gouernment. And therefore Zurich, Lucerna, Vri, Suits, Vnderwald, Zug, and Glaris, are Lords thereof at this day. The country is not great; and therefore, of what Canton heeuer the Bayliffe is, hee makes not his residence there: but vvhennecessity doth so require, he comes once a yeare to iudge suites in law, and then he is lodged (most often) in the Abbey of Muren, which is rich enough, and well builded.

Vri ioyned with them ten yeeres after, & had a part in the gouernment.

CHAP. XXXV.

Of the Sargans.

A Mong the Grifons, the Sarunetes liued long time since; but at this day, both their towne and countie is vulgarly called Sargans, whereof diuers etymologies are made. But in the auncient Chartes, this Towne is named Sarunetes, which is a word deriued from the name of Sarunetes, whereof Pliny maketh mention. Now, because the dwelling of the Sarunetes was at the spring of the River Inn, where now they of Engadin and of Munsterthal make their abiding; the inhabiting Sargans (now in question) it may be, as yfused from them there: or else might take their name of the River called Sar, which runneth thorough the Towne.

In former times, this country belonged to the Counts of Werdenberg, who in that respect were called Countes of Sargans. Afterward they pawned it vnto the Austrian Princes, and at another time to the Counts of Togge, but redeemed it againe, and possessed it til the yeare 1483. And then, George Count of Werdenberg, sold it to the seuen first Cantons, who sent a Bayliffe thither each one by his turne, that commanded the whole country, & kept in the castle where the Countes were wont to dwell. As for the Towne of Sargans, although it is subiect vnto the Switzers: yet notwithstanding, it enioyeth his priuiledges, and electeth Magistrates that administer Iustice, and also deale in criminall causes.

where are Bregents and Veldene: they are yet to this day, subiects to the House of Austria. But they on the hither side, as Rhineck and Altstetten, two little Townes, and the valley tending toward the Count of Werdenberg, they are obedient to the Switzers. Heeretofore, all this countie appertained vnto them of Austria, who pawned it to the Lords of Ion. But at the time of the Councell of Constance, when as Fredericke of Austria was banished by the Emperour Sigismund: the Count of Togge, the Emperours adopted sonne, seized on this valley of Rheine, and other places belonging vnto the house of Austria, by disbursing money for them, to whom they were engaged.

Afterwards, this Count pawned this Valley of Rheine, for a great summe of money, to two Gentlemen, Huldreich and Conrad Beierer, brethren. In the yeare, 1460. Laques Beierer, their Brother and heyre, hauing some variance with them of Appenzel, and fearing his vnableness of keeping this valley against their strength: willingly solde them his rights, and resigned the engagement. After that, this valley remained in the power, and vnder dominion of Appenzel, for the space of thirty yeares, or thereabout.

But when it so fell out, that the men of Appenzel were troubled in warre, against the Abbot of S. Gall, his subiects, and the Citizens also, and the Abbey of Rosach (new built) quite defaced: the Canton'd Switzers, confederates with the Abbot, mustred vp their troops, and called their other allies to them, by whose helpe they maintained the Abbot, and condemned them of Appenzel in a great fine. Which made them to require peace, and beside, to offer them the rule of the Valley of Rheine: the possession whereof fell (as a recompence) to the Cantons of Zurich, Lucerna, Suits, and Glaris. After this, they parted with a portion of this Seignury, to the Cantons of Vri, Vnderwald, and Zug, who had assisted thie: likewise to Appenzel, who indeed wer ancient Lords thereof. So that (euen to this day) these eight Cantons, each after other) send a Bayliffe into this valley, who makes his abiding in a small Towne, called Rhineck, at one end of the valley, somewhat aboue the place, where the Rheine enters into the Lake of Constance.

FOURE Baylywicks do yet remain, which the Switzers call Baylywicks beyond the Mountaines, because they are quite ouer the Alpes. The first is Lugano or Luca, a Towne vpon the Lake, which some call the Lake of Gauna; others, the Lake of Lugano. This Lake is in the midst of two other Lakes, to wit, that of Como on the left had, and on the right hande of the Lake Maior, whereinto it shutteth vp it selfe.

The second Baylywicke, and neereft of all to this former, is Locarno: a very pleasant Towne, at the head of the Lake Maior, sometimes beautified with verie goodly and strong Castles, and accounted the cheefest in Lombardie, next vnto that of Millaine.

The Bayliffick of Mendrisa, on the left hand of the Lake of Gauna, maketh the third.

And for the last, there is the Vale of Madia, which depended heeretofore vpon Locarno, as Mendrisa on Lugano.

These foure Baylywickses fell to the Switzers, in the yeare, 1513. by the Donation of Maximilian Sforza, Duke of Millaine. For, hee hauing driuen the French out of Italy, by the counsell and authority of Pope Iulius, and being holpen therein by the Venetians and Switzers, he made a present of these foure Baylywickses (abutting on the Frontiers of their country) to the Switzers. He gaue also the Vale of Tellinoto the Grifons. But three yeeres after, King Frances hauing vanquished the Switzers at Marignano, expelled the Duke, and re-uinted to his Crowne the Dukedome of Millaine. By an accord made at Fribourg, he confirmed this donation of his owne royal authority, as his successors in the dukedome of Millaine did the like.

CHAP. XXXVIII.

Of Bellizona.

WE might ranke among these Bayliwicks of Italy, the Towne of Bellizona, which obeyeth to the Cantons of Vri, Suits, and Vnderwald. This Towne (in former times) appertained vnto the Countes of Misauk, who were reiecte by the Dukes of Millaine. Afterward, hauing found meanes to enter againe by intelligence; they sold it to them of Vri and Vnderwald. But the Duke of Millaine recovered it againe, and tooke it from the Switzers, by the same subtile tricks which the Counts of Misauk had vsed to repofesse it. This hapned about the yeare, 1422.

After that time, the Switzers made many voyages ouer the Mountraines to recover Bellizona. At length, in the yeare 1500. they got into possession of it agen. For, in regard of continuall warres betwene the Sforzates and the French: the men of Bellizona willing to provide for their owne safety, yielded themselves to the Canton of Vri. The French, becoming matters of the Millainefes, labored often (but all in vain) to regain the town. Finally, at such time as the Dukes of Millaine gaue the fore-named foure Bayliwicks to the Cantons, they were also confirmed in the possession of Bellizona.

As if Vri doe establish a Gouvernour or Baylisfe at Bellizona: Suits placeth one also in the vale Brune, and Vnderwald one at Riniera. Then beginning againe, Vri commends one to Riniera, Vnderwald to the vale Brune, and Suits to Bellizona. And because that the Bayliwicke of Riniera is of the least reuenew, most commonly, he that hath bene Baylisfe at Bellizona, is established nexte after at Riniera.

CHAP. XXXIX.

Of the Alliances made by the Cantons, with Kings and Princes neere neighbouring to them.

Demosthenes, the most eloquent of all the Græcian Orators, a man wonderfully well acquainted with affaires of State, and (aboue all) a deare Louer of his Countreyes liberty, wrote thus. Ouer great familiarity with Tyrants, should be suspitions to ciuill and free Cities: And no trust is to bee reposed in them, especially if they be neighbours, because every King and Tyrant is an enemy to liberty, and contrary to lawes. The euent and successe attending on such cases, did well witness, that this Learned man had giuen very wholesome counsell to the Athenians, yea, and to all Greece. For Phillip the sonne of Amyntas (against whom Demosthenes made head) and the succeeding Kings of Macedonia oppressed the liberty of the Greekes, by a dissembled amity, and working certaine combinations and alliances, deuised onely for their owne aduantage.

The safe standing thus, I thinke, that many stand thus amazed, what should moue the ancient Switzers to make such alliances as they haue done with straungers, Kinges and Princes, their Neighbours. But here is to bee noted and obserued, that all alliances doe not hurt one like another in a Commonwealth. They are to be mistrusted, which do import a league offensive and defensive. & ouergreat familiarity. Otherwise, for the benefite of peace, it is needfull sometimes, that Princes and great Lords nere neighbouring, should ally themselves together, for the better vse of some rightes, and the easier manning of their affaires. The ancient Switzers made many such alliances of peace and amity. And if at any time they were knit more strictly to some King or Prince, it was not inconsiderately done: but, as appeareth by the tenour of the alliances, the conditions wer such, as their liberties could no waies be easily touched or wronged.

They made diuers alliances, for a certainty of times, with Popes; as Sixtus, Iulius the second, Leo the tenth, & with Clement the seauenth. With neighbouring Princes; as the Dukes of Austria, of Sauoye, of Millaine, and of Wertemberg. Then, with the Bythoppes of Constance, the Cities of Suaba, and others on the Lake of Constance, and on the River of the Rheine. But, without staying our selues at the most part of these alliances, wee will touch those onely, which were hereditary, that continue yet, must longer continue, and are most notable among all the other. As namely, the Alliances with the Dukes of Millaine, of Austria, of Bourgogne, of Sauoye, & the most remarkable and last of all, with the King of France.

CHAP. XL.

Of the Alliance made by the Switzers, with the Dukes of Millaine.

Vncertainty of the first treaty of alliance.

Galeazzo Dof Millaine, and his Wife Blanche Maria capitulate with eight Cantons

Cannot well set downe what treaty or discourse was anciently had, and at the first time, betwene the Duke of Millaine, and the Switzers. But in the yeare, one thousand foure hundred sixty and sixe, Duke Galeazzo, and Blanche Maria his wife, made an accord and agreement with eight Cantons, vpon certain conditions: which yet vnto this day, are called, The Articles or Capitulations of Millaine. Wherein also, mention is made of other auncient capitulations, which shew and testifie, that long time before, the Switzers, especially they of Vri, which inhabit at the Alpes, had bene associates with the Lombards, vnder certaine conditions. But because the auncient Capitulations, are (almost) quite worne out of mens memories: I will propose the Summary of the accord with Duke Galeazzo, and his wife, the Lady Blanche Maria.

The Articles of Agreement, betwene the Duke of Millaine, and the Switzers.

THE first Article, concerneth them of Vri. The Ordinarie of the great church in Millaine, intended a Proceffe against them, concerning the Valley of Luiner. By this first Article, the Duke agreeth with them of Vri, to haue free possession of that valley, in the regard of ciuill Iurisdiction: renouncing his owne rightes, and promising to obtain the same of the Ordinarie.

They of Vri, on the other side, shall pay a tribute to the Duke, & euery yeare, in the Moneths of Iune or Iuly, or before midde-August, shall send him foure Hawkes, and a Crosse-bow. As concerning the difference touching the Churches reuennues, betwene the Ordinarie, and them of the Valley, each of the two parties shall nominate two Iudges, and to those foure Iudges, the Duke shall adde one, as an Arbitrator: and of him he must and will make choyse among the Lords of Councell, and in one of the seauen Cantons. These Iudges, must nominate what it is, that the Prince and they of the Valley, should pay vnto the Ordinarie. And if there happen anie variance besides, for matters of Duties not payed: they also are to censure thereupon.

The second Article is, that the eight Cantons, their subiects, and all they that haue dwelt in their countries, the space of foure yeares, shall enjoy the ancient liberty, to wit, that they shal stand exempt from all tributes, imposts, and tolls, throughout Millaine, euē in the ditches of the Towne.

The third Article, concerneth debts, and imprisonments.

The fourth is for such variances as may happen betwene the Duke and the Cantons, and of some particulars against the Duke.

The fifth, is for proceffe and suites of particular persons.

The sixth matter of free Trafficke, and that it shall bee lawfull for the Switzers, to go and sell their Wares and Cattel:

The Ordinarie of the great Church of Millaine, against the most of Vri, and vpon what occasion

Renewing & reco: firmation of these articles.	The seventh importeth, that the duke and the Switzers shall maintain and preferre themselves in good amity: and that neither party shall giue passage, or allow lodging or harbor to the enemies of neither side.	The seventh willett, that if criminal parties on either side, doe withdraw to any one of their precincts, after that they or he shalbe adiudged culpable, on knowledge of the cause: he or they shall be sent backe to their Magistrate, who is to chastise them according to the exigence of the case.	Disobedience in awards or sentence.
Freedom from Tolles.	Now, in regard that after this transaction, Millaine changed her Lordes oftentimes, these Articles haue bene also renewed and confirmed from one time to another. And finally, in the year, 1522. Ferdinando Gonzaga , Governour of Millaine , in the name of the Emperor Charles the fift, renewed this accord with the Switzers , very neere with the same conditions.	The eight is, that in such reuenews, dismes, goods mouable and immouable, which the Switzers possesse in the Duke-dome of Millaine , or which may fall to the from this time forward: they shall haue the same rights in them heere, as the Millainneses enjoy in Swetia .	Of reuenues, goods, &c. on either side.
For Bread Corne.	The Articles of Agreement, betwene Ferdinando Gonzaga , Governour, and the Switzers .	The ninth; that passe & passage may be as free and safe in the countries of each other, as formerly it hath bin, & with the like maintenance of amity.	For free and friendly passage in their countries.
A Franke is two shillings sterling.	THE first Article concerneth benefit of exemption, from Tolles, Taxes, and other charges. Item, it shall be lawfull for the Switzers , to buy any kinde of bread corne. But if there be a dearth, and the Market measure is sold for more then thirteene Francks, it is not lawfull to transport any. Neuerthelesse, for our amity with the Switzers , they may carry away two hundred measures. The Cantons did make the same condition with them of Millaine .	In the tenth, the Switzers make exception of their other alliances, & all precedent instruments: to the end that they may not derogate or faile in the fore-named conditions.	Of other Alliances.
Selling of salt.	The second, is for the selling and carriage away of salt.	In the last, the time is agreed on and prefixed, for this combination: which is, to continue for four years after the death of the Emperor Charles .	The time of this alliance.
Free passage and trading.	The third, confirmeth to the Switzers their ancient priuiledges, for going and coming freely, and trafficking through all countries of Millaine , without any need of support or safe conduct; except in the time of pestilence, and then to bee free from all Tolle, onely the gate of Atillaine excepted.	Now, although (for diuers reasons) this agreement hath not bene renewed to this instant between the King of Spain , Duke of Millaine , and the Switzers : yet notwithstanding, both on his part, and theirs likewise, ancient amity hath bene carefully kept; and euen to this day, the Switzers enjoy (almost) the same priuiledges, as in elder times they did among them of Millaine .	Of the Switzers alliance yet with Millaine .
To whom these priuiledges belongeth.	The fourth, declareth who and what they are, that must enjoy these priuiledges, wherein are (by name) excluded all Millainneses , that shall retire themselves into Swetia .	CHAP. XLI.	The time of this alliance.
For auoyding of fraud and deceit. Of the Switzers Alliances with the Dukes of Austria and Burgogne .	A strange court, that much contention should beget as many friendships.

The Emperor Sigismond, surnamed the Simple, a great enemy to the Switzers.	those alliances which haue lasted but for some few years, and agreed or combined with one or two Cantons onely; but rather will resolve my selfe on the perpetual and hereditary alliance of Sigismond , Duke of Austria with the Cantons; which was renewed afterward, by the Emperor Maximilian , Charles the fift, and Ferdinand .	deal withall by Duke Charles .	Good advice in cases of extremity, much ausile.
K. Lewis the 11. denied aid to Sigismond against the Switzers	This Sigismond , surnamed the Simple, was sonne vnto Fredericke , who brought Pope John the 22. out of the Council of Constance , whereby he was banished from the Empire. Sigismond was a great Enemy to the Switzers , and had many warres against them, wherein he was continually beaten, as at Winterdier , Mulhouse , Waldshout , in Turgow , and other places, & lost in these warres the countrey of Turgow , which is great, fertile, and well peopled, yet afterward conquered and kept by the Switzers . Seeing by Armes he could not quail the Switzers , hee withdrewe into France, and required succour of King Lewis the eleuenth, which hee was flatly denied: because the King would not entangle himselfe in warre with the Switzers , of whose magnanimity he had formerly made good proof, being Dolphin, when the battell was fought against them neere to Basile .	To be plaine, Sigismond nor the Switzers were strong enough to make head against the Duke, and therefore some men, better seene and skilful in such businesse, layd downe their opinions; that Sigismond and the Switzers were best to agree in vinity, and make war together vpon their common enemy. King Lewis the eleuenth pushed hardly at that point, and followed the matter very hotly: for it was his custome to prepare such diets for the Duke of Bourgogne , and to raise him so many enemies as might bee. To further these practices, hee sent his owne turne with a Switzer , named Iustus de Sillini , who soon after was byshop of Sion , and of Granoble also. Sigismond likewise fauored him, and gaue him as many good respects, as hee could receiue by his byshoppricks. At length also by his means, and by authority of the King, an hereditary alliance was made, the substantiall points wherof follow thus.	Iustus de Sillini, byshop of Sion & Granoble.
Sigismond engaged Ferrara to the Duke of Bourgogne.	Hereupon, he made his recourse to the Duke of Bourgogne , and pawned to him the Countie of Ferrara , and other Seigneuries on the Frontiers of Swetia , for the sum of fourscore thousand crownes: onely that he might finde busines for the Switzers , by means and help of the duke of Bourgogne . Lazius writes, that Sigismond sold Swetia to himselfe, but therein he abused himself. This engagement did not aduance the matter, according vnto Sigismond 's expectation: for Hagenbach , governor in these pawned countries to Charles Duke of Bourgogne , began to tyrannize vpon all the people, violating women and children, and putting many innocents to death. By which occasion, Sigismond being moued to compassion, and incited by the continual complaints of his subiects; redeemed the pawned countries, & conigned the money to be paid at Basile . But notwithstanding all this, D. Charles would not forsake his possession, but stroue still to hold the same by force. The Switzers (on the other side) were but crookedly	Abreuiate of the Articles of hereditary Alliance betwene the Duke of Austria , and the Switzers . The cruel and violent dealing of Hagenbach.	If any variance or contention happen betweene them: they shall pursue their right in iustice, and not by armes. The Arbitrators to iudge their causes shall be the Bishop or Cite of Constance , and the Byshop or Seignourie of Basile . And before they take knowledge of the cause, both parties shall promise to the Iudges, by authentick Letters vnder their handes: that they will beare no malice, neyther doe any outrage, what sentence sooner is giuen vpon their difference. men: provided, that it may be done with their honor, and without prejudice vnto their ancient alliances, and they are to receyue as much wages, as the Cantons haue customarily payed to their Souldiers. The same is also to be done by the Duke, if the Switzers desire any succour from him.

The Cantons shall deliuer such Charters, Letters, Registers, Bookes of reason, and other like instructions to the Duke, as are or shalbe in their hands, and belong to him; or declare to whom they haue formerly given them: onely excepted, such letters and Registers, as concerne cities, townes, and castles, which nowe are in the power and authority of the Switzers.

The Duke and the Switzers shall remaine Lords of those countries, cities, castles, Fortresses, Townes, Burroughes, and Villages as they haue taken, and now possesse; without any fauor in Law, or any kinde of quarrell to bee offered on eyther side for them; neyther shall suffer anie wrong or iniurie to be done, neither to the countries, cities, castles, &c. of one another.

Neither side shall make alliance with the other Subiectes, nor giue them the right of Bourgeship, nor receiue them in to protection to theirs damage or prejudice; except any one with all his goods retire into the country. And yet with this exception notwithstanding, that hee shall remaine answerable to the iurisdiction of his first Lord. But if any such person do pursue his intention by violence, they among whom he hath retreated him selfe, shall present him immediately in iustice. Because neither the Duke, nor the Cantons ought to lodge, maintaine, or fauour (in any kinde whatsoever) the Enemies of one another.

The Duke shall make satisfaction, for the transaction of Waldshout; wherein the Switzers shall assist him with all their forces.

The one shal not greue or offend the other, by exaction of any new Portages or Tolles.

Such persones as hold any thing by title of fealty of the Duke Sigismund, shall continue his Subiectes: excepting them of conquered countreyes, and of places engaged, and that haue not beene redeemed.

This alliance shall bee renewed from tenn. yeeres to tenn. yeeres: and if by aduenture it happen to be broken, the party interessed shall demand iustice, without mouing any warre.

All enmities and warres which formerly haue beene betwene Duke Sigismund, and the Switzers, and their predecessors, shall bee appeald and layde to sleep, by means of this agreement, which is to be inuolably kept on either side.

This first transaction was made before the war of Bourgonne; in the year one thousand, foure hundred, seuentie & foure. In the same year, Sigismund of Austria, René of Lorraine, the Bythoppes of Strasbourg and Basile, the Cities of Strasbourg, Basile, Colmar, Selstadt, Montbéliard, and some others, made alliance with the Switzers for certaine yeeres, against the violence and tyranny of the Duke of Bourgonne, who being slaine 3. yeeres after in the battaile of Nancy, Sigismund of Austria renewed the hereditary Alliance, and this first transaction made with the Switzers, by the entermite of K. Lewes the eleuenth. This alliance was confirmed with the Cantons of Zurich, Bern, Lucerna, Fribourg, and Soleurre, with liberty to the other Cantons, to enter into the same alliance if they pleased. There was not any new Article added at that time: but onely the forme and meanes of mutual succour, which was couched in far more cleare and plaine termes. Some years after this, Duke Sigismund not hauing any legitimate children, resigned his Dukedome to the Emperor Maximilian, reseruing onely to himselfe an annual pension. Maximilian required the Switzers to enter the forenamed alliance with him. But because they had bene at some variance with him, and hee with them, and there grew some apparance of warre (considering it seemed evidently, that Sigismund had thus despoyled himselfe, to inury the Switzers) they would not enter into any nouell alliance, especially, because hee meant nothing else but fraudes in all this carriage, as the euent plainly declared.

For immediately, they of Austria, and of the league of Swabia, moued warre against the Switzers and Grisons.

on the twelfth year, which was in Anno, 1111. the Emperor renewed the hereditary alliance of the house of Austria, with the Switzers, and ioyned in one, the house of Bourgonne, and his Nephew Charles, of whom he was tutor. Moreover, not onely the Switzers of the first alliance, but the twelve Cantons. Item, they of Appenzell, with the Abbot and Towne of S. Gall, confirmed this alliance hereditary, with the houses of Austria & Bourgonne. In this alliance or transaction for confirmed, made by the meanes of King Lewes the eleuenth, is expressly set downe first of all: that therein is comprehended onely the county of Bourgonne, and the high countries of Austria, the county of Tirol, and that which is beyond the Mountaine. Item, some Townes along the Rheine, as Waldshout, Lauffenberg, Secon, Rhusfeld, & others that are on this side the Mountain. Neuerthelesse there is added, that order shall be giuen, that those other countries not comprized in the alliance, shall not enterprise any thing by Arms against the Switzers, nor the Switzers against them. All outrageous words & actions are prohibited, for feare of alienating their hearts, as hath happened sometimes heretofore thereby.

Moreover, the Emperor Maximilian promised, in the name of Charles his Nephew, to giue (in present) euery year in the city of Zurich, to each one of the cantons, two hundred crownes. To the Abbot and city of S. Gall, and the Bourg of Appenzell, an hundred crownes to each of them: vntill such time as Charles shall be growne greater, to gouern these countries himselfe, & then he shal stand bound to confirm the alliance, which accordingly was done. For in the year 154. by letters which the Emperour Charles the fifth, sent to the Cantons, he confirmed the alliance; in so much as concerned the house and county of Bourgonne, for his brother Ferdinand was chosen then Duke of Austria. The conditions and Articles of alliance with Bourgonne, are the very same as them of Austria. To wit, that it shall be lawful for eyther side, to traffick, and to go and come freely into one another's countries. Item, that they neyther doe, nor suffer any of the countries, to make warre vpon each other. And if (by aduenture) some enemy would doe violence to one of the two sides: the other (being thereto required) shall be careful to preuent it without any delay, for feare, lest against right and equity, it should be oppressed.

CHAP. XLI.

Of the Alliances betwene Sauoy and the Switzers.

THE Dukes of Sauoy, (which part was called by our Ancients, the country of the Allobrogians) long since, for long space of time, helde amity with the Cantons of Berne, Fribourg, and Soleurre. In the ende, Charles, Father to Philibert, now Duke of Sauoy, made an alliance with all the cantons, for twenty five years, in Anno, 112.

The first Article treateth of the amity which is to be maintained on either side, without any outrage, or seconding an enemy to passe among the Allies.

The second ruleth the knowledge of Proceffes and Law-cases, wherein Iudges of equal number are to be elected on both sides, who shall call the parties into the Towne of Bienna, and there ende the difference. If two sentences be giuen, hauing as many voyces on the one side as other: the Iudges shall elect a subarbitrator in one of the cantons, that shall haue no part of interest in the Proceffe. As for causes betwene particular persons; they are to be decided by Iudges of the places.

The third ordaineth, that it shall be lawful for the subjects of the allies, to go about their affaires freely, and in all safety, in the countries of Suetia & Sauoy, without being charged with any new imposts, portages, or tolles.

The fourth auoucheth, that if any man haue a difference against the Duke, and would haue it referred to the orders spoken in the cantons: if the Duke will not agree thereto, the Switzers doe not stand bound (by any alliance) to assist any such party against the Duke.

The fifth speaketh, that if the Switzers are assailed and pressed with warre, the Duke shall send them (at his own charge) fixe hundred horse at the left; & provided, that that hee haue then no warre in his owne country. In like manner, if the Duke haue any warre in his owne hand, & demand succour, the Switzers shall send him fixe thousand foot, or more, to each man whereof, the Duke shall pay 6. Liures Tournois, for wages every Moneth. If (ouer and aboue this number) hee demandeth some other Switzers, that desire to goe to warre vpon their owne good will towards him: hee shall not stand bound to pay them any wages, but what he will do out of his owne liberality.

The Duke may demand no seruice of the Switzers, in any nauall warre, nor cause them to passe the Seas: but onely to defend the countries, which they possesse at the day of making this alliance.

To the end that this accord may be firmly kept, the Duke nor the Switzers shall meddle with any affaires of strangers, to debate any thing to the preiudice of their alliance: neyther shall they giue right of Bourgeship, to any subiects of Swetia or Sauoye, but onely to such, as shall haue their persons and goods transported into cythers countries.

While this alliance endureth, the Duke shall yearly pay in the City of Berne, to each Canton, the summe of two hundred crownes.

Vpon the ending of this alliance, which lasted almost 25. yeares, the King of France, Frances the first, depoyled Duke Charles of the most part of his countries. And in this warre, the Bernians taking in hand the cause of their fellow-Bourgeses of Geneua, with them of Fribourg and Valois: tooke all the Dukes places in the countries of Faut, couuty of Romont and Tuau. After this time, the Emperour Charles the fift (in the protection of whō the Duke of Sauoy was put) was in war continually in Piedmont gainst the Frēch: and that was the cause of breaking the renewing of the alliance. At length, Philebert, the Sonne of Charles, hauing recovered his countries, by the means of peace betweene the Kings of Spaine and France: made a new and perpetuall alliance with the Cantons of Lucerne, Suits, Vri, Vnderwald, Zug, and Solleurre. It is (almost) the very same as the former: but onely that there is no mention made (to my remembrance) of mutuall succour. Soone after, the other Cantons renewed with him, the very same conditions of ancient amity and alliance.

CHAP. XLII.

Of the Alliances betweene the Switzers and the Kings of France.

King Lewes the 11. was the first King of France, that allied himselfe with the Switzers, and that assigned rewards & pensions annually to all the Cantons. Being as yet Dolphin, hee led a great Army into Germany, conducted by the Count of Armignac. This hee did in fauor of Pope Eugenius, and of the Emperour Fredericke, onely to brake the councill of Basile, as the Pope desired: and turiously to invade the Switzers, whom the Emperour hated, and to break off their siege (in meere despight of them) which they had planned before the city of Zurich, because he was allied with the house of Austria. The Switzers had another Army before the castle of Franker: 1600 men whereof, they sent thence, to succour Basile & the Fathers there in the councill.

Being about 2 miles from Basile, they did set vpon the Dolphins troops to fity, as (although in regard of their enemies multitude, who had enclosed them on all sides) they were euery man (almost) slaine in the field: yet notwithstanding, they lo weakened the French Army (for there were slaine about 6000 of them) that the Dolphin standing in feare of a further losse, and of the valour of the Switzers: tooke his way suddenly home to France, leauing the businesse vnexecuted, which he came for. It is reported, that the Dolphin seeing his enemies slaine bodies lying on the ground, saide thus. Sometimes with farr lesse forces, and in the space of three houres; I haue broken an Army of thirteen thousand men, without any such paine or danger as I haue met with heere, labouring a whole day toughly, to ouercome a little handfull of men. Neuer hadde I to deale with more valiant and fast enemies; and therefore I will take order, for euery warring any more against them. Which hee most truly and faithfully performed a long time after, euen euen vntill he came to the crowne.

Hee neuer loued Charles Duke of Bourgonne, and yet durst not make open warre on him, because hee was not well appointed for it: and therefore hee laboured by all meanes, to set the Duke at iustling with the Switzers. But to compasse his intent the more easily, and haue the Switzers at his command, when he should stand in need of their assistance: he made an alliance with them for ten yeares, giuing as an annuall pension to each Canton, the summe of seven thousand Liures Tournois. During the warre of the Duke of Bourgonne against the Switzers, the King furnished them with a great summe of money: as fearing least (through want of coine) they should giue ouer contending, and talke of truce. The Duke being foyled at Morat; the King gaue publickly great gilts to the Switzers, and in particular to their Captaines and Colonels. Finally, after the death of the Duke, slaine in Lorraine, to set an imbarment, that (by right of warre) the Switzers should not possesse themselues of Bourgonne, where there were many men that nodded the head at their deuotion: hee bought the country for a goodly summe of money. And because hee must needs make warre, to get into possession of the country: hee made vse of the foote Switzers to serue him, giuing to them farr greater wages, then euery Prince had done before.

Charles the eight, sonne to Lewes, in the yeare, one thousand, foure hundred, foure score and three, renewed the alliance which his father had made with the Switzers: and vsed their seruice in the warre, whē hee ouercame the Duke of Bretaigne. But principally in the warre of Naples, he diuers wayes made good proofe, that the warlike Switzers, were both loyall and valiant of their persons. His successeour, Lewes the twelfth, hauing vnderaken the conquest of Millaine, and very desirous to turne the Switzers, from the amity they bare to Duke Lodowick Sforza; made alliance with them for ten yeares. At the end whereof, hee thanked the Switzers, & denied to pay the rewards and yearly pensions, which hee had payed in publicke and to particular persons. Which so highly offended this martiall people, as partly of their own inclination, but much more by meanes of the Cardinall of Sion, who solicited the principals of the cantons; they made a league with Pope Innocent the second, in the yeare, one thousand, five hundred and ten. A fewentimes afterward, this King laboured to make a new alliance: but the Switzers being ioyned with the Pope, would neuer listen to it. But in the yeare, one thousand five hundred and twelue, they droue the French out of Millaine, and re-established Maximilian Sforza in the Dukedome. Then the yeare following, they ouerthrew the French at Nouars, and came with a maine Army along into Bourgonne.

Lewes the twelfth, had his Sonne in law Frances de Valois for his successeour: who wonne a memorable bataille against the Switzers, when hee ouercame them at Marianno: Hee brought into France, Maximilian Sforza, and made himselfe Lord of the Dukedome of Millaine. After a victory so remarkable, knowing well, how bloody it had bin, and at how deare a price the French had bought it: the first thing hee did, was (to winne the good fauour of the Switzers) a kinde agreement made with them, ioyning them to his crowne, by a firme and durable alliance. The conditions and treaties of this peace and mutual amity, are comprized in these thirteene Articles following.

First, all enmities, dissensions, warres, differences and quarrelles in precedent times, are vtterly brought to nothing: and as for particular variances, which concern nothing in common with the occasions of warre, they shall stand vtterly void, by those Articles of agreement, made betweene the Duke of Millaine, King Lewes the twelfth, and the Cantons.

Secondly, all prisoners, in what part or place fouer they are deteyned as prisoners, or as slaues; they shall be releafed and set at liberty, without paying any ransom.

Thirdly, if any man at Armes of the Switzers, haue any suite against the King of France, not for any matter of warre; he may contest in iustice, according to the Articles following.

Fourthly, all such persons as after the accord made betweene King Lewes the twelfth, and the Cantons, were and are allied with them, or receiued into the number of their Bourgeses: shall be comprehended in this treaty, and enioy the benefit nefit thereof. Onely such excepted, as are out of the limits of Swetia, that speake not the Germane tongue, and are not subiects to the Cantons.

The fift Article, confirmeth to Merchants and subiects of Swetia, the priuiledges and franchises, which the Kings of France haue formerly graunted vnto them.

Sixtly, to the end that the Switzers may the better vnderstand the good will and liberality of the King: hee will pay them downe presently a great somme of crownes, for their great charges at the siege of Dijon, and afterwards in Italy.

Seauenthy, that peace may bee the more firmly maintained on eyther side, and to continue on this begun amity: if any difference happen to be moued, neither the one party or other shall vnder-take Armes, in that manner to pursue his right; but according to the order before mentioned, is to demaund reason by course of iustice.

Eighty, neyther side shall giue passage, food or harbour to the others enemies: nor suffer their subiects to vndergo Armes, for such Princes or common-weales, as are enemies to France, or to the Switzers. Such as do the contrary, shall be repealed to their country, and punished according as they haue deserved.

Ninthy, permission is granted vnto Merchants, Pilgrims, & Subiects, French or Switzers, to trafficke, voyage, goe and come freely, into France and Swetia; without any outrage, or being offended by any new tolles or taxes.

Tenthy, the King giueth yearly to each Canton, the sum of two thousand Liures Tournois: As much to the Valaisians, and as much to the Grisons, as was granted vnto them by king Lewes the 12. And moreover, the sum of 20000 Liures Tournois. Item, to the Abbot of S. Gall, to the Subiects, and to them of Toggenbourg, the sum of 600 Liures Tournois: To the city of S. Gall, 400: To Mulhouse, 400: And to them of the county of Gruyere, 600.

Eleuenthy, the ancient priuiledges and franchises, which they haue (till then) enjoyed in the Dukedome of Millaine, the inhabitants of Bellizana, Lugano, Lo-

carno, and the Vale Madia; are to them fully referred and confirmed.

Twelfty, the king leaueth it in choise to the Switzers, to declare within the compasse of a yeare, whether they affect or no: to hold the countries and castles of Lugano, Locarno, and of the Vale Madia; or else to forsake them, for the sum of thirtie thousand crownes of the Sunne. And if they take the money: then they of the Vale of Telins, and of the county of Clanenna, shall haue their part in this summe, as much as one of the Cantons.

The last Article ordaineth, that this peace and amity betweene the Realme of France and the cantons, shall continue inuolable and perpetuall.

The king excepteth in this peace, Pope Leo the tenth, the See and Romane Empire, the kings of Spaine, of England, of Scotland, of Nawarre, and of Denmarke: The Dukes of Sauoy, of Lorraine, of Guel-dres: Item, the Duke & common-wealth of Venice, Laurentius de Medicis, the house of Medicis, and the common-wealth of Florence: The Bishop of Liege, and all the confederates of the king.

The Switzers also except on their part, Pope Leo the tenth, the See of Rome, the Emperour and Romane Empire; the house of Austria; the Dukes of Sauoy, and of Wirtenberg; the family of Laurentius de Medicis; the common-wealth of Florence, the Marshall of Bourgonne, their ancient alliances; and all their allies and fellow-Bourgettes.

The reason for these exceptions, is, that if the king of France make warre vpon any one of them aboue named, in his own countries: the Switzers may keepe what promise or alliance they haue formerly made or sworne, to those Princes or common-wealths. But if one or more of those Princes or common-wealths, come to assault the king in his owne kingdom: the Cantons shall not permit any of their Subiects to goe in warre against the king; but shall countermaund them, as it is ordayned in the eight Article, and which they are to keepe and obserue inuolably.

To these conditions is added the forme to be kept, in the deciding of suites and differences. But it seemeth to me, that it would be great losse of time and paper paper to insert it: because it agreeth almost altogether, with the accord of Millaine, and other formes of iudgements, wherof we haue spoken heretofore. All this conference and treaty of peace, was made by the Ambassadors on eyther side, and sette downe in writing in the Towne of Fribourg, on S. Andrews day, in the Moneth of Nouember, and in the yeare 1516.

The King hauing made pacification with the Switzers, as already hath beene declared: yet hee would needs proceede somewhat farther, and allie them more strictly to his crowne. Which also he obtained, and that agreement was past at Lucerne, five yeares after the fore-mentioned peace. Then all the Cantons (except Zurich) and all their confederates, allied themselves with the King of France: and the tenour of that alliance was as followeth,

The Tenure of a more nere agreement, made betweene the King and the Switzers.

1. If any one (whosoever it be) make war within the Realme of France, in the Dukedome of Millaine, or any other country appertaining to the crown, eyther on this side, or beyond the Mountaines: the King may make a leuie of Switzers, when and at what time himselfe shall thinke meete, to wit, of fixe thousand men at the least, and seauen thousand at the most, except the Lords of the Leagues will permit more.

2. Hee may also chuse out of all the Cantons and confederates, such Colonels and Capitaines as he shall thinke fit: provided, that they be men of good fame and credite.

3. The Lordes of the Leagues shall giue no hinderance to those Colonels, Capitaines, and Soldiers, neither delay time, or put any case in question, to hinder their going: but that within ten daies after that first day, whercon the King required succour, they shall bee permitted to march away.

4. They shall continue in the Kings seruice, vntill the end of the warre; if it seeme good to him, and they not recalled home by their Lords: The King shall also pay them (euery one) his accustomed wages. But if there happen warre in Swetia, and that thereby the cantons cannot succour the King, as they otherwise wold: In this case, they shall stand quit of their promise, and they may suddenly countermand home their men; to whom also the King stands bound, to grant their departure immediately.

5. If the King would make warre vpon his enemies: he may make the same leuie of fixe thousand Switzers at the least, and seuen thousand at the most; chusing Colonels and Capitaines, men of faire and good fame, which are Switzers, or of their Allies.

6. The King may not separate an Army of Switzers, or diuide them in troops for Garrisons in diuers places: and they are not to serue at Sea, but on the land.

7. As concerning the wages for the Gendarmery; it is agreed on both sides, that the King shall pay for a Moneth vnto each Switzer Soldier, foure Florins and an halfe, of them that are called Florinus du Rhin. And their wages shall begin on the day, when they set forth from their houses: and then shall three Moneths pay be due vnto them, although the King do not vset them in seruice so long. And before they part out of Swetia, they must receiue the first Moneths pay: and the rest for the two other Moneths, at meete places, according as need shall require. If after those three Moneths are past, the King will longer retaine the Switzers; hee shall pay them the same wages euery Moneth, vntill such time as they may commodiously returne home to their owne house.

8. The Colonels, Capitaines, Ensigns, Ambassadors, & others that haue charge in the troopes; shall bee payed after their accustomed manner, and according as the Predecessours to the Kings of France haue done.

9. If any war is made vpon the Switzers, the King of France shall stand bound to succour them at his owne cost: sending them two hundred compleat horsemen, and twelve peeces of Artillery, with all their equippage and furniture; to wit, fixe peeces for battery, and fixe Canons. Moreover, hee shall furnish the Switzers (from three Moneths to three Moneths) in the city of Lyons, with certaine sums of money, for expences in the warre. And if the Switzers affect it rather: instead of two hundred compleate horsemen, the King shall giue them all the three Moneths, the sum of two thousand crownes at the least.

10. If it come so to passe, that if (thorough occasion of moued warre here or there) the Switzers cannot haue any Salt: it may be bought for them in France, & so bee conuayed home into their countries.

11. No side or party shall receiue into protection, neyther bestow Bourgeship on any of the others subiects, nor succor, lodge, or defend men banished, or enemies to eyther side: but according to the Articles of peace, shall hinder & expulse them.

12. Finally, the King being willing to make knowne his loue and good will towards the Switzers: ouer and beside the twenty thousand Francks, which he promised to pay them by the treaty of peace, further promisseth, to pay yearly to each one of the Cantons (while this alliance shall continue) the summe of a thousand pounds Tournois. He will also pay to the confederates, the moiety of the pension which they had before.

The King excepteth Pope Leo the 10. The Romane See and Empire; the kings of England and of Scotland: the Duke of Sauoy, of Lorraine, of Halsatia, and of Guelbres; the common-wealth of Venice, and of Florence; the house of Medici; the Marquesses of Brandenbourg and of Montferrat.

The Cantons do likewise except Pope Leo the tenth, the Romane See and Empire; the common-wealth of Florence; the house of Medici; the Duke of Sauoy; the house of Austria; their alliances, their Bourgeses and confederates; the Duke of Wirtemberg; and Ottavian Maria Sforza, Bishop of Landa.

Neuerthelesse, if any of these aboue named, make warre on eyther of these parties, in their countries on this side, or beyond the Mountains: the other shall giue succour, without exception of any person, according to the tenour of this alliance, which is to endure while King Frances liueth, and three yeares after his death.

This alliance being expired, K. Henry

the second, Sonne and Succesor to king Frances, contracted a new alliance with the Cantons, vpon the same conditions before named: and that alliance lasted 5. yeares after his death. Now because the Dukedome of Milaine, and some other Prouinces, comprehended in the alliance made with king Frances, were dismembered from the crowne, when this new league was contracted: It is expressly set downe, that the Switzers shall not stand obliged, to giue the king any succour, for recouery of those countries. But if he can reconquer them by the ayde of another Army, and he shall bee Lord of them againe, as of other Prouinces belonging to his Kingdome: for the better conseruation of them, the Cantons shall furnish him with men, who shall likewise attend him in warre, for the recouery of Bullen, and the county of Bullenis in Picardy.

If the king will goe in person to some warre, hee may make choise (at his pleasure) of Capitaines Switzers, and command a leuée of fixe thousand men at the least.

He may not disioyne or separate the Switzer Army, when hee is vpon the point of giuing battaile: but out of such occasion, he may plant them in Garisons, in Townes and strong places, to defend them.

As for the wages, rewards, & succors, which the king is to giue vnto the Switzers; it beareth the very selfe-same reason as is in the precedent alliance; and the other Articles doe agree with them before mentioned.

And to the ende, that the treaty of peace, made in the yeare 1516. may remaine firme, when wages reit vnspaid, it is thus ordained. The demander shall acquaint his Magistrate with the matter, to whom, if the cause seeme vpright; he shall goe or send to the kings Ambassadors, which are in Swetia, or if they be absent, the Magistrate shall write to the king, and require satisfaction for the party. If the king yeelds to reason, the demander is satisfied, but if he refuse to pay according to equity; the demander may then call his cause before Iudges and Arbitrators, and there haue it debated. And if the King yeelds to reason, the demander is satisfied, but if he refuse to pay according to equity, the demander may then call his cause before Iudges and Arbitrators, and there haue it debated. And if the King will not yeeld to the Iudges his part, the Switzers may passe on to further knowledge of the facts, and what they appoint, shall be allowed for firme and available to eyther party, euen as if the Iudges on eyther side had therein assisted.

The Merchants both French and Switzers, according to the articles of peace, shall not be greeued with any new taxes, tolles, or imposts.

Finally, King Charles the ninth, Sonne to King Henry, renewed this alliance with the Switzers, vpon conditions little differing from the former: and that alliance continueth yet to this day, after the kings death.

THE MANNER OF GOVERNMENT obserued among the Switzers.

THE SECOND PART.

WE haue shewne in our first Part, of what parts & parcels, the common-wealth of the Switzers is composed; for what causes, & with what conditions these people, dwelling in diuers places, allied themselves together, to make vp one body of a Common-wealth. Also with what industry and trauaile, they haue maintained their liberties; and with what Princes and peoples, they haue associated and leagued themselves. In this second Booke, wee shall declare, how this common-wealth is governed. And because the confederates haue (each one) their Magistrates, Lawes, and particular government, and that the cantons do make one common-wealth apart, and yet there is a councill in common to the whole Nation, and lawes and ordinances, to whose obseruation all are obliged: First, I will make mention of the Switzers common-wealth in generally; then I will describe the estate and government of the Cantons, severally ly in their places.

They that haue written concerning common-wealths, doe set downe three sorts.

The first, when all the managing and government of the common-wealth, is in the power of one only, who is called a King, if he gouerne iustly, with consent of the people, and according vnto the lawes; for if he do otherwise, he is a Tyrant.

The second, when a small number of principall men, and more people of good behauiour, do gouerne.

The third, when all the people haue the authority in their hands.

Thus there are three kinds of Common-wealths, to wit, Monarchy, Aristocracy, & Democracy: who haue for their vicious shaddowes, Tyranny, Oligarchy, and Anarchy.

We cannot compare or sute the Switzers common-wealth, with any of these before named: but as (aunciently) the great Common-wealths of Rome and Carthage, and (in our time) that of Venice may be termed mixt and compounded, be-because (in some matters) they shared or cooke part, with all the three kinds of governments; so in like maner, the common-wealth of the Svitzers is mingled or composed of a Seignioriall, Lordly, and Popular government. For among all the people, of whom the whole common-wealth of the Svitzers is compounded: there are some, whose government is merely democraticall, & where all things (almost) are done by the deliberation of the people. As in those Cantons that have no cities, to wit. Vri, Svits, Vnderwald, Glaris, and Appenzell: yea, even in Zug, although it is a city. The other are governed by Lords, as cities commonly use to be, namely Zurich, Berne, Lucerne, Basle, Fribourg, Solleure, and Schaffhouse. But because the Soueraignty appertaineth to the people, who doe elect these Lords, these common-wealths are compounded of two kinds of government: so that notwithstanding, the one is more Aristocraticall, and the other more Popular.

So then, the common-wealth of the Svitzers being compounded of people, that haue not al one, and the same forme of government: the order and policy also is very diuers and mixt. For if vpon some dayes of audience, ambassadors do aduise on matters of the whole common-wealth, or end some differences: this appeareth to be a government merely Aristocraticall. And yet neuertheless, because they are (for the most part) elected by the people, and that in causes and affaires of importance, they cannot go beyond their aduice, but deale according to the peoples command, to whom they must render an account of their negotiation: it may easily be noted, that such a kinde of government is not altogether Aristocraticall.

Now it plainly appeareth, that the Svitzers common-wealth cannot be better governed, for the liberties which they do enjoy, was gotten by their ancestors, nor by the industry and power of one, or of a small number of particular men: but the people themselves were employed therein, and did enfranchise it with the expence of their purses, blood, and liues. And therefore it is no more then reason, that they should reape some fruit of their trauaile. And as concerning, that it seemeth incommotions and perillous, in a popular estate, that all men should deliuer their aduice, but rather, that it ought to be done by them of most wisdom, and men of best quality: This danger is not to be doubted in the Svitzers Common-wealth, for they do most employ, and send on their dayes of audience, the best and wisest persons of each Canton. And although they haue not power to conclude definitiue (because it might be a dangerous consequence, for the peoples liberty) yet notwithstanding, they are as the chiefeest counsellors, and make a conference of opinions, vpon the State affaires. Afterward, the people giue their consent, by assemblies which they make in Townes and Villages. Now such as are not altogether stupid and ill-affected, may know and approue, that which hath bene deliberated in those dayes meetings, for common benefit: considering, they giue them plainly to vnderstand every thing.

CHAP. II.

Of the manner and behaiour of the Svitzers, in the times of both peace and warre.

Forasmuch as the right government of a common-wealth, is best discerned in affaires and managements of peace and warre: it behooueth vs to shew how our predecessors haue carried themselves therein. As concerning exercises of war, beside that which nature hath done, in fashioning the Svitzers fit thereto: necessity also hath constrained them, to apply their paines, and that in good earnest. The Country is Mountainy, sharpe, and hard for culture, anciently desert and fauage for the most part, making the people not onely indurate and hardened for trauaile: but also robuste, stiffe, & strong, and so (by consequent) very apt for warre.

Now as naturally the people of Europe are more magnanimous and warlike, then they of Asia: so the Europeans which which dwell in Mountainous and hard countries, are reputed to be more martially minded then the other. Prooue heere of appeareth, in the histories of the Goths, Vandales, Hunnes, Lombards, Franks, and other people, who being bred in the very coldest countries of the North: did yet disperse themselves ouer the fayrest parts of Europe, and eyther foraged, or troubled them, treading vnder their feete the power of Rome, sometimes so much renowned through the world. In like manner, as the very coldest countries of the Alpes, do beare the highest and tallest Trees, and haue beasts more fatte and faire then can be desired: so the naturall disposition of the country, and temperature of the ayre, produceth men more robuste and strong then others are. Vnderfore, in many Countries, some are men for Armes, others are labourers, and others artesans: but in Switzerland, all are Soldiours borne, even by a meere manner of desire, and there is not a Switzer, (provided that hee haue stature and apt disposition) but in him may be seene the very lues (to life) of a man of warre.

And because almost all the neighbors to the Cantons, but especially the Princes of Aultria, laboured by continuall warres, to annihilate the liberty of the Svitzers, and that for the space of two hundred yeares: meere necessity made the Svitzers martiall, being compelled to carry weapons daily in their hands, to maintaine their liberty, bridle the headstrong courses of their enemies, & to preserve their wiues and children. And as it was said of Agesilaus, after he was wounded by the Thebanes in an encounter, that he receiued worthy wages, for teaching them the arte of warre: euen so Noble men that entrusted the olde Svitzers, simple peasants, and shepherds, to handle a Sword, and compelled them to vnderstand the trickes of fencing, receiued (in the end) the recompence for their apprenticeship, hauing bene so many times beaten in battailes, and finally criuen out of Switzerland.

From hence it ensued, that their lawes & customes were accommodated to the exercises of warre. For whereas in many Countries, the people are forbidden to carry and manage weapons: so on the contrary, there is none so young in Swit- zerland, dwell he in City, Town, Village, or Field, be he a peasant, porter, or of the very basest condition can be desired, but he is strictly commanded to haue Armes, according to his quality. And because that in our time, the Harquebuz or Caliuier was in great vse for warre: there was a prize and reward proposed in publicke, for such as would exercise, and could dexteriously handle these fiery weapons. Not only in Cities, as was done in many parts of Germany: but also in the most people d Townes and Villages. Nay, there was a prize and reward appointed for children, that could draw the bow; so the end, that they might afterward be the better fashioned for weapons of more danger: which proued to such an expert practise, that from their very youth, they accustomed themselves to discharge the Caliuier.

Their other pastimes also fauored all of war. For they neuer used to meete together, were it on solemne daies & festiuals, according to the Churches dedications, or at weddings and other such like occasions, but with Drums and Trumpets for war. And it was (and still is) a great honor for a Bride-grome, to be attended on with a great number of Pikes, Halberds, & Shot, who (wentreated) march before him, or come to honour his feast, in the nature of a mulier, marching after the manner of war. Many times also, boyes of 8. or 10. yeares old, and others somewhat more aged, meet together and make musters, with Drums & Ensignes, some beare Caliuers, others Halberds, & others Pikes: so that to see them march, it might well be said, that they had hearts & hands already apt to manage those warlike weapons. In this manner, they that neuer vnderstood any thing set downe in the Military precepts of Vegetius, nor of any other, inured from their infancy, without any command: but onely of their owne motion, and by a naturall inclination to Armes, can carry and manage themselves with countenances and steppings fit for Soldiours. In many places, euery yeare, or at certaine times of the yeare, the Lords cause general musters in arms to be made for all their followers, as if they were going to war against the enemy. These musters are sometimes performed at the dedication of Temples, sometimes at Fairs; and in some other places, when the Good & virtuous examples are fit for all mankind.

Subjects take their oath to a Gouvernor, sent newly to some Bayliwicke, for then they all muster, and shew themselves in Armes.

It is altogether needlesse, that I should make any long discourse of other exercises, which do dispose the to be the more valiant in war: as to runne, leape, throw the stone and barre, to wrestle, so shew all kindes of defence fit for Arms; for which there are prizes publicly appointed euery year. Moreover, I am of the minde, that in all christendome, there is not any people, that do exercise themselves more in swimming, then the Switzers: who (with much ease) can vie that Arte, swimming thorough great Lakes, Riuers, Streames, and very impetuous floods, where-with the country doth greatly abound. When they are at leysure, and haue done their husbandry in the fields: they daily follow hunting, sometimes ouer the highest Mountaines and Rockes, almost inaccessible, after wilde Goates, Kids, and other beasts. At other times they pursue Beares, Wolves, Ounces, & wilde Boares, reputing it as an honour to him that can kil one of those sauage creatures, and fasten his head at the entrance of his doore; yet sometimes hee makes a present of it to the Seignoury. The Grecians had an ancient custome among the, to giue the heads of wilde Boares, vnto Gentlemen or Gouvernours of the country, as an honourable present after hunting.

Now we are to declare, how the Switzers doe carry themselves in warre. First then, I will make mention of their Arms: next, how they chuse and enroule their Soldiours: And consequently, of other things belonging to the acte of warre. Let me then tell you, that (ordinarily) the Switzers Souldiours are well furnished with Armes in their houses: yet (oftentimes) the Citties and Towns do fit them with Armes, which are kept in their publicke Arsenalles and Magazines. Their Armes are commonly those of the Germane Lance-Knights, to wit: the Harquebuzer, or Caluer, or Musket; the Pike of eightene foote in length; the Halbert: the Courtlace, and Sword made apt for both hands. They weare also a long Sword by their sides, whereas their ancestors did weare one farre shorter on their thighs, proper to ioyne with the enemy neerer hand, and to giue him the Stoccardo.

Now adayes, ouer and beside this long Sword, they weare a large Pontard or Dagger, of three or foure fingers breadth, and sharpe pointed: which the very meanness of them do adorne and enrich, with curious workmanship of gold and siluer. Some weare shirres of Mayle; others Corselets, or a good Cuirats for the body.

The poorer sort, and especially the Muskettiers, content themselves with a Murrian or head-peece. Some, in stead of Armes played with yron or Steele, make vse of skinnies of Beares or Buffelles: Others weare doubles of linnen cloth, redoubled in iust thicknesse, and made full of oylet-holes, and these doubles thus made, are not easily to bee transpierced. For the rest, as Polybius writeth, that the braue Parado or Romane Soldiour, vied to weare a Panache of three plumes, red or blacke, about the length of a foote and an halfe, because this addition to the rest of his furniture for warre, made the Soldiour seeme to be twice greater and higher, then he was indeed; much more comely to looke on, and terrible to the enemy. Euen so the Switzers Soldiours, who couet to appeare slightly amongst all other, do weare on their heads a Plume of Feathers, one part white, and the other answerable to the Ensigne, or Colours of their distinct Cantons.

They beare euery man vpon his Arms, a white crosse, plaine and right, which is the Switzers Ensigne of war: Each man yeelds himselfe vnder the Standard of his Canton. They serue their turne with Drums, Fifes, and Trumpets: yet in such sort, notwithstanding, that the Drums of the Switzers are easily discerned frō them of the Allemans or Germanes, because the found of the Switzers Drum is weighty and deepe, and the other more blunting. Particularly, they of Vri vie in warre, a Cornet made of a wilde Bulles horn. They of Vnderwald do the like. The Luzernians often-times vie a Cornet of Brass, which they say was giuen them by Charlemaine.

Now as concerning the enrolment of their Soldiours, it is done in manner following.

What they vie now at this present day, in their due order.

The braue Parado or Romane Soldiour, vied to weare a Panache of three plumes, red or blacke, about the length of a foote and an halfe, because this addition to the rest of his furniture for warre, made the Soldiour seeme to be twice greater and higher, then he was indeed; much more comely to looke on, and terrible to the enemy.

When they march forth abroad to war

The care of the old Switzers in their enrolment.

A reason concerning the name of Germanes, and how it came vp at first.

A great happiness to be amongst such men, and in such a campe.

If warre be made vpon the Switzers, and that they are assailed in their owne country; as no person was excused at Rome, when Hanniball was at the gates of the City; euen so (without the least delay) all such as are able to carry Armes, they lay command on, to run with speedy succour, as to a sudden and dangerous fire, which euery hand ought helpe to quench. Yet in all this, they proceede by good order; for in the time of peace, each Canton hath certaine Captaines, Ensignes, and chosen men, that ought still to be ready vpon any warning. But because it cometh to passe more often, that they must leade their troops out of their country, and all are not meete for marching, neither ought to be drawne abroad, for feare the country should be left naked of men of warre, and so remaine as a prey to the enemy: Then one neighbour makes choise of another for his companion, and according to the aduice of Xenophon, the very strongest Army that can bee imagined, is that which is compounded of friends and companions.

The ancient Switzers well knowing this, tooke especial care, that in their enrolment, friends, and such as knew one another, might be ranked together. And heereupon they ordained, that in warre, Switzers should aide each other, & loue together like brethren, throwing of all particular hatreds, which they could formerly pretend one against another. The other Allemagne Soldiours had a custom to call one another brother: in regard whereof, some haue thought, that our ancient named them Germanes, which is as much to say, as brethren. Yet notwithstanding, they were all (almost) at the Swords point one against another, & (very often) the furious Lance-knights, who by their hackt and slasht faces, seeme to breathe no other word but warre: haue receiued more cuts and gasbes by their friends and companions, then from their enemies.

On the contrary, ordinarily in the Switzers Campe, there is a very great tranquillity, & one louing another (though otherwise they know not at all) euen as if they were brethren. And when they are the very greatest enemies in the world: yet notwithstanding, for the good and quietnes of their country, they renounce all spleene & particular quarrels. Whereof I will declare a memorable example, which oftentimes (in my youth) I heard reported by my ancestors.

Two Switzers being deadly enemies, to wit, Arnould of Vnderwald, who afterward was a great Capitaine, and Zerchintes of Zurich, both of them very valiant men, and meete for war. It came to passe, that during the warre of Suaba, they were both at one time in the Campe: when the cheefe Leaders (knowing their enmity) commanded them to be friends, and (as then) to forget their ancient quarrels. It happened in a certaine encounter, that Arnould was round engirt with his enemies: which Zerchintes perceiuing, came with his companions to relecue him, and did set him free from the danger wherein he was. In the euening, being returned to the Campe, Arnould went to the Tent of Zerchintes, and called to him by his name. His fellowes and followers, being ignorant of that which had happened, were perswaded by their owne opinion, that he came to challenge combat with the other. Wherefore they stepe betweene them, & admonished Arnould, to remember the command giuen by the Captains, and to take heede of mouing any trouble in the Campe. He answered, that he came with a quite contrary disposition, and so acquainted them with all the aduerture. And instantly presented to Zerchintes a very goodly horse, fit for warre seruice, which he had wonne in that daies trauaile. From that time forward, euen to the houre of death, they were very louing and intimate friends.

As the ancient Switzers shewed themselves brethren, in succouring and assisting their companions, doing as they would be done to themselves: so did they observe the same forme, in tharing and diuiding a gotten booty. For first of all, they gaue prohibition on paine of death, that no man of theirs, should bee so hardy or bold, as to forsake his ranck & the troops, vntill such time as the enemy should bee driuen in rout. Afterward, when the Captaines had giuen licence to rife and ranlacke; all the booty was brought in common, & distributed by the poll. And because the cantons are publicly vntied, euen so the publicke booty, as Artillery, Castles, conquered Countries, Tolles, and other reuennues, are parted among them by equall portion. Albeit there are some of the Cantons, that doe furnish out twice, thrice, and some whiles fure times more Soldiours, then others doe. Neuerthelesse, extraordinarily and particularly, recompence is giuen, and gifts bestowed vpon Soldiers, that haue borne themselves valiantly, & performed some braue exploit in the warre, beyond the fortune of their companions: and also to those Cantons in like manner, that haue bene more employed and charged, then the other.

Forasmuch also, as victuals and other munitions, are in warre to bee especially considered: the ancient Switzers ordained, that such as brought victuals, Arms, or other necessary things, came to sell them in the Switzers campe, they should befaououred & maintained, in all respects as if they were Switzers. There is also a perpetuall law, and established by length of time, that in warre, Temples and other places destined for the exercise of Religion, should be left intire and vntoucht. And that no outrage should be offered to maids nor women: but onely to such, as shall giue Armes to enemies, or acte the parts of Soldiours, by hurling stones, or hurting in some other manner.

As concerning the manner of camping, and raunging themselves in battaile; it is needlesse for me to shew heere, that which the Switzers do in particular, or in common with the other Germans. Only I will say, that in our time, and by the memory of our auncestors: among all Infantry, the battallion of the Switzers hath alwayes bene highly esteemed. For being composed of Pikes crossed, it resembleth a Porcupine, so that such as vnderstand the affaires of warre, doe iudge, and experience hath approoued it, that this battallion may beare head against the horsemen. In the battaile of Nouras, the Infantry of the Switzers being not couered with any horse: foiled and droue in route, the French Infantry and Horsemen. Afterward, on the day at Marignano, hauing had battaile against king Francis, two severall dayes, which they lost, by reason of the thundering Artillery, and multitude of their enemies: Neuerthelesse, though vanquished, yet they returned to Milaine, ranged in battaile, so that their retreat seemed nothing like a flight; and yet the French (for all their victory) durst not follow them. It is not long since, when on the day at Dreux, in the first Troubles, the Reîtres & the French Caudery, liuely charged the battaillon of the Switzers, and slew the most part of their Captaines: yet notwithstanding the Switzers rallied themselves three times, and kept their ranks so well, that euen in that battaile, their enemies confessed themselves, that they were very valiant & warlike men.

But let vs leaue such discourse to men of warre, and shew you, how the Switzers busie themselves in the times of peace, & how they are ordered from their infancy. First, as concerning letters and learning, which holds the first ranke: I freely confesse, that the ancient Switzers were not very carefull thereof. But rather they imitated the Romans therein, when they were in warres continually, against the Aequi, Volschians, Vientes, and other neighbouring people. And as they then, with rusticall songs celebratd the valiancy of their ancestors: so in the same manner, the olde Switzers had vulgar songs, to remember the victories which they had obtained in warre. The Song wherein the day of Sempach is aptly described, when as Duke Leopold was slaine, is very common in Switzerland. As for knowledge of Artes, and of the Latine tongue, men of warre, bruske and vnapt to handle Bookes, rather thought, that such matters belonged to Churchmen. But in our dayes, there are to be found in all the cantons of Switzers, men learned both in the Tongues and Sciences. And as for many that vnderstand not the Latine tongue: yet they forbear not to reade Histories of all kinds, either concerning government of life, or affaires of State, or of Religion: And there are Libraries, well furnished with Bookes, written in the vulgar tongue.

Now, as concerning Schooles, it is a very long time since, that the Colleged of the Abbey of S. Gall, and of Coure among the Grisons, were renowned, as we haue already shewne else-where. But within some certaine yeares after, letters and learning became quite banished. The Pope Pius, formerly named Aeneas Sylvius, provided an Vniuersity at Basile, to whence whence haue come many learned and excellent men: whom it is needles to name, because they are sufficiently famous, and knowne by their writings. There are also diuers notable and publike Schooles at Zurich, at Berne, and one established at Laufanna, by the Lords of Berne. Beside the study of good letters, whereof I haue made mention, there is loue of all vertue, and especially of Iustice, which appertaineth also to the maintenance of peace. For it is a matter most certaine, that the common-wealth of the Switzers is grounded vpon most great equity, and hath euermore bene famous, in regard of her iustice: as appeareth by the lawes, alliances, customes, and manner of life among the ancient Switzers, and by many examples, and particular actions. I need not make mention of their lawes, because they agree with those of other common-wealths, that are ruled by good lawes: where crimes and misdeeds are severely punished, without any exception of persons.

As for their alliances, the Articles of them, reported in the first Booke: do declare, with what vprightnesse, diligence, & faithfulness they are made. The ends of them are, that euery man may enioy his owne peaceably, and that (by a common consent) all violence may be expulst and banished. For the better governing of this case, it is expressly forbidden, to goe and assault, and make warre one vpon another, cyther rashly, or without iust cause. And therefore also, before Armes may be vnderaken, the wisest and most discrete persons in all the nation: in a publike assembly, must examine the causes of the warre, and vnderstand them to be iust and lawfull. Then afterward, when question is vrged of repulsing an enemy, it is most strictly prohibited to the confederates, that ought to giue assistance; to vse therein no fraud nor cunning. But if they be called by letters, or by messages, or admit they could not bee called, the passages being fore-closed by the enemy: yet notwithstanding they are commanded to go and giue succour, euen to their vtmost power.

Moreouer, because it many times happens, that the recovery of debts and borrowed money, do beget great debates, so that such differences between particular persons, doe sometimes fet the Cantons at variance one with another: the Articles of the alliances do euery where make mention, what course is to be observed in the recovery of such debts, and for taking pawns, to cut off the ouer great licence of lenders, and to shunne the fraudulency of borrowers. Whosoever hath bene but a meane reader of Histories, knowes very wel, what troubles haue happened in Rome, in the case of debts, at all times, and whensoever the people are oppressed by the violence of vsurers, & taxed in great summes, then they would mutiny, and demand, that the vsurers contracts might be torne in peeces, & other made of more honest nature. But the prouidence and vprightnesse of the ancient Switzers, made such an imbarment, that neuer was the abolition of Obligations vrged in Switzerland; although the country is not very great, nor rich, and hath bene troubled with warres continually.

Because also, that men of warre are prompt, and ready, to lay hand on their weapons, and (oftentimes) fight vnder a false and dangerous pretence, they being men rather quarrellous, sturdy & outrageous, then valiant, yet taking a delight in this forwardnesse of enduring nothing, as thinking it makes men magnanimous and invincible: the ancient Switzers laboured to remedy this euill, first by imposition of great fines, on such as began the stirre, and to outrage their associates. But because choller is a furious beast, and very difficult to be bridled: to hinder him from taking carriere, and obuiate murders; they added another remedy, to wit, that such as were found present at those quarrels and debates, if they did not pacify and hinder their proceeding, and impose on them the penalties appointed by the lawes: then themselves should be greuously punished by the Magistrate. For they would not permit, that men should be so ouerswaid and mastered by choller, and their lawes (in the meane while) lose their power and authority. If any man committed a murder, and escaped from the hand of iustice: hee could not be recieued into any of the Cantons.

If any man were banished, for offending any one of the Cantons, or killing a man: he was to stand excluded from all the rest, except hee could proue by sufficient witness, that he slew his enemy in the mere defence of his owne body.

Such hath bene, and still is, the equity of the Switzers in doing justice, & punishing the faulty from time to time: that many straggers haue made their recourse to them, and haue accepted them for Arbitrators in their differences. For they do shew themselves protectors of all such as haue any wrong done to them, and vpon this their coming to them; they haue sent Ambassadors, nay, haue vnderaken Armes, to re-establish in their goods and possessions, some that haue bene despoyled of them by very powerful Lords.

The Cantons (in this cause) made war on the Princes of Austria, to maintain the right of the Fulachs, Citizens of Schaffouse. And for certaine Gentlemen of Stiria, named the Gradlers: & constrained the Duke of Austria, to restore such goods as he deteyned from them. In the like case, but of much greater importance they gaue bataille vnto Duke Charles of Bourgogne; to maintain René, Duke of Lorraine, whom Charles had disposed of the most part of his countries. In like manner also, many times haue they made warre on certaine theues, who couering themselves with the title of Noblemen; robbed and spoyled Merchants. To foile these theues, they haue bin faine to make out vpon them, not onely in their owne country of Switzerland; but also in countries further off, allying themselves (to effectuall good a worke) with those farre off townes. By which means, the wayes of Switzerland haue bene made very secure: so that Merchants, charged with neuer so great summes of money, goe and come in al safety, transporting their Merchandizes whether they please, without any need of company or transport. And a pleasant Prouerbe grew thereon, that if any man carried his pursse full of gold or silver on his staffes end; hee might safely passe through Switzerland, and care not how many looked on him.

Iustice seldome walkes without her companion Liberty, vnder which epithet wee will comprehend hospitality, which alwayes hath made the people of Switzerland to bee highly commended. They haue not the delicacies of the Italian and French, but they offer liberally those presents which the earth yeeldes them, as namely, Milke, Butter, & Hony. And who would bee ashamed, or can despise this liberality; seeing the great Patriark Abraham, entertained Angels with such viands, when they came to see him? And yet the country is not without good store of wilde Beasts and Fowles, with diuers kindes of Fishes, both in Lakes & Riuer. And as great men in times past, (so sweetly sung of by learned Poets) honoured men of worth, by giuing them flesh for their food: euen so oftentimes in Switzerland, presents are giuen to straggers, and them of the same country also, passing from one place to another, of good and delicate flesh, namely Venison, and also of very dainty Fish. But principally, the Switzers are liberall and charitable to the poore, in lodging, feeding, & furnishing them with other needfull things: so that there are very few countries, wherein so many poore beggers are to be seene, as in Switzerland. I do not here dispute, whether the Magistrate doth well, or no, in suffering or supporting them: onely I was desirous to shew herein, the great humanity of the Switzers towards the poore, which resort thither from all parts.

The people of Switzerland (among all other) take pleasure in Feasts and publike Banquets. In Citties and Townes, they of one trade, or of one band, haue certaine houfes ordained to assemble themselves in. Euery Village (almost) hath a house by it selfe, which they call the house of good company: because they there meete, onely to maintaine loue and amity. The men doe meete there often, and sometimes the women are invited thither, to sitte and banquet with their husbands. They do not vse any sumptuous dishes or delicacies, but most often content themselves with one or two kindes of meates. Many times euery neighbour bringeth his dish, and there feed friendly together, on that which was provided for their owne priuate houfes. And as among the Lacedemonians it was ordained, that aged men and Magistrates should be present at banquets, to the ende, that euery man should carry himselfe honestly: the very very fame is practised in Switzerland, so that all of one Trade, or of one Brotherhood, haue their distinct places, and the Magistrate, with the most ancient men, haue the higher end of the Table allotted to them.

They do not much delight in Musick at such Banquets, because they conceiue more pleasure in conferring together: either of particular affaires, or (oftentimes) of publike businesse. About all, when one of the most aged begins to discourse on some notable matters, which happened in his youth, or that himselfe had learned from his predecessors; euery one is very attentive, without the least interruption. And many times, he that hath a good & pleasing tongue, will speake loud enough on the faire deferuings of his Ancestors. The ancient Switzers were very sober & modest in all things, especially at publike Feasts and Banquets: so that it is a matter rare & most ignominious, if any man should be drunke in such an assembly.

But I am enforced to write, and to my great griefe, that although there is more moderation in the Switzers Banquets, euen at this day, then in many other people of Germany: yet notwithstanding, drunkennesse will not be banished, nor so vily thought on, as in elder times it hath bene. And as Xenophon saide of the Lacedemonians (whose common-wealth hee had most highly commended) that hee durst not maintaine now in his time, that the lawes of Lycurgus were in full force, because in former times, sober and moderate people, affected rather to liue among them in great continence, then to be Lords in other Citties, where they might possesse worlds of riches: So now in the time of Xenophon, the Lacedemonians, yea, them of greatest power among them, contended to haue the gouernment of citties, as fearing they should be compelled to liue in their owne particular condition, glorifying themselves openly, of their wealth and riches. And whereas their Ancestors were studious, to make themselves become honourable, & worthy of giuing command to others: these men couched after dignities onely. So that whereas the Grecians (on their owne meere motion) made request to the Lacedemonians, that they would accept of the gouernment: matters became so contrarily changed, that the Grecians prayed & exhorted one another, to resist against the Lacedemonians, yea, and to expulse the vicerly, fearing lest they should vsurpe vpon the gouernment.

It appeareth now to me, that euen as much may be said of the Switzers: for I must needs confesse, that the frugality & temperance of our auncients, in eating, drinking, cloathing, and in the whole course of life, is dead, or as if it had neuer bene at all. The Switzers are not now so continent and spare in liuing, as heerebefore, when they maintained their liues with the labour both of their mindes and hands, without taking wages of Kings & Princes, strangers to them. And therefore I am much afraid, lest we lose that wholly too, which yet remaineth, namely, valiancy and strength in warre, humanity, debonary, iustice, and vprightnesse. So that one day, they who (heretofore) haue so carefully compassed amity & alliance with the Switzers: it is to bee doubted, may change their mindes, and study how they shall best subdue them. I desire of God, that he will turne from my country to deadly a danger; and I desire also, and exhort all them that ought to think thereon, to strue to bring in vse againe those honest ancient manners, that frugality, continence, equity, humanity, loyalty, & constancy of the olde Switzers in al their actions.

CHAP. III.

Of publike assemblies and meetings, or rather of the Councill and Senate of the Switzers.

In all Commonwealths, three things are especially to be considered, to wit, the Councill or Senate, the Magistrate, and Iustice; for the Common-wealth of the Switzers hath no common Magistrates: except wee may place in that ranke, the Bayliffes and Gouernors, which are sent here and there, not by the councell of the Common-wealth, but by each one of the Cantons in it selfe. For the rest, the coun-

The councell of the Switzers not equal always.

The Ambassadors have their assemblies according to their causes.

councell of Switzerland is not always equal in number; for sometimes, one & beside the Cantons, the other allies and confederates, especially the Ambassadors of S. Gall, of the Grisons, and of Mulhouse, doe meete together. And then this is the very greatest councell, which doe assemble but rarely, and to conferre on peace or warre, or of other affaires, which appertain equally to all the confederates.

Ofteft of all other, there do none but the Ambassadors of the thirteen cantons meete together, to consult and advise on matters of the Common-wealth. Every man of them hath a deliberative voyce, as well as the other, and therefore, though one Canton do send two Ambassadors: yet they shall have but one voyce, & one aduice, because the aduice is collected according to the number of the Cantons, and not to the number of Ambassadors. Neuerthelesse, all the Cantons do not send their Ambassadors at all daies meetings; as when there is question of the Bayliwicks, governed by the seauen or eight first Cantons, or of other things on them depending: then seuen or eight Ambassadors onely meete together, & haue their deliberative voyces. But if there be any speech concerning the Bayliwicks of Italy, belonging to the twelve first Cantons: then those twelve Ambassadors doe assemble. And as for that which concerneth the good of the whole Common-wealth: the Ambassadors of the thirteene Cantons, do then make a perfect & complete body of councell.

In our times, since Switzerland became diuided into factions, by reason of differences happening in Religion, they likewise instituted particular assemblies: so that the five Cantons of Lucerna, Uri, Schwitz, Unterwald, and Zug, that make expresse profession of the Religion and Ceremonies of the Romane Church, & are very strictly vnited together, by especiall amity (I know not whether it bee by league or alliance) they meete together more often then the other cantons, and are (as it were) a councell apart. And therefore, when speech is made of the five small Cantons, they before named are vnderstood, and not the five first in alliance. As also in making mention of three, of seuen, or of eight Cantons: it must be considered according to the time and order, when they were entred into league; as thus, Uri, Schwitz, Unterwald, Lucerna, and Zurich, shall be the five Cantons. Sometimes they of Fribourg and of Sollewre, assemble themselves with the five forenamed, and call themselves the seuen catholike Cantons. Now, although any in the cantons of Glaris and Appenzell, doe belong to the catholike Church, & Masse is sung in their cheefest Villages: yet notwithstanding, they are not ranked among the catholikes, because (for the most part) their people walke with them that are of the new Religion. Finally, the foure Cities, to wit, Zurich, Berne, Basile, and Schaffouse, haue likewise (sometimes) their assembly apart; but yet it is not so often as the other.

Moreover, it is very vncasie to decipher particularly, all those things whereon the councell of Switzers do deliberate: neuerthelesse, I will touch some of the principall articles. The first and cheefest, is concerning war and peace, as likewise mention is made in most part of the alliances, that if a great wrong is done to one of the cantons, and it thinketh good to haue reason by armes: it must first be referred to the councell of the leagues, to the end that the Ambassadors may regard together, whether the cause of warre bee iust, or no, lest warre should bee lightly moued, and vpon triuiall occasions. Then afterward, if it appeare to bee expedient to begin warre, and for the safety of the common-wealth, the meanes must next be consulted on.

It chanced (in my time) that Christopher Landberg, being leagued with many Gentlemen, furiously to invade them of Rottuile, allied to the Cantons: many said, that such succour ought to be sent to Rottuile, as the inhabitants desired. But the greater part of the Senators, and Deputies to the councell of Switzerland, haue vnderstood the causes of the variance; hindred any such proceeding. For they saw plainly, that the whole State would overthrow it selfe into very great perill, and vpon silly occasion: because there was pregnant apparance, that by invading Landberg, they must thereby meddle with the Duke of Wirttemberg his neighbour, to whom the Switzers hadde bene good friends a long time. Nor could they come so neere him, without irritainating (by the same meanes) many other Princes, that were his kindred, friends, and confederates. Neuerthelesse, because they of Rottuile should not complain, that they were forsaken in such a necessity: fifty Soldiers of each Canton were sent as a Garrison to their Towne, but they stayed at Schaffouse, and (soone after) the difference was pacified by Judges, chosen for eyther side. And as the councell deliberated on the matter of warre, and whether it should be begun, or no: peace also was treated on by the same councell, and not by the Cantons in particular.

According hereto, in the warre of Snaba, all the Cantons together sent their Ambassadors to Basile, where they made peace with the Emperor Maximilian. So the councell of Switzerland, assembling at Fribourg; made perpetuall peace with the King, and all the Realme of France, in the year, 1516. The negotiation of alliances, is ioynd with that of peace: for very often in the dayes of our ancestors, and in ours also, the Cantons (by aduice of their councell) haue made alliances with neighbouring Kings and Princes. Wherin this order is kept still to this day, that no one of the Cantons can bee constrained to make alliance with a strange Prince, but is to remaine at his owne liberty. As in the year, 1519. when all the cantons allied themselves with king Frances; they of Zurich refused to be bound, and afterward, they of Berne renounced this alliance. In like manner, when Philibert, Duke of Sauoye, obtained to enter league and amity with the Switzers: first the five small cantons began, and then Sollewre ioynd with them afterward.

The second Article, of such things as the councell of Switzerland do ordaine, concerneth lawes and ordinances. Each Canton hath his lawes and customes by himselfe, which remaine firme and inuiolable: neuerthelesse, by a common consent, our ancestors deuised and established many publique Edicts and Ordinances. Among which number, are the forementioned lawes of warre: wherewith also may the accord at Stantz bee ranked, passed betweene the eight first Cantons, and wherof we haue spoken in the first booke. Also, because Priests abused their immunities and priuiledges; they were repro-

ued by a publique Edict, containing this in effect. Whosoever of the citizens or inhabitants of the cantons, be hee Priest or no, be hee a Counceller, Vassalle, or bound to the Princes of Austria: he shall stand bound neuerthelesse, and promise by oath to his canton, to procure & aduance the profite therof, and of all the confederates, and discover speedily and in good conscience, all that may bring them any damage. This oath shall precede all other, and no obligation, how expresse soeuer it be, shall excuse them, if they go aginst this oath.

Such Priests as dwell in Switzerland, and are not of the country, may draw no man into ciuill or ecclesiasticall iustice, out of the country; except in matrimoniall and ecclesiasticall causes. If any one dare do otherwise, the Magistrates of the canton wherein he dwelleth, shall prohibit all men, not to harbour, lodge, or friend him, nor to frequent his company: none shall presume to protect him, vntill such time as hee hath renounced all forraigne iustice, and payed the charges of the party, that receiued endamage by such iustice. Whosoever shall doe wrong to his neighbour, eyther in taking pawns against order of right, or by any other meanes: he shall be punishable in body and goods, vntill hee haue satisfied the party. He that is not of the Church, and yet hath summonsd his aduersary, eyther before a Iudge of the Church, or secular, and out of the country: he shall pay all the charges endured in that cause, in regard hee ought to pleade in the same place, where the party dwelleth. No man shall assigne ouer his action to another, by which meanes he may the easier afflict the contrary party.

If any man shall renounce his Bourgeship, and thereby do wrong to another, by drawing him into strange iustice: hee shall neuer bee receiued againe into the number of the citizens, till first hee haue made satisfaction to the party. All the cantons shall take order, that the waies be sure and safe, because both Switzers & strangers may passe securely, conveying their Merchandizes through the country, without any manner of violence done to them: whosoever shall attempt otherwise, by common consent of all, and our helpe to the vicermost, hee shall be compelled pelled to make satisfaction, answerable to the faculties and riches as the party hath lost. No man in any Canton whatsoever, shall receive pawnee or pledge of any other, without consent of the Magistrate: neither shall do, or procure any injury to be done to his neighbour; but hee that doth the contrary, shall be compelled by them of his Canton, to satisfie the other to the uttermost damage.

All these things before recited, were agreed on, and ordained by the fixe cantons of Zurich, Lucerna, Uri, Suits, Underwald, and Zug. There was another Edict also published, against many Brokers of Benefices, for in regard that such fellows did oftentimes cause much trouble vnto Priests, made by the Ordinaries of the places, and (vnder colour of some purchased Bulles) were so put in possession of vacant Benefices: It was concluded by common consent of all the thirteen cantons, in the year, 1520. that if such people pursued to maintain the right of such Bulles, they should be imprisoned, where if they did not renounce those Bulles, they should be drowned. I could set downe many other examples, of Edicts & publike lawes, but I thinke needlesse: and these formerly rehearsed, are to no other end, but to let the Reader perceiue, that the ancient Switzers, who were devoutly affected to their Religion, and cuermore gaue great honor to men of the church, did neuer yet (for all that) leaue the bridle so freely to them, or admit them any such licence, as was contrary to publike liberty and tranquillity.

If any Embassages were to bee sent out of Switzerland, for the appointing of some difference, contracting of alliance, gratifying some Prince, or exhorting some one to this or that, or else to command or declare some matters of import, or to denounce warre: Say also, that it were in Switzerland, to negotiate with some Canton, City, Towne, &c: The councill consults and determines what is to be done in this case: as whether it is necessary to send ambassadours of all the Cantons, or of some few onely.

When there is a question in hand, for contracting alliances or leagues, all the Cantons do then send ambassadours: As when the alliance was made and signed with King Henry, not onely the Cantons, but also the confederates sent their ambassadours to the King. But in many other affaires, they name but foure or five Cantons, who send Embassages in the name of all. As the ambassadours of Zurich, Lucerna, Uri, and Glaris went to the day at Ambourg, & obtained of the Emperor Ferdinand, confirmation of the priuileges for their owne cantons, and for all the rest likewise. Moreover, this councill hath charge, with reference to the Lords that assist them, to aduise on what is to bee negotiated, or answering ambassadours of Kings and Princes strangers, and also of other common-wealths, as they are oftentimes met withall, in the publike assemblies of the Switzers.

Finally, the councill aduiseeth to provide for the Prouinces, which do belong to the Cantons, to the end, they may be gouerned as best becometh. First of all, because that some estates are of great profit, as of Secretaries, Commisaires, Officers, Interpreters, Landmanns, &c. Landweibel in the country of Turgow (where of the first, to wit, the Landman is Iudge criminal, in name of the ten first Cantons, and the other is as ordinary Prosecutor or Atturney) the councill commits these estates to certaine men, who cannot (in meane while) chuse Officers vnder them, answerable to their appetite. Moreover, if some difficult processe or suite happen in a Prouince, and the Gouernors or Bayliffes will not iudge according to their aduice: the whole busines is referred ouer to the councill, where if the sentence of the Bayliffes seeme to bee vnjust to eyther of the parties, they may appeale to the maine Senate or Council of the Switzers.

As for causes in the Bayliwicks and Gouernments beyond the Mountaines, the ambassadours (which are yearly sent thither in the Moneth of Iune) doe take knowledge of them, and end them. But for other suites on this side the Mountaines, the councill of Bada doth iudge them: And appeale also may be made from the sentence of the ambassadours that haue giuen iudgement beyond the Mountaines, to the councill of Bada; because that authority is greater, and their power more ample. Yet some say no, and that the appeale is to be addressed to the Cantons: that each of them may vnder-

(stand the matter, and by them the difference to be decided. Also the Gouernors and Bayliffes, are to render an account to the councill, of the tolles, reuenues, and fines: the annual reuenues are distributed by equal portion among the Cantons, to whom the Bayliwicks do appertaine. There is the like also of the Abbeyes in those Bayliwicks, the protection and gouernment whereof (in temporal occasions) do belong to the Cantons. In briefe, the councill doth know all things, which concerne the administration of the Prouinces appertaining to the Cantons; they cause the Gouernors to render their accounts; they giue audience to whosoever can accuse them, and they punish them, if they haue deserved it; eyther by depriving them of their dignities, or returning them to the Cantons that established them, to haue some other sent in their stead. To speake all in one word, the councill takes knowledge of all matters that concerne the good and tranquillity of the common-wealth: as well in the Gouernments and Bayliwicks, as also in the Cantons themselves.

Now concerning the authority of calling, and assembling the councill, for the demanding of their aduice: it hath belonged (of ancient time) to the Canton of Zurich; which by a very authenticall priuledge, holds the cheefest ranke among all the Cantons. Whensoever then there is question made, to hold a generall councill of the nation: the Lords of Zurich make knowne by their Letters to each of the Cantons, both the time & the place where they are to meete together. If any one, or more of the cantons, do thinke it necessary, that the councill publike and general should be assembled; first they giue aduertisement to the canton of Zurich, and require by their letters, that the Ambassadours of the other cantons may meet together. But if the affairs are pressiue, and require speedy deliberation, then each canton must aduertise his confederates, to be in readinesse for aduising (altogether) on that which is to bee done.

Likewise the Ambassadours from Kings and Princes strangers, do demand leaue of the cantons, to present themselves at those dayes of meetings: & sometimes they make request, that one day (extraordinary) may be held for them. But on the dayes of particular meetings, they proceed otherwise, because Zurich signifies the time to foure Townes: and when to five or seuen catholike cantons; they of Lucerna do assemble them. There are also daies of and for particular meeting of the cantons allied to the K. of France: whose Ambassador residing at Solleurre, calleth the cantons at the Kings charge. I thinke there is permission also, for the ambassadours of the Pope, and of other kings, friends, and allies to the Switzers, to demand their dayes: provided, they are at their Masters expences.

The ancient Switzers had no perpetuall or certaine place, for holding their daies of generall councill: for I am perswaded, there is no one of the first eight cantons, but they made an assembly at some times, though most often it was done at Lucerna, at Zurich, Bremgarten, and at Bada. In our time, the custome hath bene (not by any law or ordinance purposely made for it) that the Switzers kept their dayes at Bada, in the Townehouse: and so much the rather, because the Towne hath many commodities for such assemblies. First, the place is beautified with goodly buildings and very apt Innes or houses of lodging. The situation of the place is pleasant and healthfull, and the neerenesse of the Ba hes yeele wonderfull pleasure, drawing thither great resort of people from farre remote countries. By means whereof, the neighbouring people of Bada, (feeling the gaines sweetnesse) bring thither all kinds of victuals in great abundance, which causeth the Towne to be well furnished with all good prouision, and at all needfull seasons.

Next, it is seated (almost) in the midst of Switzerland, so that the cantons furthest off, may appeare there (by neerenesse of wayes) all at one and at the same time. Also it appertaineth to the eight first cantons, & (by that meanes) the most part of the cantons are Lords thereof, and haue equal authority in the place. of Strasbourg, that then sent their Ambassadors thither. The catholike Cantons do oftentimes assemble at Lucerna, sometimes at Basel, in the territory of Vrioz, or at Brünen, which belongeth to them of Suits. But when the Ambassador of France demandeth (in his Kings name) a leuye of men of the Switzers, the day is oftentime held at Solenneure, where he entreateth the Cantons to be present: and sometimes also it is at Lucerna.

The custome is, that (every yeare) dayes of meeting are held at Bada, about mid-June. Then the Bayliffes or Governors appertaining to the Cantons, yeeld a reason of their feuerall charges before the councill, and attend to the ending of suites concerning the Prouinces. At the same time, the Ambassadors of the twelue first Cantons, do meete at Lugano, & take an account of the foure Bayliffes for the Prouinces of Italy, and iudge the causes of appeal: but yet in such sort as a man may appeale from them, to the Councill or Parliament of Bada, it being of farre greater authority. The councill so assembled, they sit by ordination of the Cantons, to ende such controuersiall cases, as were not concluded on at the precedent meeting: for oftentimes causes of importance are not ended at the first Session, either because they appeare not of sufficient merit, or want due power of prooff. In regard whereof, they are referred ouer to a further day, and in the meane while, the Ambassadors craue aduice of the Lord of their feuerall Cantons, to know how they shall carry themselves therein. Sometimes also, in an vnexpected accident, or some other such case of consequence: the Canton of Zurich, or some other, will assigne the day, especially if it be a matter concerning the common-wealth. Now, although the Councill are assembled only for publike affaires; yet notwithstanding, after they haue taken order for them, if any particulars of the Prouinces come, and would haue their causes pleaded, they giue them audience. But the particular dayes of the Cantons, and those that the Ambassador of France causeth to bee held; haue no certainty of time, but according as occasions offer themselves, & as it is pleasing to them that haue power to assemble the councill.

Cantons.

The manner of proceeding on these daies of meeting is thus. At the day assigned by the ordinary councill, or commanded to be kept: the day before, the Ambassador for the canton of Zurich sends the Lieutenant of Bada to all the lines and houses of receipt, to know what Ambassadors are come, to whom the Lieutenant giueth kinde welcome, and receiue them honourably, in name of the whole Switzers common-wealth, and the morrow after, he calleth the to come to the Town-house. If the Ambassadors of all the cantons are come, they are called, and then they treat on affaires concerning all the Cantons together. But if vpon the day named, they for the new Cantons, as for Schaffhouse, Solenneure, and Fribourg are not as yet arrived, as oftentimes it comes so to passe: then seuen or eight Cantons do assemble, and discourse on matters only concerning themselves.

The Ambassadors are seated in councill, according to the order & number of the Cantons, so that he of Zurich sits in the highest and most eminent place, he of Berne next; then he of Lucerna, & so consequently the other, according to the order of the Cantons. Being seated, the ambassador of Zurich salueth them all, and hauing made some breefe preface & excuse, according to custome; he declareth, which the Ambassadors had in charge on the last dayes meeting, and referred them to the next dayes deliberation, as oftentimes they are assembled to that effect, and if any thing hath hapned since then, he propoundeth it also. Then he addeth that which his Lords haue giue him in charge, touching the Article whereon he is to deliberate: the other ambassadors do the like in their ranke, & declare whatfoeuer their Lords commanded them. After that euery one hath made knowe that which they haue in charge to say: the Bayliffe or Governor of Bada (of whatfoeuer Canton it is) demandeth orderly of each counsellor, his aduice concerning the matter that hath bin in question. The he of Zurich speaketh first, and the rest after, according to their ranke. Hauing all spoken, the Bayliffe counterth the voyces, according to the number of the Cantons and not of the counsellors: for sometimes one Canton sends two ambassadors, who may well assist in councill, yet they haue but one voyce, as of one man onely.

Thus you see how they proceed in deciding those things, which concerne the publike good: In particular causes also, they follow the same order, giue their aduice, and collect the voyces. But such as haue any causes to pleade on these daies, demand audience first of the Ambassador for Zurich, who assigned their day, & put their names vpon the Role. When they appeare before the councill, sometimes the parties themselves will pleade their owne causes: or haue Advocates, Proctors, or speakers, which they bring with them, or chuse among such as they finde in Bada. For at all times, and whensoever these dayes are appointed, there will meet there a great number of such men, belonging to the neighbouring Townes & Burroughs, pensioners of the Switzers. Causes are there debated, not according to the ciuill Law, nor by the aduice of Lawyers; but with equity, and according to the lawes & customes of the people, long time obserued among them.

I know, that many will account this forme of pleading, to be barbarous, especially such as would haue men follow the Romanes order of pleading, for the ending of suites: without which (they say) the very wisest men do wrong themselves often, in the deciding of difficult causes, and matters of importance. As for my selfe, I thinke well of the Romanes lawes, written by men very wise and skilfull in affaires, and I will not infringe their authority in any manner whatsoever. But yet I say, that the proceeding obserued by the Switzers, for ending controuersiall cases, is to be preferred before that which is vsed among other Iudges, that giue sentence according to the Romanes lawes. And I am well assured, that mine opinion cannot be reiected, but by ill-disposed & wrangling spirits. For it cannot be denied, that many Advocates and Attornies, are much more careful for maintaining the ciuill law, then cyther equity or right: considering, they do nothing else many times, but tie themselves to sillables, words, and termes of the law, which they expound according to their owne fancy, labouring to circumvent a party, and to take him by the nose, as we vse to say. And surely, they do nothing but for the benefit of their owne purses, troubling themselves ouermuch, to obscure and muffle vp matters; by which means, suites are made immortal, to the incuitable detriment & ruine of both parties, being brought (by them) to extreme poeury and misery.

In which respect, they gaue no very euill language, that teamed such practitioners and drablers, blood-suckers of the people: for they empty their purses, yea, and sucke them to the bare bones. And if among the Iustices of Switzerland, an error happen to be committed, in the decision of difficult causes, which cometh very sildome to passe: yet notwithstanding, it causeth no such harme, as doth the length and immortalizing of suites. So I may well say, that the manner of proceeding among the Switzers, doth lessen expences, ease the people, cuts vp the rootes of lingering suites and differences: because the sentence doth sooner resolute both the parties, and brings them to agreement: whereas in other places, we see suites encrease day by day, and from one case vndecided, growes a great number of nouel variances.

CHAP. IIII.

Concerning Sentences and Iudgements, in publike and peculiar differences.

Hauing thus made mention of the councill, and daies of audience among the Switzers; we are now to speake, concerning such sentences and iudgements as they vse to giue. If any suite doth happen betwene particular persons in the Bayliwicks: the Bayliffes or Governors are Iudges in those places, or else the Canton (from whence the appellation ariseth) taketh knowledge, and iudgeth thereof. But the Iustices of euery Canton do iudge (each one within his iurisdiction) in the causes & differences of the Subiects. Beside this, there is iustice for publike suites, which are variances, happening betwene two or more Cantons, or betwene some particulars against a Canton: and such condition as the Cantons haue, the same also their confederates haue.

Thus then, for the deciding of such differences, each of the parties doe chuse two Iudges for either side, who are absolved of the oath which they have taken to their Canton: and promise to iudge according to right and equity, and labour that the suite may bee lovingly and very speedily accorded, or iudicially ended.

By the ancient alliances, there were certain places appointed, for the ending of such suites. The seven first Cantons sent their ambassadors and arbitrators to the Abbey of the Hermitage, to end their such suites as happened among them. By an article of very ancient alliance with them of Glaris, it is expressly said: that if they had any suite with them of Vri, the assembly should be at Merch. If against the canton of Switz, the arbitrators should meete at Bergeraz: and at Brinnen, if against them of Vnderwald. And then the other Cantons, having had knowledge of the cause, pronounced the sentence. The Bernians, and the three Cantons of Vri, Switz, and Vnderwald, assembled at a place named Daskienholz. They of Zurich and Berne, at Lofing. The Fribourgers & they of Sollewre, having a suite against the eight first Cantons, or some of them, sent their Iudges to Zufinge; and if they were defendants, to Wilshof. As for the causes of them of Basile, Schaffouse, and Appenzell, they pleaded them at Bada, together with them of these Cantons, allied with them of Rottville and of Mulhouse. But the differences of them of S. Gall, were determined in the Abbey of the Hermitage: and them of the Grisons, at Wallenstad, which is a Towne at the ende of the Lake of Rine, in the Bayliwick of Sargans.

When then some difference happeneth, which cannot bee kindly accorded, and that the enmity of the Cantons serveth to no purpose: the arbitrators and ambassadors of the Cantons that are in suite, do meete at the place appointed, & (with them) the ambassadors of the other Cantons confederates, who come thither to atone the parties; and to make some amiable composition. The Iudges and Arbitrators being assembled, after that the parties have pleaded their causes: if the Iudges take resolution, & give sentence, the parties must (of necessity) be contented. But if they be of diuers opinions (as many times it happeneth) and that there are as many voyces on the one side, as on the other, then a fitt Iudge or arbitrator is chosen, whom they call Ein obmann, or Ein gmeinen mann. He giueth no sentence at all, but only appeareth one of those, which the arbitrators have pronounced. Sometimes the Iudges themselves do chuse the odde arbitrator: yet in such sort notwithstanding, that he is a man of one of the Cantons, no medler with eyther party, nor having any interest in the cause.

The alliance of the seven first Cantons, makes mention of this election and choise: as that of Fribourg, that of Sollewre, that of Appenzell, and them of S. Gall and of Mulhouse. It is added to the articles of the alliance of Schaffouse, that if the Iudges cannot accord, by choise of another arbitrator, taken from one of the Cantons; they shall then take one of the Lords of the councill of S. Gall. And in the alliance of Rottville, command is given to the Iudges, to chuse for an odde arbitrator, one of the Lords of the councill of S. Gall or of Mulhouse. Sometimes also the complainant chuseth. As if the Bernians have a suite against the three first Cantons, or any one of them; the Cantons that name sixteen men, out of which number, the Bernians are to chuse a sub-arbitrator. But if they bee defendants, the Cantons will then (for sub-arbitrator) chuse one of the Lords of the lesser councill of Berne. If some difference fall betweene them of Zurich, and of Berne; the complainants chuse for an odde arbitrator, one of the defendants Lords of the councill. The same is obserued in suites for them of Basile, against the other cantons; and so in the Grisons causes.

Thus you see how the Switzers gouerne themselves, in the deciding of controuersiall suites betweene the common-wealths. I know very well, that some may dispute subtilly, both for, and against this order there obserued: but I will leaue that discourse to the Readers. For mine own part, I admire the simplicity and integrity of our ancestors, who by such manner of proceeding, haue often brought to end very great variances, and carefully conferred publike peace and concord. But they did not regard their owne particular profit, neither desired any thing more, then to see their country peaceable and flourishing. If now each man had no other meaning, but would aime at that mark: so many suites would not be seene, and easily might those be appeald, that are the hottest attempted.

CHAP. V.

Of those Common-wealths, which are in each of the several Cantons.
And first, of the Common-wealths of Zurich, Basile, and Schaffouse.

HAuing thewne already how the whole Common-wealth of the Switzers is gouerned in common: it behoueth now to make mention, of the Common-wealth in each distinct Canton. Now it seemeth to me, that the common-wealths of the thirteene Cantons, may bee referred to three formes. For as there are three names of soueraign Magistrats and Cantons, so haue they likewise as many formes of common-wealths; differing not onely in name, but also in the things themselves.

In some certain Cantons, the cheefe Commanders or Heads of the councill, are called Ammans. This is obserued in the Cantons that haue no Citties or Townes, but Villages onely, hauing a popular estate, and the foueraignty appertaining to the people; by whose aduice, the very greatest affaires of importance are decided. Of this number are Vri, Switz, Vnderwald, Zug, Glaris, and Appenzell.

The other Cantons haue their citties and townes, which haue the foueraignty: yet in such manner, as there are two formes of common-wealths. For the citties and townes, especially such as haue bene built by some Princes, or some times haue bene subiected to them: are gouerned by an Auget, whom they call, Schultheiss, (who is cheefe of the councill) and by some number of counsellers chosen by free election, from and by the whole number of citizens. The forme of this common-wealth is Aristocraticall among all the other: and in this manner are gouerned the common-wealths of Berne, Lucern, Fribourg, and Sollewre.

There are other citties and townes diuided by certaine companies, by each whereof, and by voyce of such men as are in euery of them, the Lords of the councill are elected, and the soueraign Magistrate or cheefe of the councill, who by them is termed Burgermeister, that is to say, Master of the Bourges, which we in a shorter word call Bourgmesser. Such are the common-wealths of Zurich, Basile, and Schaffouse. Now we are to speake of these diuers formes of common-wealths in order, beginning with the last, first.

First then, all the people of these Townes free and Imperiall, were diuided into two ranks: the one of Noblemen, the other of Yeomen. The Noblemen had a Society by themselves, apart, which the Allemaignes or Germans did call, Ein Geselechaft, and they of Zurich, Ein Constaell.

In elder times, in the city of Basile, which is very spacious, and for the multitude of Noblemen, they were diuided into two societies, bandes, or companies of Noblemen. Oftentimes they were in quarrels, and had the foueraignty: so that out of the one copany they chose the Confull, and out of the other, the Tribune or Capitaine of the city, which is the estate of greatest authority, next vnto that of Confull or Bourgmesser.

Neuerthelesse, afterward the Noblemen lost this foueraignty, or else forsook their right voluntarily. For at the time of the councill of Basile, when Lewis, then Dolphin of France, brought (very neere to Basile) an Army of Armignacks, in fauour of Pope Eugenius, and the Duke of Austria; many Gentlemen of Basile, went and ioynd with that Army, in regard whereof, they were all banished, and their posterity deprived & excluded from all publike honours.

Afterward, when the Burgesse (by common consent) made alliance with the ten Cantons of the Switzers, in the year, 1501. the most part of the Noble-men, who hated the Switzers: dislodged from the city, and withdrew themselves to Castles heere and there, so that their authority diminished greatly then, and all the rest was lost in the year, 1529. For by the Sermons & exhortations of Oecolampadius, the doctrine and ceremonies of the Church were reformed, by order sent from the council, against which, many Noblemen opposed themselves. And although they could not hinder the change of Religion, yet they abandoned and left the city, and would not abide in it.

After which time, the two companies whereof we spake, entered in againe, and got possession of some private houses, & as yet they keepe those houses to themselves, and they belong to the whole body of the Nobility. And those houses are called in their language, Zunmünster and zum brunnen, but yet none of this is of the council. For although the council do meete together (almost) every day, and the Gentlemen (having forsaken the city) dwell most part of the time in their Castles: by common aduice of the Burgeses, they were excluded from governing in the common-wealth, which they had renounced voluntarily. Neuertheless, some noble Families that dwell in the city, & haue had care of the common-wealth with the other Bourgeses, are in ranke of the foure first companies or supporters of the city, and (in them) are chosen to be of the council. And therefore, to do them honour, in regard of their condition; these Tribes or companies are called Berrenmünster, that is to say, the companies of Lords.

Therefore, there are no more companies of these Noblemen in Basile, but those that are distinguished with the other Bourgeses. But at Zurich and at Schaffouse, the Noblemen haue their companies apart by themselves. And they of Zurich haue this priuiledge beside, above the tribes and companies of Trademen, to take the moiety that is, the most part of the Lords of the council, from forth the company of these Noblemen: so that they are as a counterpoise to the other companies. Notwithstanding, there is some difference among these Noblemen, for the Families of race, that are very noble and ancient: they do make a band by themselves, and they are called Die Stubler, by reason of the place where they assemble apart by themselves, by right & especiall priuiledge. To the whole body of these tribes or companies, are ioyned many citizens, which are not of any trade nor traffick: in which respect, they may haue place in one company, rather then in another. Porters, Labourers, Burden-bearers, and other such like manner of people, who when warre happeneth, are held and reputed to be of this body of companies, which they call Sin Cowstall, and receive wages: they haue a voice in electing the Master of the whole body of companies, and he is of the Seigneuries council, in regard of his place.

Beside the Society and Company of Noblemen, the people of those cities & townes there, are parted into certaine tribes or companies, which the Germans call Zunft. The word (it may be) taketh name or original, of Zamenkunft, which signifieth to meete and assemble themselves in company. Some interpret them to be Tribes, others, Courts, and others, Colledges or Abbeyes: but wee will call them Tribes or Companies. The number of them is not equall in the forenamed Cities and Townes. For there are fifteene at Basile: whereof the foure first are esteemed more noble then the other, and are called the companies of Lords, as already hath bene said. The first tribe or company, is that of Merchants. The second of Gold-smiths, Goldfiners, founders, and Pewterers. The third is of Merchants dealing onely in wines: with whom the Notaries, Masters of Hospitals, Spitzles, and other such like communities are ioyned. The fourth is of Merchants dealing in Silkes, and of Factors for all States: This company is the very greatest of them all. The other eleuen, are of all sorts of trades and handycrafts men.

Now there is a dozen or twelue tribes or companies at Zurich: heerefore they were thirteene in number, when many Drapers & workers in wooll dwelt there: for that was one company by itselfe. But nowadaies, the weauers of woollen cloth, and other things, are ioyned into one company with the Fullers and Diars. At Schaffouse there are eleuen companies onely: neuertheless, it falleth out many times, that diuers trades are ioyned together in one company. They haue their meetings by themselves: as at Zurich, the Millers and Bakers, the Barbers and Chirurgions, the Smiths and Metall men. So at Basile, the Fishermen and Marri-ners or Barquers, the Cordwainers and Curriers, the Taylors & Skinners. These companies are diuided, and they are called Spaltue Zunft. For when there is question of cheefe Trades, and especially workmen in them, their houses of meetings and assemblies are by themselves. But in things that concern the common-wealth, and when, and where all ought to be present, to elect Lords of the council, or the Zunft-Masters, who must be also in the council; every man speaks his minde, and giues his voyce.

Out of each of these companies, some men are chosen, as many of one company as of another, to be Lords of council. In every city there are two publike councils, which haue the principall authority: as namely, the great council, when as a good number of counsellors meete together, in name of all the people: as is vied in the affaires of greatest importance, and which do appertaine to the whole common-wealth. Next, the lesser council, who meete together every day, about the common-wealths businesse, and take knowledge of differences happening among the citizens. The great council of Zurich, consisteth of two hundred me: That of Basile, is of two hundred forty foure: and that of Schaffouse, is of foure score and sixe.

As concerning the lesser council of Zurich, it is of fifty: that of Basile hath threescore and foure: and that of Schaffouse, hath but twenty sixe. For out of each tribe or company, twelue are taken for the great council: except at Zurich, where they elect eightene of the Nobility. At Zurich also each company giueth three men for the lesser council: at Basile, foure; at Schaffouse, two. Next, in every of these cities, there are two Consuls or Bourgmasters, who are the cheefe and Presidents of council.ouer and beside these two, at Basile there are two Tribunes, who are cheefe in council with the Bourgmasters. Moreover, at Zurich the Noblemen send sixe from among them, to the lesser council: the other companies doe send each one but three. By the plurality of voyces, choise is made of sixe other men, out of such companies as the council do propose, to fill vp the number.

As concerning the election of counsellors (for so will wee hereafter call the Lords of the lesser council) it is done in manner following. Every year, about mid-Iune, and mid-December, all the citizens of Zurich assemble themselves together, every man in his tribe and company: and the elect a cheefe man, whom they call, Zunftmeister, that is to say, Master of the tribe or company. The custome of these three cities, is, that the companies haue two Masters: but one of them is in estate but sixe Moneths, at the end whereof, the other succeedeth him. Neuertheless, it often comes to passe, that hee who was Zunftmeister the halfe year before, is chosen againe. By this meane, the lesser council is diuided in two parts, to wit, the old & new. Such as haue bene in charge the first sixe Moneths, we terme them of the olde council; for although they be called whe the council is helde, yet notwithstanding, it is not alwayes so done, and there are many matters which passe in the new council onely.

The great council of Basile is diuided in the same manner, and of twelue which is taken from each company, there are sixe of the new council, and sixe of the olde. Beside the Zunftmeisters, the lesser council of Zurich chuseth one counsellor from each of the companies: but the lesser council of Basile chuseth two. These counsellors thus elected, with the other which we haue said to be chosen extraordinarily at Zurich, are diuided into two bands: whereof the one is the olde council, and the other the new. These two councils are changed euery sixe Moneths at Zurich; so that at their ending, the olde council electeth the new. At Basile, and at Schaffouse, they continue in the estate a whole yeare together.

The election of the council at Schaffouse, is made on the morrow after Pentecoste: and that of Basile, on Saterdag be-before the foure and twentieth day of June. At Zurich, the Zunftmeisters are elected by the companies in their houses of meeting; then the councill of two hundred confirmeth this election; but at Basile this confirmation belongeth to the olde councill. The voyce is given openly at Zurich, and secretly at Schaffouse. For in each tribe or company, charge is given to particular persons, to collect the voyce, whereupon they all come to them in order, and tell them closely in the eare, for whom they give voyce to be Zunftmeister. The lesser councill assemble at the oftenest, three times every weeke, and some whiles (vpon earnest occasion) four times. The old and new councillors of Zurich, are seated one by another, & sometimes one among another: but at Basile, the old councillors are above the younger. They haue also this custome, to withdraw often into another Hall, to consult together. After resolution is taken, a councillor of the first company, reporteth the aduice to the new councill: and they call the reporter Den Offner.

The Bourgmaster, whom they call Burgermeister, as much to say, as Master of the Bourgesles, is President of the old and new councill. The great councill electeth him by open voyce at Zurich; at Schaffouse by secret voyce: and at Basile, the olde councill first electeth the Bourgmaster, and the new councill the yeare following. The Bourgmaster is in state at Zurich, like Monerhs: but at Basile and Schaffouse, a whole yeare together, and turne by turne, the Bourgmasters and Councillers olde and new are changed. They whom at Basile they terme Zunftmeisters, and Oberstermeister at Zurich (as much to say, as Masters of companies and communities) doe second the Bourgmasters in their authority.

At Zurich there are three, and at Basile two, who with the two Bourgmasters are called the foure chiefe & principal Lords of the city. Nine other Lords of the lesser councill at Basile, are ioyned to these four in chiefe, and by reason of the number, they are called the councill of thirteene. They heare the causes of very greates importance, and deliberate on them first, before they propound any thing to the lesser councill: and therefore they may be called Preconsulters, or first councillers. Moreover, there is a particular councill at Zurich, whom wee may name the Chamber of accounts, for it manageth publicke affaires: and is composed of eight councillors, and haue the Bourgmaster of the olde councill for their President. Then is there two Purse-bearers or Treasurers, and the Superintendents for Ecclesiastical goods do assist them, together with foure other councillors, two of the olde, and two of the new councill. They take knowledge not onely of monies employed for the common-wealth: but oftentimes also, the younger councill demandeth their aduice in cases of importance, whereon they consult a while, and then giue their report to the yonger councill.

To these publicke councillers, there are alwayes two Secretaries assisting, with their committees, when necessity requireth. The first and chiefe is called Stattschreyber, that is to say, Secretary of the city. At Zurich, the other is called Indertschreyber, that is to say, sub-Secretary: but they of Basile call him Raatschreyber, that is, Secretary to the councill. There is a particular Secretary for the Chamber of Accounts, whom they of Zurich call Rechenstschreyber. The estate of Secretary in these cities is honorable, and of great gaine. In regard whereof, the Gentlemen strine to keepe it in their owne power, as sildome is it giuen to any other. These men are they (among all other) that know the lawes, customes, priuiledges, and all the secrets of the common-wealth.

Next to the councillers publicke, are Iustices of the city. There are two at Zurich, one for ciuill causes, Das Statgricht, which was in ancient times vnder power of the Nunnes, and the Abbesse elected the Lieutenant, or chiefe man in that kinde of iustice, whom they called Den Schultheissen, and his assessors or assistants: but now the election belongeth to the lesser or yonger councill. Their number is of eight, and they haue their Lieutenant, Secondary, and Sericant. To them appertaineth the knowledge of ciuill causes, Debtes, Hires, Lendings, Borrowings, Sales, and as the Smizers vse to say, they iudge Umb erth und eigen. There is no appeale from their sentence: but if there happen any difficult cause, they send it to the Councill.

The other Iustice, whom they call Das Zunftgricht, is a Iudgement of proccesse and suites, which happen for rents and yearly reuenues. The Secretary of the other Iustice, and two Lords of the yonger councill, it seemes doe daily assist for the ending of all such differences. In the bigger Basile there are two such kindes of Iustices, and a third in the lesser Basile. That Law or Iustice of greatest authority, which they terme also Das Statgricht, is composed of ten Iudges; one part whereof is of the councill, and the other, such as the people do name. They take knowledge of all causes, ciuill and criminall: but when there is question of testaments, wils, contracts, monies borrowed, and other such like things: the Prouost or Lieutenant of the city sitteth in Iudgement. As for causes criminall, the Prouost of the Empire iudgeth them. And there are three Lords of the councill, who do pursue criminall causes, by the sollicitation of one, who is an ordinary Attorney, named by them, Oberstenknecht, and keepeth company with the Iudges, having an advocate waiting on him.

These Iudgements are done publickly, and haue eight open audiences, where by all are permitted to be there present, to heare and see what fouer is done. But at Zurich and at Schaffouse, the new councill doth iudge the criminall causes. Neuerthelesse, the Bourgmaster doth not then sit: but it is the Prouost of the Empire, whom Rechtsvogt, or, Blutrichter, who presideth and collecteth the voyces. Every yeare the councill chuseth some one of that body, to exercise that charge. Proccesse and suites criminall are handled at Zurich, with the doores fast shut: but at Schaffouse in open Court, so that all men may vnderstand the accusations and defences. But the councill commandeth all to bee absent, when there is question of pronouncing sentence. The second order of Iustice at great Basile, iudgeth not but in cases of small importance, which hardly exceedeth the summe of ten pounds. But the Iustice of smaller Basile, hath a Iudge apart, & taketh knowledge of all causes, except of criminall.

There are two Courts, or kindes of Iustices at Schaffouse. The one which they call Das Schuldgricht, is law or iustice for debtes: for therein onely is ended differences of contracts, debtes, and such like things. And if the summe whereof question is made, doe amount aboue an hundred crownes, the councill then takes knowledge of it. In this Court are twenty assessors or assistants, to wit, one of each Tribe: moreover, eight other persons, chosen by the councill. The other order of Iustice is named Taggricht, or, Pfluggricht, that is to say, Iustice for fines and amercements: because the Prouost of the empire, or Iudge in causes criminall, presideth there, and condemneth all such forfeitures & fines. There are twelue assessors out of the twelue Tribes, and who are of the great councill. Causes criminall of lesser importance, are debated and ended in this Iustice there; as light iniuries, vulgar outrages, and such like. But when wordes do wound honour, and the wrong is not easie to bee dissembled or digested; the knowledge of such cases appertaineth to the lesser councill.

Beside what hath bene said, these three cities haue each one their particular councill, which they terme Ein Chorgricht, or, Begricht, where they discourse on causes of matrimony. For after that the religion was changed, the councill of the three cities established one councill: wherein were a certaine number of assistants, elected by publique suffrages, and taken out of the olde and new councill, and among whom were some Diuines or Theologians as they call them. Neuerthelesse, at Schaffouse none of the Ministers were assistants, but onely some learned men admitted to councill, who had each one as his adiunct, some Doctour of the Law. These Iudges take knowledge of all matrimoniall causes: punish whoredomes and adulteries; and haue charge to obserue the liues & manners of euery one.

Beside, in these common-wealths, bastards are deprived of all honours and dignity: nor is it lawfull for them to bee seene at the councill, nor in the Courts of Iustice. True it is, they are not guilty of that stain to their birth, neither can it bee denied, but that (oftentimes) bastards haue wonne more commendations for

for their virtues, then ever could their legitimate brethren: as we have an example of Iephia, a Judge of Gods owne people. But to bridle the leud concupiscences of many, and to conferre the dignity of sacred marriage: Bastards stand as branded with infamy, and ykefome eye-fores to well ordered common-wealths.

Next, hee that hath not dwelt tenne years within the city of Zurich, cannot be choſen to be one of the publike counsell.

Such as are borne out of Switzerland cannot be of the lesser counsell at Schaffouse: But if they be Bourgesſes of twenty yeares standing, they may be brought into the great counsell, & into the number of the Iudges.

I will not tell you that strangers are unworthy of these honors: but it is requisite first of all, that hee who ought to haue charge in a common-wealth, should be particularly affectioned and obliged thereto and afterward be well skilde and sence, in the lawes and customes of the country.

And me-thinks, citizens, and such as (from their youth) haue bene bred in a common-wealth; should haue more advantage therein, then strangers.

Moreover, there is nothing more pernicious to common-wealths, then enuies and despights, proceeding from such advancements to high degrees: as draw on partialities and factions, the danger whereof cannot be auoyded, when natural borne subjects are left despised, and ancient Families contemned, and charge of publike Officers giuen to strangers, & men of no merit.

Beside bastards and strangers, adulterers, murderers, and men made infamous for any crime: are (by a common law) excluded from counsell in these common-wealths.

Publike estates and conditions are of diuers kinde in these common-wealths, and in great number, according as the cities are peopled: we will make mention of the principals onely.

The highest degree, next after the Bourg-masters and Zurist-Masters, are such as haue charge of the publike monies: who are called in many places of Switzerland, Seckelmeister, as much to say, as Treasurers or Purse-bearers. At Basile there are three, named Dreyherren, that haue the keeping of the cities treasures. Besides them, there are three other, named Ladenherren, who manage the monies of the Imposts, Customs, and yearly reuenues of the common-wealth: They also pursue criminall causes, making themselves parties, by meanes of the ordinary Attorneys. At Zurich there are men (almost) in the selfe-same charge, whom they call Die Ambgeister; who manageth the tolle-monies of Corne and Wine, which they cause to be gathered by their committees. This tolle or taxation is not but on the Wine publicly sold, and on the Corne brought in from abroad: but for the wine & corne which the Bourgesſes eate and drinke in their houses, they pay not any thing.

Beside these two Treasurers of the common-wealth, there is a third at Zurich, for the reuenues of the Church, & he is called Der Klosteren obman: he gathereth certaine reuenues of the Abbeys; wherewith the Ministers wages are payed, the Churches maintained, and the poore cherished or releued, and the ouerplus remaining, is referred to ease the people in times of publike necessities. Some yeares past, the country of Zurich hauing bene afflicted with an extreme dearth of victuals: the receiver sold torne at a meane price to them of the city, and to most part of the Villages round about, bought with the referred money at the best rate, and thereby the Subjects of the Seigneury were greatly releued.

Next to these, there are other Officers, as they that take care of publike buildings, whom the French call Foyers, the Germans Putzherren, and they of Basile, Lontherren, because they pay the works & workmen that serue in publike. These Sunayers haue charge of the waies, Gates, Towers, Rampiers, Bridges, Couidits, and other publike Edifices: taking order that they shall bee maintained and kept in their best ability. Moreover, they judge with three Lords of the counsell (who are their adiuncts) such differences as happen for the confines, Gutters, Channels, Windows, Walles, and such like things, & wherein the neighbours are to be guided by their direction in their building. At Basile there are five Seigneurs, that take knowledge of these matters.

There is another degree of them that take charge of victuals. Of this number are the vintners for bread, to consider if the Loafe carryis full weight, or no. Others view the flesh in the Butchery, and aduisedly observe, that they kill not any Beale, the flesh whereof is bad, and dangerous to be eaten; they also set a price vpon the pound, to sell it by. Then there are some that take charge of fish, and heedfully foresee, that none be taken whē they are spawning, and haue an eye, beside to the goodnesse of all other fish in the Market. Others looke to salt fish, and to the Market of Butter and Cheese, how it is reasonably sold. There are some other Officers, whose names are sufficient to be noted: as the Patrons of Widowes and Orphanes, Schirmvoegt, and at Basile, Arztensherren: The Almoners; Visitors for weights and measures; Deputies for questioning of matters; Comptrolers of Ecclesiasticall goods; and Visitors of Schooles.

Moreover, in these cities there are Schooles very well ordered. At Basile is an Vniuersity greatly renowned, established by Aeneas Syluius, afterward Pope, named Pius the second, who gaue it all the same priuiledges, rights, and immunities, which the Vniuersities of Boulogne, Colongne, Heidelberg, Erford, Lipsa & Vienne haue. Aeneas Syluius was lodged at Basile, during the time as the counsell was kept there. He found the city so pleasant, the ayre so sweete, with such commodity and abundance of all things; that hee reputed the place apt and worthy to haue an Vniuersity founded in it. In the times of our ancestors, and our owne also, this Vniuersity hath yielded many wise men, professors of the tongues, in Philosophy and all Sciences, who are needlesse here to be named. Neuertheless, considering the greatnesse of the city, and the same of the Doctors there abiding, there are but few Schoollers. Beatus Rhenanus tendereth the reason, and saith: It is occasioned by the smallnesse of reuenues belonging to this Vniuersity, and to many Schooles in Germany. As thinking, that if there were fewer Schooles and Vniuersities, they would bee much more frequented than they are. There is not any Vniuersity at Zurich; notwithstanding, cūen to this present day, the tongues haue beeene so faithfully taught there, and all good Sciences and Diuinity, that it is very famous, and highly esteemed among all them that study Diuinity.

Finally, these three cities whereof we speake, haue power to stampe and coyne monie: and therefore there are forging Mints, and Masters of the monies, whose charge is to take order that the money coyned with the stamp of the city, should beare full weight, and be of a good alloy. Each of these cities hath her money apart by her selfe. They of Basile do coyne the same money with them of Halstatt and of Burgogne, and call it a Kappennuntz, in regard of a Rauens, which serueth for Armes to many peeces of their money. Five & twenty Sols of this money, makes a Florin of gold, which is thought to value threescore cruzers. At Schaffouse the money is of the same alloy & price, as that of the Empire. They of Zurich do coyne Dallers, and halfe Dallers, of equall price with them of the Empire: but they haue a kinde of money, which is their owne in particular, whereof forty Sols makes a Florin of gold. They stampe also another sort of money, which they call Baches, whereof sixteen makes a Florin.

In ranke of these publike charges and offices, we may set downe the Watch, & such as take care for prouision against the accidents of fire. There are two sortes of watch, besides the Sentinels in the clock-houses, and the Porters. First the perpetuall guardes at the cities cost, who keepe watch every night, and diligently search through all parts of the city, crying at all houres of the night. Outward beside these, out of each company are taken a certaine number of Bourgesſes, who likewise watch (according to their turnes) with their Armes. This double guard is not done for any feare they haue of enemies: but to auoid the inconveniences of fire, and to take order also, that (during the time of night) matters may be peaceable and quiet.

They that are Committees, to take care of dangers concerning fire, when any such happeneth in the city, may command the Carpenters, and other men of like quality, to runne for quenching the fire, taking order that all may bee done without confusion, and for the best safety of them that haue the misfortune of the fire.

fire. Moreouer, they carry an eye over the watch at the Gates, and on the wals; leste any tumult should happen in the city. For it is ordained, that when the fire is in any one place, a certaine number of the Bourgeses (chosen out of each company) make their sudden appearance at the Gates or Ports, and vpon the walles in Armes. Moreouer, the whole city is distributed into certaine bandes, eury one of them having his Capitaine & Ensigne to it selfe, vnder whom they go marching in excellent order. The Bourgmaster betakes himselfe to the Town-house, with some of the principall councillors and officers of the Seignury, to aduise on what is good for the weale publike. And not only Carpenters, Mafons, and their seruants, but likewise most of the Bourgeses meete together, all labouring industriously to quench the fire: and oftentimes the women shew themselves of no meane courage, in bringing and casting on the water. Beside, if the fire happen in some Village out of the city, the lustiest disposed of eury Tribe (whereof election is made for the purpose) do meete, and issue forth together, to quench the fire. They are conducted by one of the councill Seigneurs, who is sent to helpe and aduise what is meetest to bee done, but most especially, to comfort them that haue the losse.

We haue already told you, that the Switzers take great care for the poore. At Zurich, and in some other Townes, there is a daily distribution of almes to all the poore there, as of Bread and Pulse-pottage. There are a great number of poore Schollers in Zurich, sometimes forty, othervhiles fourescore, that are thus releeued; some bestowing garments, and other needfull things on them also, vsing the poore in no worse manner, then they of the Abbeyes and Couents in the Seignury of Zurich are. Vpon the Sundayes and festiual dayes, an almes collection is made of the people: which Monethly, or at eury two Moneths, by men chosen & deputed to the office, is distributed equally to the poore in the city, and such as live abroad in the fields. Beside, in the Cities there are great Hospitals, wherein needy citizens, aged, impotent, sicke persons, orphans, and many other are releeued. The Seignury appointeth diuers honest people, to haue care of the poores necessities: such as are the Master of Hospitals, Proctors, Receiuers, & their Committees and Comptrollers.

Hitherto wee haue shewne you the forme and state government obserued in the cities; but ouer and betide these, they haue authority in the neighboring countries, and (among the rest) the canton of Zurich hath more country iurisdiction, and larger Bayliwicks, then eyther Basile or Schaffouse. But in all the Lands and Seigneuries belonging vnto these three cantons, there is one and the selfe-same order of government. For certaine Bayliwicks are governed by the councill of the city, in such manner, as the Bayliffes dwell in the city, and are councillors of the common-wealth, and yet go to keepe Courts in the Villages. And if there happen any criminall suite, and whereof there is desert of punishment capital, the councill taketh knowledge thereof. There are other Bayliwicks of farre larger extent, and thether Bayliffes are lent with ample power: so that they iudge not only in ciuill causes, but oftentimes in criminall occasions, and chastise malefactors, according to the cheapnesse of the delicts. These Bayliwicks haue their priuiledges and ancient customes; some also haue law and iustice apart by themselves, and are administrated by Iudges chosen out of the same places.

The Bayliffes make no change or alteration (of any thing) in these places; but they leaue to the inhabitants, all their rights safe and sound: contenting themselves onely to preside in iustice, and giue sentence according to the lawes and customes of each Bayliwicke. The canton of Zurich hath nine great Bayliwicks, to wit, the country of Kybourg, the Bailwicks of Groningen, Andelfingen, Griffensee, Eglisow, the free Province, Regenbourg, Vaudenille, and Laufen, neere to the fall of Rhein. There are two and twenty small Bayliwicks or Castle-tships beside: in some of which, there is as large extent of ground, and as great number of men, as in some of the greater Bayliwicks. Moreouer, beside these Bayliwicks, two pleasant Townes, namely Winterdner and Stein, are vnder the protection of Zurichs canton. The Officers of iustice are in the same Townes; but the inhabitants are ty-

CHAP. VI.

Of the publike estate and government, of the Townes of Berne, Lucerna, Fribourg, and Sollewre: which are not diuided into Tribes and Companies, as Zurich, Basile, and Schaffouse are.

We haue already said, that the second kinde of publike gouernment, is considered in such Townes, as are not distributed into certaine Tribes or Companies, out of which are equally chosen, the Lord & Seigneurs appointed for Councill and Iustice. In these Townes they that are soueraigne Magistrates, or Heads of publike councill, are called Sten Schuldheissen. The old Alleman word is found in the Lawes of the Lombardes, where it is written, Schuldabis. It seemeth that the word came of debt, which the Switzers tearme Schuld, and of commanding: as much to say, that the Schuldabis commands the debtors to satisfie them of whom they borrowed. And in this fence it is found written in the Lombards lawes, vnder the title of debts and wages, in these words.

If a free man who is a debtor, hath nothing else wherewith to make satisfaction, but his owne priuate Castell, as Horses and Oxen for labour, or Kine to the pale: when he that chalengeth or demandeth the debt, shall go to the Schuldabis, and intimate the cause, giving him to vnderstand, that his debtor hath nothing else to make repayment vntill, but the matters aboue rehearsed. Then the Schuldabis is to make seizure on the said Castell, &c.

The same word is found also in the twentieth title of King Luipranus's lawes in significant termes, as followeth. If any man haue a cause or suite, and do appeare before his Schuldabis to demand iustice: if in case that the Schuldabis do him not iustice within foure houres after following (if both the parties stand bound, to answer before him), himselfe shall pay to the demander fixe Sols, and to his iudge fixe Sols.

We may perceiue heereby, that the word Schuldabis signified (among our graue Ancients) a Iudge, that gaue sentence vpon differences concerning debts, made leuicy on the debtors goods, and compelled them to pay their creditors. Neuerthelesse, there was no iustice so high, but hee stood in subiection to the county. At this day, the name is in frequent vse among the Princes of Germany: so that the Iudges of Townes and Villages haue no other name. Among the Switzers it is more honourable, for in the forenamed townes, the Schuldabis is lord ouer all. The soueraigne Magistrates of Townes among the Switzers, some haue thought were called Consuls, in imitation of the Romans: others hold opinion, that Bourgmasters and Schuldabis ought to be called Prefests. For mine owne part, I call them Consuls, that are Presidents in publike council. The French call him an Auoyer, whom we tearme Schuldtheff.

Now as concerning the Towns whereof we speak, they are not diuided by companies and trades, because there are lawes which prohibit them from so doing. But although the forme of the Commonwealths of Zurich and Berne are different: yet the one stands bound to succour the other reciprocally, to maintaine and conserue the estate, such as is established in eythers common-wealth. In the meane while, the trades that are at Berne, Lucerna, Fribourg, and Sollewre, haue houses established for meeting, for knowledge of the best and chiefeest workmen, but not for the election of Magistrates. They tearme those Officers by the name of Gschichtschafften, and not Zunftten.

Two public councils in those Towns:
the great and
the lesser.

In these Townes there are two public councils, as at Zurich, Basle, & Schaffhouse; to wit, the great and the lesser. The great council of Berne, is of two hundred men, as at Zurich, although it hath more then two hundred councillors. The lesser council of Berne, is of fixe and twenty. At Lucerna, eighteen councillors do governe the estate, during the space of fixe Months, and eightene other fixe Months, or the rest of the year. To elect the council of Berne, the proceeding is in this manner.

Banderet is the Capitaine
of a quarter in any good Towne.

The third Feries before Easter day, the four Banderets of the Towne, do chuse, and take with them sixtene Bourgeses, the worthiest and best esteemed men of all: then these twenty, with the Auoyer, do elect the great council, wherefore we may well call them Electors. First of all, they consider and examine exactly, the lues and manners of all them that are to be of the council of two hundred: and if any one of them hath soyled his dignity and reputation, with any bad or villanous acte; they depose him, and in the place, as well of the deposted, as of the dead, they chuse another, whom they do better like and allow of. In meane while, their election remaineth secret, untill the evening of the day before Easter. & then the Officers goe, and signifie to all them that are elected for the great and lesser councils: that they are to meete on the morrow morning in the Towne-houfe.

The Seigneurs
of the great council
meete in the
Towne-houfe

The first Feries after Easter, the Seigneurs of the council do assemble in their houses of meeting, and afterward they conduct them to the Towne-houfe, that are newly set downe, to be in number of the two hundred, and then all the Magistrates are elected. The election ended, the Bourgeses go to feast in their houses, and after dinner, walke forth into the fields: exercising themselves there in leaping, running, throwing the Barre, Stone, and other pastimes. But the Auoyer goes againe to the towne-houfe, accompanied with the twenty Electors; and there they elect the councillors, that are to be of the lesser council. On the morrow, they are named to the council of two hundred, and after that their election is approved, they goe and sitte downe in their places. Now in regard that the council of Lucerna doth command no longer time the fixe Months onely: the election of the Seigneurs both for the lesse and greater council, is made twice yearly, if there be any vacant places, and that is done about mid-Iune, and mid-December. The new councillors are taken from the lesser council, that governed during the fixe precedent Moneths.

The Auoyers or Consuls, who are about the other Seigneurs, are elected by the lesse and greater councils, & by common voyces. The authority of the Auoyer at Lucerna, lasteth but a year, and a years at Berne: but yet in such manner, that the voyces are yearly taken for him, and hee againe elected. Next to the Auoyers of Berne, the principall men in the commonwealth, are the four Banderets, chosen out of foure companies of trades-men onely, or men of handy-crafts, to wit, Carpenters, Curryers, or Leather-dressers (who are distributed in three parts) Bakers, and Butchers.

The Towne of Berne is divided into foure parts, which are committed (each one of them) to these foure Banderets: who view and over-see the Armes of all the Bourgeses, and provide for the affairs of warre. They continue in their charge the space of foure years: but every year on the same day as the Auoyer is elected, they resigne their estates, and deliver in to the hands of the cheefe Visier of the Seigneury, their Ensignes, and all the other markes of their dignity, which are laide on a Table before the Auoyer and the council: and then the great and lesser council giues their voyces, concerning the Banderets. If one of them have continued in his charge fully foure years, or is preuented by death, another is planned in his place: but yet it is thus conditionally done, that if the dead did not finish his foure years, his successor must accomplish them in the nature of a substitute, and afterward, execute the same charge foure other yeares.

In all the Townes of the Switzers, the dignity of Purse-bearers or Treasurers is great. Some whiles, the time of their charge is not limited at all; but they continue in that estate, so long as pleaseth the council, and themselves also. There are two of them at Berne, the one receiveth the reuenuues of the Towne, and of the Allemagne country: the

the other is for the Romane country, because hee receiveth the reuenuues which the Seigneury deriueth from the countries of Vant, and of Saugue. Those men which we haue so lately named Auoyers, Banderets, and Treasurers, with one councillor of the two hundred, are called at Berne, Die heintlichen Rath, which is as much to say, as the secret or priuy council. For to them (before all other) matters of most secrecy, of consequence, and which concerne the whole Common-wealth, are reported and trusted.

After that the abouenamed Magistrates haue bene elected, and confirmed by the lesse and greater councils; aduice is vied, concerning other public Offices, which is done in some of those Townes the very same day, and on the morrow in others.

As for those estates that haue not any dignity, as Sericants, Executors of iustice, Messengers, Watches, and other such like charges: ordinarily, the lesser council bestowes them of such, as they know meetest for them.

The Bernians hold this properly to themselves, as concerning election of their councillors, that they will not receiue any person into the lesser council, if he be not borne within the Towne. In elder times, if the sonnes of councillors were borne out of the Towne, they could not attaine to the fathers dignity. Now adayes, when some councillors are absent, about occasions of the weale-public, and for the gouerning of some Bayliwicke: if they happen to haue any children, they are reputed as borne in the Towne. For the great council, they may be elected that are borne out of Berne: provided that they be Bourgeses, haue houses in the Towne, and are issued of the Switzers country, or of the confederates of the Cantons. For no man is receiued into the council of the two hundred, if he be borne out of Switzerland: and the same is in practise at Zurich, as we haue already declared. In like manner, bastards, and people of infamous note, are quite excluded from coile.

There are three Courts or Benches of iustice at Berne, all the Iudges whereof, are elected by the Banderets & Treasurers, and are confirmed by the lesser council.

The first Court of iustice is called, Das Amsgericht. The Auoyer presideth there, but the cheefe Visier, whom they call Der grofz Wibel, doth (almost) daily keepe the place, and hath 12. Assitants, to wit, the last man elected of the foure Banderets, one of the Seigneurs of the lesser council, and tenne of the great, with one Secretary, and two Officers. They take knowledge of debts, injuries & outrages of slender consequence, as if one man giue another a box on the eare, or giues some words to his disgrace. A man may appeale from their sentence, to the lesser council, and from them, to the sixty men, which is a council composed of Seigneurs of the lesser council, and of fixe and thirty councillors of the great council. From the sixty, appeale may be made vnto the generall. The Iudges doe assemble every day to conclude causes, onely Tuesday excepted, which is the Market day.

The second Court of iustice, iudgeth the appellations of the country of Saugue: and therefore it is commonly called, the Court for strange Appellations; Das veltich Appellatz gericht. The Purse-bearer or Treasurer of the country, sitreth in iudgement there, & hath ten assitants, to wit, two Seigneurs of the lesser council, and eight of the great, with one Secretary and an Officer. They end all the appeales for the country of Saugue, and giue audience to parties at all times, and as ofte as they desire it. Notwithstanding, their ordinary vie is to meete after the day of S. Martin in November, vntill the Month of December. All they of Saugue come thither to the appellations, they onely of Lausanna excepted: but at every two yeares, the Treasurer cometh to Lausanna with some assitants, and there decideth the causes of appeale.

The third Court or iurisdiction, takes knowledge of matrimoniall causes. It is the Consistory, where there are eight Iudges; two of the lesser council, who preside or giue sentence there (turne by turne) from two Moneths to two Moneths; two Ministers of the Church; foure of the great council, and they haue a Secretary or Clarke, and an Officer. They assemble three times in the weeke, namely, namely, on Monday, Wednesday, and Friday, then they consider not onely on matrimoniall causes, but also censure such as giue scandales, and put in practise the discipline of the Church. Moreover, these men and the Iudges of the first court of iustice, doe hold in estate but halfe the yeare, and are changed about Easter, and likewise about the end of September.

They of Lucerna haue two courts of iustice, the one they call Das vuchengricht, because the Iudges do meete euery weeke, and decide al suites proceeding of debts and contracts. The other is called Das nuer gricht, the iustice of nine: for nine Iudges take knowledge of iniuries and outrages, and accordingly inflict punishment. There is not any Consistory at Lucerna, neither at Fribourg, or Solleurre: because they are Catholiques, and subiecte to the iurisdiction of Bishops, by whose Officials the causes concerning matrimony are debated.

As for criminall matters capitall, there are not any particular Iudges thereto appointed, neyther at Berne, nor Lucerna. But when question is made concerning any ones life, the great and smaller counsels take knowledge thereof, and iudge it. The Auoyer sit in cheefest authority, and censure on the matters. After sentence is refused on at Berne, the Auoyer goes and sits in a seate of iustice, appointed in some eminent part of the Towne, enuironed with Officers of the Seignury. Then the Clarke or Secretary readeth out aloud the confession of the offender, & the sentence giuen against him. Afterward the Auoyer enioyneth the hangman to execute the sentence, and commandeth the condemned person to bee deliuered to him. At Lucerna, the counsell do iudge in criminall causes, of all the Bayliwicks, and all the Malefactors are punished within the Towne. But in all the Bayliwicks of Berne, there is iustice apart by it selfe, which they call Landtgricht, and thether the Iudges of all the bayliwicks are called, and giue their aduice in presence of the Bayliwicks, who presideth: and yet in such sort, as the counsell of Berne may approve, or change the sentence, if they thinke good.

The Bernians haue many Bayliwicks, & are the most powerfull Seigneurs of the Leagues. In some they speak the Alleman or Germane tongue; in other the Romane or Sauyan. Among the Alleman Bayliwicks, there are foure depending on the Towne, and are euen as Subburbs thereto: whereof the foure Banderets are Bayliwicks, and if they were to go to war, those Bayliwicks march vnder the Ensignes of the foure Banderets. Moreover, there are seuen and twenty other beside, to wit, the vale of Fisell, which hath an Anman, out of the body of the inhabitants, but hee is elected by the counsell of Berne, & there rendereth an account of his charge. Vndersee is a Towne so named, because it is at the end of a Lake: thether is an Auoyer sent, but he is of the Towne of Berne, the vale of Sinna, both high and low, do call their Bayliffes Schachtlande, that is to say, Castilians. Fruingen, Sane and Aelen, do name their Bayliffe, Gouernour. Laupen and Thun are in the same condition as Vndersee.

Next to these, are Signow, Trachselwald, and the Rivers of the vale of Emme. Brandis, that receiues her Bayliffe from the Lord of the place: but he is numbred among the Bourgeses of Berne. Sumfelmald, where the Masters of the Tentour Order established a Bayliffe. Burgdorf and Pyrenette are gouerned all alike, as Vndersee, Landhont, Arberg, Nidow, Erlach, Bippin, Wange, Arwange, Arboarg, Fibersheim, Schenkenberg, and Leimbouurg. Moreover, there are three free Townes in the country of Ergow, vnder the Seignury of Berne, to wit, Zofinge, Arow, and Brug. There are eight Roman Bayliwicks, as namely, Auanches, Madon, Tuerdun, Laufanna, Morges, Nyon, Orbe, Aille and Venay. Beside, they of Berne and of Fribourg haue foure Bayliwicks in common; as Mort, Schwartzenbourg, Granfon, & Chalansse, whether they send a Bayliffe successively at euery 5. yeares end: so that if the Bayliffe be of Berne, his causes of appeale goe to Fribourg, where the reasons of the Bayliffe are examined. There are Prouoosts beside, for the gouernment of Abbeys. The Bernians had nine in the Allemanne country, sixe whereof held iurisdiction, and three in the Romane country.

They of Lucerna haue onely two out of the Towne, as at Wiken, and at Sempach: but hee of Sempach hath no other authority in the place, but only the superintendency of the Lake, and of the Fish.

As for their other Bayliwicks, they are gouerned by some of the Seigneurs of the counsell. Those Bayliwicks are Willisau, the Vale of Entlibuch, Rotenbourg, Halspourg, Berone, and the neighbouring countie, which they call, Che-lumpt: Merisunde, that hath this priuilege, to chuse for Bayliffe, one of the Seigneurs of counsell in Lucerna, euen whom they list, except the Auoyer: Weggis, Ebikon, Horbe and Krientz. Moreover, the two Townes of Sursey and Sempach, are in the protection of the Lucer-nians: Neuerthelesse, they haue their counsell apart by themselves, who iudge in causes both ciuill and criminall. But the Auoyer of Sursey, giueth his oath to them of Lucerna. Hee of Sempach is elected by the counsell at Lucerna: but he is in number among the citizens of Sempach.

The law of likeness or equality, which the Latines termed Lex Talionis, is as yet vied (in some sort) at Lucerna. For if any man kill a citizen of the place, although he did it vpon iust occasion, hauing bene prouoked thereto by the other, and in defence of his owne body: yet if hee betaken, they smite off his head, or if he flye, he is banished for euer. But if he make satisfaction to the children or kindred of the dead, and cause them to giue ouerall pursuite: hee may obtaine leaue of the counsell to come againe into the town.

Among all the Switzers, there is not any but them of Lucerna, that make vfe of Brasse Cornets, instead of Trumpets. The crooked Cornets, which they call hartsch-boerck, giues a frightfull found. The Romans also made vfe of Cornets in warre: and thereupon, they that founded or winded those Cornets, were called Cornettes. The men of Lucerna say, that Charlemagne gaue those Cornets to the, because they carried themselves valiantly in a warre which hee had against the Sarrazins, and that Rowland, a Lord very highly beloued of Charlemagne in those times, serued himselfe with those kindes of Cornets long before.

These forenamed Townes do coyne monies, but Berne, Fribourg, and Solleurre, haue one particular kind of coyne: whereof two and forty Sols, and two thirds of a Sol, makes a Florin of Rheine. Moreover, they stampe another more great fort of money, which the Switzers call Bin Dickenpfennig, and the French a Teslon. These Teslons are minted at Solleurre for the most part; and yet notwithstanding, are counted of lesse value, by a tenth part, then them of France. They of Berne coyned first certaine money, which the Switzers termed Baches: in regard of the figure of a Beare, which was stamped on the one side, for they called a Beare Bachern and Bactzen. Afterward, the other Cities and Townes of Switzerland and of Suabs, coyned the same money: sixteene peeces whereof, valued a Florin of gold. The money of Lucerna cometh not neere to the value and price of that of Basile, which is more hard and strong: for the Sol of Lucerna valueth but the moiety of that of Basile, and fifty Sols of Lucerna, will make one Florin.

Now we come to speake of Fribourg, which is diuided into foure parts, like vnto Berne: the first is called the Borough, the second, the Island, or the Meadow; the third, the new Towne; and the fourth, the Hospitall. The counsellors of the common-wealth are chosen out of these quarters. As in the other Townes, so in this there are two publike counsels; to wit, the great counsell, consisting of 2. hundred, and the lesser of foure and twenty. The election is made on the Sunday before S. Iohn Baptist day. The lesser counsell manageth the affaires of the Towne, deciding the causes of appeales: except of the Bayliwicks of Sauoye, conquered in warre. As for the matters which concerne the whole State, and are of maine importance, the counsell of two hundred takes knowledge of them. The Auoyer, who presideth both in the lesser & great counsels, is elected on S. Iohns day by all the people, and continueth in his charge the space of two yeares.

Next vnto the Auoyer, are the foure Banderets, who are Captaines of severall quarters in the city or town, & although they are not of the ordinary number of Seigneurs of the lesser counsell: yet notwithstanding, they assist there in name of all the people, and deliuer their aduice, except in appellations. If some thing be propounded which seemeth to belong to the counsell of two hundred; they may ther make their report of it. Furthermore they remaine in authority, three yeares:

and are chosen by the great & lesser coun-

followeth the office of the Treasurer, who manageth the monies, and all the revenues of the Towne: he hath (as his coadiuter) the Secretary or Clerke of the Towne, or his Committees, who register downe all those summes, which the Treasurer receiveth, or employeth. His charge also is, to have an eye on all the publike buildings. Twice every year he renders an account to the lesser councill, and remaineth in his charge, the space of three years.

Four principal Secretaries in Fri-
bourg.

In Fribourg there are foure principal Secretaries: the first is called Secretary of the Towne; the second, Secretary of the councill; the third, Secretary of the country; and the fourth, Secretary of law or iustice. In like manner, the estate of Saulnier, or cheefe Vicer, is honourable both in Berne and Fribourg, where it is named, Großweiblich. He is very often necere to the Auoyer, and when the Seigneurs are set in councill, he is at the door, counteth voyces, calleth the parties, and takes care of prisoners. His charge continueth three years.

The Courts
of law and iustice at Fri-
bourg.

As concerning Law and Iustice at Fribourg, they are established in manner following. First, the Court of Iustice belonging to the Towne, called, Das Stattgericht, is a particular assembly of certaine Iudges, to know and decide differences among the Bourgeses. And if there be any criminal proceffe or suite;
their charge is to interrogate the prison-
ners, to present & deliver the case in question, and then to relate all to the lesser councill. The other assembly of Iudges, is termed Das Landtgericht, judging the causes of dwellers in the country. In each of these iurisdiccions, there are two Seigneurs of the lesser councill, and two of the great, and they meet three times every week. Appeale may be made from their sentence, to the lesser councill. Moreover, there are twelve Iudges, chosen out of the great and lesser councils, for the appellations of the Bayliwicks, conquered in the last warre against the Duke of Savoie. They meete together once in every Moneth, and there is no
appealing from their sentence.

The first Court or assembly.

The other Court of ius-
tice.

Twelve Iud-
ges for the conquered Bayliwicks.

At Fribourg there are two Kindes of Bayliwicks, as in the other Townes: the one of Bayliwicks neigbouring to the Towne, which are governed by certaine Seigneurs of the councill, who dwell in the Towne, and come dayly to councill, and of such Bayliwicks there are five. The other is, when the Bayliwicks are sent to dwell on distinct places with ample authority: and they of Fribourg have fourteene such Bayliwicks, and foure in common with the Bernians. The Bayliwicks are elected by the great and lesser councils, the morrow after S. John Baptists day, and hold in office the space of five years: but every year they render an account of their charge, before the lesser councill. They instruct also, and deale in criminal suites: but them they send to the lesser

councill with their sentence, which the
coun-
cill hath power to approue, change,
or moderate.

That which at Fribourg is called Zrostungen, and in the vulgar, Leutungen, is carefully maintained at Fribourg. By these words is understood a remise or ratiance for certaine time, and the charges to be on his owne head; when the debtor doth not pay his debt, or on the day of assignement, as in this manner. When the debtor maketh not satisfaction, on the day appointed for repayment, the creditor sendeth one, two, three, or more servants (on horse-backe) to an Inne or Hofery, whose expences there the debtor is constrained to pay (tarry they there ne-cessit so long) untill hee hath made satisfaction to the creditor. Some say, that the Duke of Zeringen established this Law.
Such as infringe or breake it, are punished by imprisonment, banishment, or by the purse. And there is a certaine Iudge, who they call Bourgmastier, that holdeth a stritt hand in this case. Moreover, if action or suite is moved, and a man demand
the Croftung three times, if it is not grated to the demander, it is present banishment. Such as breake the peace, wherein they are enioyned to live one with another, are banished likewise: and they that (without iust cause) will meddle, or take part on eyther side, when a cause is in pleading.

Finally, the Fribourgers make feasting yearly, with solemne procession of all estates through the Towne, on the second day of March, and on the eight and twentieth day of Iune, which are dayes of bat-

CHAP. VII.

Of the Commonwealth of those Cantons that have neither Cities nor Townes, but dwell
only in Villages.

Hitherto we have discoursed on two formes of Common-wealths, concerned in the Cantons of Switzerland, that have Cities and Townes. There remaineth now a third, which is of those Cantons that have no Townes, but make their abode in Villages, and for that cause
are called, Die Laender. There are fixe of them, to wit, Vri, Suits, Vnderwald, Zug, Glaris, and Appenzell. Zug indeede is a towne, & hath her Officers in the townes,
but the fouraignty of the Canton apper-taineth to them that dwell in the lands of the Canton, with them of the townes, and are Lords as well the one as other. In all these Cantons, the cheefe of the pub-
like councill, is termed Aumman, which signifieth a man in office and authority,
and that name is attributed to all publike Officers. So that Abbots, and other Ec-clesiasticall persons, do call their Iudges,
Receivers, and other such like Officers,
Aummans.

As the Townes are divided or parted,
by Companies and Colledges of Artezans or Tradefmen; so the Cantons are distributed into certaine parts and portions.

CHAP. VIII.

Of all the fixe Cantons forenamed, which in this ensuing Chapter we will handle together, according to their severall rights & iurisdiccions.

THE whole country of Vri is divided into ten parts, which by them are called Gnoshaminen, as if a man would say, Participations. It may be in this respect, because they are all partakers

in palturages, goods, honours, and pub-
like charges, and that from those ten parts only, they are summoned and called, to be present at those assemblies which are yearly made.

The Country of Suits is divided into fixe parts, which they call quarters. Because the country (hitherto) was distributed into foure portions: but the people coming to encrease greatly, they made a new partage into fixe portions,
which neuerthelesse do retaine the ancient name.

As for the Country of Vnderwald,
there is a Forest that divideth it in the middle: and therefore the division is thus made to them that dwell above and beneathe the Forest. The whole Country taketh name of that part which is beneath the Forest: for Vnderwalden is as much to say, as beneath or vnder the wood. In eldertimes, Stans, a principall Village beneathe the Forest, and neere to the Lake, was the prime and cheefe place of the country, and the people were called, inhabitants of the Valley of Stans. But now adayes, because the word Vnderwald
is taken for the whole country, the Switzers have added these words, above and beneathe the wood, *Vnderwalden ob
und nider dem Kernwald*.

Now as concerning them of Zug, we have said already, that they are divided in two parts; the one is the Towne it selfe,
the other the Villages round about, com-prehended vnder three assemblies, to wit,
the Mountaine, the Vale Egeria, and Barh,
a Parish very neere to the Towne.

Glaris is divided into fifteene parts,
which they terme Agawan. The word signifieth the work of a day, and as much distance or spaciousnesse of ground, as a man can plow in a day. It may be, that these parts were called Iournals, or day-labours: because every one prepareth & ordereth the way in his quarter, and each one knoweth where he is to labour.

The country of Appenzell is parted into twelve orders or portions, which they call Raden, whereof those fixe conioyn-ed to the Village of Appenzell, they name them the orders within, and anciently were subiects to the Abbot of *S.
Gall*. The other fixe are called the orders without: to wit, out of the Abbots Seignoury,

Seignury; heereofore partly free, and partly in the iurisdiction of Gentlemen. Out of these parts (by equall number) are chosen certaine men, for the council of the Canton: in many of them there are threefore councilers, beside such as (having bene in office) continue perpetuall councilers. At Zug there are five and forty councilers, nine of each assembly, for the Towne is counted for two.

The council generall of Appenzell, consisteth of an hundred forty foure, to wit, twelve of each order. And if matters of importance are to be treated on, and it appeareth needfull to assemble the council of all the people: then they will double or treble the council in this manner. Each of the councilers takes a man or two with him, if they be to hold a council of three times as many persons, as ordinarily they use to do: and one of the councilers, on Sunday, in the Church after Service is done, hath a custome to signifie, that on such a day as he nameth, all the councilers are to meete in the Towne-house of the Canton, and each man is to bring with him such a one, as he holdeth to bee an honest and wise man, who shall also bee there bound to obedience, vnder the oath whereby all are obligated to the common-wealth. Beside, no man is elected to be a counciler, neither can he assist in the generall council, if he be not borne in the country. Ein Landman: And it is much more easie to obtaine the degree of Bourgeshippe, in the Townes of the Switzers, then in these Villages. Which proceedeth not of any inhumanity, for there are great store of strangers among them, towards whom they shew themselves very kinde and humane. But rather by a certaine order of aduised iudgement, and according to the custome of their predecessors: being neuer willing to mingle new commers among olde inhabitants of the country, both to prevent charges, and to preserve the common-wealth (the more easly) in one and the same estate and condition.

The souerainty in these fixe Cantons, belongeth to the assembly of all the people. All they of the country, from the age of fourteene, or fixteene, or vpwards, do meete eyther at the principall Village of the Canton, or else at some other place in the midst of the country. As they of Vri meete at Betzelingen, distant halfe a dayes journey from Altorf, the cheefest Village of that Canton. The people of Glaris meete at Snauda. The ordinary and annuall assemblies of these Cantons, is made euery yeare about the beginning of May. They of Sans, of Vnderwald vnder the wood, of Glaris and of Appenzell, do meete the last Sunday of April. They of Vri and of Zug, the first Sunday of May. In elder times, they of Zug held their generall council the 24. day of Iune, being S. Iohn Baptists day. They of Vnderwald about the wood, meete the first day of May.

In these assemblies, first of all he is elected whom they call the Amman, in which office hee continueth the space of two yeares. Heereofore there was no terme of time assigned, but (oftentimes) the same Amman gouerned for many yeares together. He is permitted to be chosen among all the people, as a man that (for his vertue and wisdom) shall be thought most worthy of that dignity and charge, without regard at all, in what place or Village of the Canton hee dwelleth. Notwithstanding, in certaine Cantons, as at Appenzell, while the Amman is in his office of authority, hee goeth to remaine in the principall Village, where the publike council keepeth most.

At Zug there are three assemblies of them without the Towne. Next, the Towne hath the power of two assemblies and the ammans are chosen by order of each assembly. They that are elected of the assemblies without, doe dwell in the Towne, during the two yeares that they are ammans. In the same assembly where the amman is elected, his Lieutenant also is chosen, whom they terme Schaltzer: and so are the Treasurers & Purse-bearers, called by them Schelmeysters. Next, the Secretaries and Bayliffes which gouerne the Bayliffes of the Canton: or those which the Canton holds apart with other Cantons. Moreover, Edicts are there read & confirmed, or abrogated yearly, by the voyces of all the people: so likewise sports, and playing at cardes, dice, dancing, excessive drinking, fore-stalling Markets of victuals, and such like things.

When the council is thus held yeare by yeare, councilers are elected and confirmed:

The yearly assembling of these cantons.

The Amman is the chief officer chosen in these assemblies.

Of the assemblies at Zug, which without and within.

The election of the Lieutenant.

Secretaries & Bayliffes.

The electing and continuing of councilers.

firm'd: but yet this is not done by euery assembly, but each of them ordered by the subiects of the Canton, and by the companies among whom they dwell. Finally, if at some other times of the yeare, there happen affaires that concerne the estate of the common-wealth, an extraordinary council is held. As if need require, to send Ambassadors to the dayes at Bada, or to some other Kings and Princes; or if there be question of making alliances, be they eyther for peace or warre, &c.

Beside the lesser council and the generall, composed of all the people, some of the cantons haue a council more strict and priuate, and courses of iustice for discision of suites. In the Canton of Suits, which is diuided in fixe parts, the principall counciler of each part is taken: and these fixe, with the Amman, make the council of seuen, called secret. These seuen do manage and order all the reuenues of the country, and furnish all that is laid out for publike expences. Moreover, there are two Courts of iustice, the one being called the order of nine, in regard of the number of Iudges, and there the Amman sits as President. In this Court are decided the causes of greatest importance: as of inheritances, outrages, and terrible injuries, hard to be endured.

The Court of seuen, (so is the other order of iustice called) where the Lieutenant to the Amman sits as President: and those seuen are Iudges in causes concerning contracts, debts, and such like. They of Vri haue (almost) the same gouernment: for there the Court of seuen, with the Lieutenant to the Amman, doe censure and iudge of debts, which exceede not the sum of threecore pounds. There is another iudicial Court of fifteene, where the Amman sits as President, and concludeth causes ciuill of greatest consequence.

At Vnderwald also there are 2. Courts of iustice, the one at Stans vnder the wood, and the other at Sarna about the wood, and each of them hath an Amman. It is saide, that the country was parted, in the yeare one thousand, one hundred and fifti; when some debate fell among them for paying of a certaine tribute. And whereas before that time, they had but one council, and one Standard, bearing a double key for the whole country: this partition caused each of the sides to take one key onely, and they that were about the wood, retained still their olde Standard, white and redde, because they were the greater part of the Canton. Then they vnder or beneath the wood, received from Popes another Ensigne, which had two keyes in it: for in regard that Stans (long before) had bene the principall Village of the Canton, they therfore kept still the Ensigne, which in those times they had at Stans.

The Towne of Zug, beside the council generall of the whole country, hath a council apart, order of iustice, Magistrates, a Lieutenant to the Amman, Treasurer, Voyer, &c. who iudge the causes of the Bourgeses, and manage all the publike affaires.

At Glaris there are two Courts of iustice, one of nine, the other of five Iudges, which the council generall of the Canton do elect euery yeare. They decide law-suites in the Moneths of May, and of December onely. The nine take knowledge of differences concerning inheritances, and dangerous injuries. The five do censure suites of debts and payments, after that the nine (who keepe Court the space of fixe dayes) haue ended.

They of Appenzell haue two courts of iustice also, the first is kept in a public place of the streete; in regard whereof, they call it Das gassen gericht. Therein are foure and twenty Iudges, two of each order of the canton, and their President is the Vicer of the canton, Der Landtweibel, and they meete together weekly euery Thursday: they condemn men in fines, and chastise such as wrong one another. The other court is called Das geschworen gericht, iustice of oath: because twelue Iudges sitte there, and take knowledge of differences, which are ended, by giuing oath to one of the parties. Moreover, from each order of the canton, a counciler is chosen, & many from the orders that are greater. These men make obseruation of such as breake publike ordinances, and deliberate on matters which are to bee propounded to the council generall. In which respect, they are as Guardians of the lawes, and reard cheefest councilers: their charge is perpetuall, and they are called in this canton,

But one council and one Standard till the diuision.

The Forces cause them another Ensigne.

The obseruation at Zug.

Two Courts of iustice at Glaris, and their severall authorities.

The Courts of iustice at Appenzell.

The first Court.

Another order of councilers, and their power.

Of the catho- like Cantons.	ton Landthelick. Suits, Uri, Vnderwald, Zug, Glaris, and Appenzel , are Catholicic, and vnder the Diocesse of Constance . Notwithstanding, euery yeare, when a counsell generall is held at Suits , ordinarily they send their Ambassadors thether, and require, that they may haue leaue to elect their Magistrates; which is granted them, as in verie great fauour, with this exception, that they are to bee modest and obedient, for otherwise it remaineth in the peoples power of Suits , to send a Gouvernour thether, whensoever they thinke meet. Punishment for adultery.	As for adulteries, they are chastised in each Canton: some, by confiscation of goods; others (sometime by the fine of ten Dallers. I haue heard likewise, that (diuers times) the counsell generall of the whole Canton, doeth decide some differences concerning marriages.	Justice in causes criminall, is administered (almost in all the Cantons) by the publike counsell, and oftentimes doubled or multiplied by the ordinary councillors; the Amman sitting President, or his Lieutenant. At Zug , in criminal matters, other assistants are ioyned with the counsell or Iudges, chosen out of each diuision or assembly of the Canton. Suites of Law are discuss in an open publike place, where all may heare that which is said, and know the merite of the sentence giuen by the Iudges.	Cusnach hath the same condition, but because, within some few yeares certaine strangers (customers for carriage of salt and other things that way) made their complaint, that they of Cusnach did them wrong, and vsed them harshlie vpon no occasion: the men of Suits knowing the accusation to bee true, sent a Bayliffe thether againe, and appointed new ordinations for Cusnach . Besides, they haue two Bayliwicks in common with them of Glaris , to wit, Venzac , which is a Towne, and Gastal . Thether they send Bayliffes, turne by turne, and alwaies there is one of Suits in one of the Bayliwicks, and one of Glaris in the other.	What priuiledges belong to Cusnach , but through their owne neglect.
Justice in criminal causes.	Now to speake of the Bayliwicks or Governements appertaining vnto these Cantons, they are carried and disposed in manner following. They of Uri send a Bayliffe into the valley of Liuner beyond the Mountaines: who hath one of the same valley for his Lieutenant and. Assistants also; with whom he iudgeth causes both ciuill and criminall, and continueth in his charge the space of three yeeres. Beyond the same Mountaines, they send Bayliffes also to Bellizona , and to two other places. They of Bellizona haue three Bayliwicks, to wit, Bellizona , the Vale Brune , and Rimera , where the three Cantons do command in such manner, that each of them hath alwaies a Bayliffe. Moreover, the inhabitants of Mount S. Godardo , are subiects to the Canton of Uri ; neuertheless, they haue their Counsell and their Amman , who are confirmed by them of Uri , & when there are criminal suites, two of the counsell of Uri do meet there. They haue their Standard likewise: but when they of Uri do display that belonging to the Canton, the other hold vp theirs.	Justice in causes criminall, is administered (almost in all the Cantons) by the publike counsell, and oftentimes doubled or multiplied by the ordinary councillors; the Amman sitting President, or his Lieutenant. Suites of Law are discuss in an open publike place, where all may heare that which is said, and know the merite of the sentence giuen by the Iudges.	In like manner, they haue three other Bayliwicks in common, beyonde the Mountaines, in the valley of Liuner , with the Cantons of Uri , Suits , and Vnderwald . The charge and office of all their Bayliffes lasteth two yeeres, except in the Bayliwicks beyonde the Mountaines, where they holde for the space of three yeares; and they goe not to the other but at certaine times, and to decide law controuersies. Finally, the five first Cantons are Lordes with the other Cantons, of the Bayliwicks governed by them in common: except the men of Appenzel , who send a Bayliffe onely to Kunthal , with the seuen first Cantons, & in the same manner.	of Glaris do yearly celebrate the memoriall of the victory which they wonne against the Austrians , in the year 1387. and in the month of April, I will declare at large, the ceremonies obserued by them in this festiually to the end, the better iudgment may be made of such feasts as are vied by others.	Reads in the former parts.
Of customes belonging to these six Cantons.	Now follow some particular customes of these six Cantons, and which are not common to all the Switzers. Whosoever shall haue committed a murder, although it was done in the defence of his owne body, hee is constrained to forsake the Canton, and it is not lawfull for the lesser counsell to repeale him; but hee may demand and obtaine leaue of the counsell generall to returne againe.	The order of the solemne Feast and Procession, performed by the men of Glaris , in honor of their victory against the Austrians .
In case of murder.	They doe not permit, that Landes and foundations of sufferances should be pawned or ingaged vnto any one that is not of the Canton; for they holde them to be no longer Lords of their countrey, if once they will become bound for debts and mortgage in such manner their inheritances to strangers. Likewise in the Canton of Uri , it is not lawfull for strangers, that haue bene receyued there as inhabitants, to buy any inheritances, but a house and a small garden for Pot-herbes onely.	IN the moneth of April, euery yeare, on the Thursday of the first weeke (except Easter day fall on the Sunday following, for then it is deferred til Thursday in the weeke after) the Feast is celebrated. On the Sunday before, it is a lowde and openly published in the church, in behalf of the Seignery, that on Thursday following, the most honourable persons of euerie Family, especially the men, are to meete and go in solemne Procession to Mulhoufere , by those waies, places, and passages, where their Ancestors were in great danger, euen so far as the Fountain, and to be ware of descending to the Village of Haures , til first they haue past the other way. Moreover, that all keepe silence while the Sermon is done, and to carrie themselves (that day) so modestly in their refection, that no disorder may be noted, because the Seignery will chastise them seuerely that do otherwise, and because the whole Canton of Glaris doth solemnly feast that day. Forbidding also, that no man shall mount on Horsebacke out of the Village of Glaris , sicke & aged men onely excepted, who are not (being so mounted) to goe anie further then Schensingen .	The great Feast of Glaris .
Against murthering of lands and inheritances to strangers.	If any man being drunke, doe commit some scandalous action, hee is punished by imprisonment; and beside, hee is forbidden to drinke wine for the space of a certaine time, and vntill the Counsell generall haue pardoned him.	Rememberce of their Ancestors great peril.
Against drunkenness.	In publike assemblies, and in the distribution of honourable charges and Offices: hee that is put in election, is present, and his parents, brethren, and sons may giue him their voyces. They giue their voyces by lifting vp their hands on high, and some are set in an eminent place to count them. If they stand in doubt, and cannot so decide it, then they haue another course. There are two men, who hold two Halberds touching together at the points; they that giue their voyces, do passe vnder them, and two other men count them as they passe.
For voyces giuen, the election of publike officers.	Finally, they vse Feasts and Processions, on such dayes as their Ancestors obtained any remarkable victory. As they	After they are all assembled together, and rounded in a ring as it were, the Amman , who is in the midst, makes a kinde welcome (in name of the whole Canton) vnto such strangers as are come thither. First, to the Ambassador of Suits , who is yearly sent for celebration of the Feast: because thirtie Souldiers of Suits were present in the battell for which this Feast is kept. this ſolemne Proceſſion, and to thanke & ſing praifes to almighty God, the Virgin Mary, and their Patrones, S. Fridolin, and S. Hilary.

Fiſt, one beareth a red Standard, wherein is the Image of S. Fridolin, then follow a men, bearing a gilded Toomb, whereon are many faire and holy reliques enchaſed. Then come the Croſſe-bearers, carrying the Croſſes of Glaris, Haurer, of the Vale of Linth, and of the churches neighboring to the Canton of Glaris, as of Schenniff, Wefen, and others. The Croſſes are followed with Banners of all the Churches, and the Priests come after them, ſinging according to their order. The Curate of Glaris is the fiſt, accoſted by an Abbot, or elſe ſome other man of the Church. Among the ſtrangers the other Priests follow. Then the councell of Glaris, to witte, the Amman, with the Ambaſſadour of Swits; then the Lieutenant to the Amman, and the other Officers in their order, each guiding or leading one of the moſt honourable ſtrangers. The women (in great number) follow, to make vp the end and concluſion of the Proceſſion.

Being come to the place where the battail was fought, there are eleven ſtones ſet down in thoſe ſeveral parts of ground where they began and held on fight with the enemy: for they had partings & meetings againe at hand-blows, eleven ſeverall times, and at each of thoſe ſtones the Standards and Banners ſtay, and all fall upon their knees in prayer to God. Vn he they are come to the ſixt ſtone, they caſt themſelves round in a ring, and then the Secretarie of the Canton readeth in a paper, the cauſe and originall of this Proceſſion, the ſummary whereof is this. War being moued betweene Leopold, Duke of Auſtria, and them of Zurich, Berne, Solothurne, Lucerne, Vri, Swits, Vnderwald, Zug, and Glaris; Leopold led his Army to Sempach, where hee was ouercome, and ſlaine by the Switzers, the ninth day of Iune, one thouſand, three hundred, foureſcore and fix, beſide ſixteene Earles and Barons, and a great number of Gentlemen.

Afterward, in mid-Augult following, they of Zurich, Vri, Swits, and Glaris, beſieged and tooke the towne of Wefen, & the inhabitants promiſed perpetuall fidelity to the Switzers. Truce was made, till the beginning of Lent in the yeare following, which being ended, and war beginning againe, they of Glaris lent a Garriſon to Wefen, where the Souldiers thinking themſelves to be in ſafety, and conſiding on the oath of the townefmen, were ſlaine (for the moſt part) in a night by them of Auſtria, who entred in the dead of night, by intelligence which they had with certaine of the inhabitants, that machinated this villany againſt the garriſon, and opened the gates to their enemies.

Furthermore, that the very ſame yeare, and the ninth day of Aprill, they of Auſtria brought an Army of ſixteene thouſand men towards Haurer, and wonne the Fortreſſe of the Country. But three hundred and fifty Souldiers of Glaris, & thirty which the Canton of Swits lent to aſſiſt them, ſlayed the enemy, and (Gods helps furthering, the Virgin Mary, and their Patrones, S. Fridolin and S. Hilary) they became conquerors, wonne eleven of their cheefeſt Enſignes, and left two thouſand five hundred enemies ſlaine in the field, beſide them that were drowned in the Lake, and among the reſt, many of Wefen were there ſlaine, that formerly had betrayed the Garriſon of Glaris. And therefore, in duſtfull thankſpines to God almighty, the glorious Virgin Mary, and S. Fridolin, and S. Hilary their Patrones, and to all the Saints and Saintelles of Paradiſe, & in euerlaſting remembrance of ſo great a helpe and deliuerance, this annuall Proceſſion was ordained vpon thoſe limits, where their Anceſtours had ſuffered many inconueniences.

After the reading of theſe ſeueral letters, a Sermon is made in the ſame place; the Priests of Glaris performe their Aniuersary, and followeth the Miniſter of the new opinion. All their prayers being ended, they go againe to the ſame ſtones, in the ſame ranke and ceremony as they began, vntill they come to the eleuenth, which is placed neere to the Village of Haurer, towards Wefen, where they aſſayed the enemy at the laſt time. Then they take their way to the Church of Haurer; but they of the new opinion return home to their houſes. The reſt go to the church, where they ſing a Maſſe for the Switzers that were ſlaine in the battaile: and one reciteth all the names of them of Glaris, that periſhed there. Soone after this, a banquet banquet is made (at the Cantons expences) for the Priests, and all the ſtrangers that came in the Proceſſion. After dinner, the Priests ſing, bring backe againe to Glaris the gilded Toombe, the Banners and Croſſes.

This is the manner of the annuall Proceſſion and Feaſt of them of Glaris, in remembrance of ſo famous and remarkable victory. The other Cantons alſo haue their Feaſts, to celebrate the victories obtained at Morgarten, Sempach, and elſewhere.

CHAP. IX.

Of the Common-wealths belonging to the Confederates. And fiſt of all, Of the Abbey of S. Gall.

AFTER we haue ſpoken of the thirteene Cantons, and of their ſeueral Common-wealths; me-thinks now (according to the ſame order) we ſhould make mention of their Confederates, among whom, the Abbot and Abbey of S. Gall holdeth the prime place. The Abbots of S. Gall, haue bin great Lords for the ſpace of many ages poſſeſſed of great meanes, and numbered with the Princes of the Empire: but I know not well, from what Emperour they received this honour and title. Stumpfius noteth, that Conrad de Pfawertz, Annaliſt of Switzerland writeth, that Abbot Haldrich, of the houſe of Alſace, was made Prince by the Emperour Phillip, in the city of Basile. Now albeit theſe Abbots are not of ſuch power as heretofore; yet notwithstanding, they continue ſtill great Lords, and haue their dominion in large extendure.

In the country of Turgow they are Lords of Wile, and haue a Pallace and a Vicar in the Towne. Moreover, in the high country of Turgow, they haue a great Territory, and well peopled, who are all ſubiect to them. The inhabitants are called Die Gottſchut, the Subjects of the houſe of God, or of the Abbey, and are parties in certaine Regions. Their names are Rofac, Thumbech, Gold, Vndererg, Moswill, Tablate, Gozow, Wald-

kilch, Ramſhorn, Summery, Mule, Hotſchwill, Bernattzell, Lumſſwill, berg, Wittenbach, Redmont, Strubenzell, Geſſerwald, Hellbach, Bergknecht, Zuzwill, Ziberwangen, and Wiger. Theſe places are diuided into Caſtle-wicks or Preſident-ſhips, and the Abbot ſendeth Prouoſts thither. Moreover, he hath his Ammans and Officers, that hold meane Courts of Juſtice in many places. Beſide, he hath a higher Court of Juſtice, whether reſort all appellations, and where cauſes of importance are decided. All kindes of duties, and ſuch as are rendered to Princes, in theſe places are confirmed vpon him.

Beſide this country, the county of Toggenbourg acknowledgeth (as Lord) the Abbot of S. Gall, who ſendeth a Gouernour into the country, and a Iudge in criminall cauſes, which admitteth no further appeale. And yet they of Toggenbourg are Bourgeſſes of Swits, and of Glaris, & haue their priuiledges & franchiſes; by means whereof (among other things) they enjoy the Freedom of Religion. Alſo in the Bayliwick of Rhinthal which belongeth to the cantons: the Abbot holdeth law courts of Juſtice in many Villages, & keepeth Officers there for that purpoſe.

CHAP. X.

Of the Common-wealth in the Towne or Citiſe of S. Gall.

Saint Gall, Mulhouſe, and Rotuile, are numbered among the Imperiall townes, and therefore haue (almoſt) the ſame manner of gouernement, as we haue already deſcribed vnto you. But becauſe the citiſens of S. Gall, do hold ſomething in particular; I will here ſet downe a ſummary deſcription of their common-wealth.

In the fiſt place then, the Towne of S. Gall is diuided into fixe Tribes or Companies, & the Society of Noblemen. The fiſt & principal of theſe Tribes, is of weauers, becauſe of the linnen cloth there wouen, which is made very faire, and in abounding quantity: which afterward is ſold in Germany, France, Italy, Spain, Eoemia, and Poland, greatly enriching the inhabitants that dwell in S. Gall, and making king the Towne much renowned. It hath two counsell, according to other towns, to wit, the great and the lesse. The lesse is composed of foure and twenty, and namely first of all, twelve Zunftmesters. Each Tribe, Colledge, or Company, hath three Masters, which gouerne the company a yeare, turne by turne: but there are no more then two, which enter into the lesse counsell; the first is of the new, the second of the olde. The Zunftmesters are elected by secret voyce in their Tribes, and are confirmed by the lesse counsell. Euery yeare, the counsell and officers of iustice, are elected about mid-Iune, and mid-December. Beside the Zunftmesters, nine other Senators do assist in the lesse counsell, and are chosen as well in the company of Noblemen, as in the other companies. The three Consuls (with them) make the number of foure and twenty counsellors: For there are three Consuls in S. Gall, the first is in charge; the second is called olde Consull, for hauing gouerned in the very neerest yeare before; and the third preiudeth in iudgement for criminall causes, and in other places he is called, Prouost of the Empire, Rechnung. The counsell is elected the first Sunday of Aduent, not in the lesse counsell, but in the generall, by secret voyce, Mis derraun: the Sub-consull and the Zunftmesters, going then out of office, do collect the voyces.

The great counsell is composed of threescore and fixe, to wit, twelve of each company: whereby there are ninety persons in the great and lesse counsell. After the election of the Consuls and the counsell, the ordinances of the Towne are read in this assembly: whereon the Consull and the new counsell do deliberate. Then they go (by two and two together) to the great Temple or Church, named S. Lawrence, where all the citizens meete, and after reading of the lawes and ordinances, the Consull sweareth first to obserue them, and afterward, receiue the oath of the counsell and whole assembly, the same oath. This done, the morrow after christmas day, and the day following the Zunftmesters, and the other eleuen Seigneurs of the lesse counsell, do meete together in the Towne-house, and elect the Sub-consull, whom they call Vnderburgmester. His charge is to take order for the watch of the Towne, and to appoint Tutors and Ousefers for Widdowes & Orphanes, and also to examine their accounts.

Euery weeke, the lesse counsell do ordinarily meete together twice, on Tuesday and Thursday; except those dayes be Festiuals, or haue Fayres. Also the Thursday before Lent, which they call the mad Thursday, Den Unsinnigen donstag: because once, and on that day, the people mutined against the counsell, by means whereof it was ordained, that (fro thence forward) there should be no more assemblies held, as on 8 day. The lesse counsell manageth the Townes affaires, decideth ciuill causes, and giueth sentence concerning inheritances and willes: but medleth with no criminall suites, nor differences about Scedules, Obligations and iniuries.

The great counsell meeteth together five times euery yeare. First, the morrow after christmas day, when they elect and confirme the new Magistrates. Secondly, in mid-Lent, to elect and confirme the Master of the Hospitall. Thirdly, the Friday before S. Bartholmewes day, being the foure and twentieth day of August, whē they establish the Masters of Halles, and consider on the tolles and taxes at the Gates. Fourthly, and fifthly, before the Fayres which they keepe, on the morrow after Ascension day, and the day of S. Gall; and then they consult on the conseruation, and course of Courts for the Fayre.

The great counsell also doth sometimes extraordinarily meete when they are to discourse on matters, whereof the counsell ought to haue knowledge, as concerning sentences in criminall suites. Then the Prouost of the Empire sitteth President, and demandeth each case: this is done in the Towne-house, and the doores kept close. The lesse counsell electeth the Prouost, and giueth him power to iudge. Afterward, the great counsell decideth the appellations made vnto him, and receiue such strangers as desire to be Bourgeois.

But this is done more often, in the ordinary assemblies of the great counsell, and

and then also they conclude there on many appeales. Sometimes the lesse counsell sendeth affaires of importance to the great counsell, to bee considered on.

Euery yeare, the counsell generall of all the people, is assembled three times, about publicke affaires. First, to elect the Consull. Secondly, the morrow after Christmas day, to take oath of the new Consull, and to binde him to obey the Magistrates. And thirdly, in the Moneth of August, about S. Bartholmewes day, after that the ordinance for tolles and taxes is agreed vpon, to heare the Lecture, which is made before all. Moreover, the lawes and statutes of the Towne are distributed into three parts; one part whereof is deliuered to the people, in each of these three assemblies.

The principall and cheefest Court of iustice, is that of five; who are the Consull, the Sub Consull or Lieutenant, one of the new Zunftmesters, and two of the new counsell. They iudge in differences concerning borrowed monies, things laid to pawne, debts that haue no certaine time prefixed, wages that are due, suites concerning victuals, iniuries, and fines. They sit on the Wednesday, or Friday, and there is no appeale from their sentence; neuerthelesse, they may send backe difficult causes, and of importance, to the lesse counsell.

Next to this, there is the Towne court of iustice, Das Statgericht, composed of twelve Assistants, chosen out of the Noble mens companie, and out of the other companies: so that the one is of Zunftmesters, and the other of the people. The cheefe Officer of this court is called Statamann, Maier of the city, and is elected with the other Magistrates, about Christmas day, and is confirmed by the great counsell. As for the Assistants, they are changed twice euery yeare, and elected by the great counsell, on one of the feast dayes of christmas, & by the lesse counsell, about S. Iohn Baptists day, in the Moneth of Iune. These Iudges take knowledge of debtes, barrerings, and yearly rents, although the summes bee great. They are called together by tolling the Bell, and assemble in the Towne-house on Monday in euery weeke, except it bee a Feast day, or that all the counsell doe meete together, for then they referre those causes till Wednesday. A man may appeale from their sentence, to the lesse counsell, provided, that the suite be of no lesse moment then an hundred Sols, or Shillings: and if the appellant loseth his cause, he is condemned in a fine to the Iudges.

The consistory court is composed of eight Iudges, whereof foure are Ministers of the Church, or some other men of learning: next, two counsellors of the lesse counsell, and two of the great. There sitteth another Seigneur of the lesse counsell, as President, who questioneth the causes: and if there be as many voices on the one side, as on the other, hee rediceth both parties to such a counsell, as hee conceiue to be iust, and then sentence is given accordingly. The consistory censureth matters of marriage, and of diuorces, and no appealing is permitted from sentence. But if there happen any inuolued or entangled variance, or if some colour of pollicy be mixed with the case of marriage; then cause and all, is sent to the counsell, where the deciding is suspended, vntill the counsell, and some other learned men, haue aduisedly considered thereon.

As for publicke Offices, estates, and charges, this common-wealth is therein gouerned, as the other are; hauing Treasurers, Masters of Halles, Receiuers, and Administrators at the Gates, for customs, tolles, and taxationes, Vogts, &c. Such as hold these places, do render their accounts, first to the Zunftmesters, next to the lesse, and lastly to the great counsell, on the morrow after christmas day. Hauing giuen vp their accounts, the lesse and great counsell do elect new officers, or reconfirm the olde: and it is openly read, what the charge is of each one of them in particular, and afterward, in presence of the counsell, they sweare to discharge their duty faithfully. But when many are established in one and the same charge, then such rules as they are to follow, are giuen them in writing.

And because the very greatest trading of S. Gall, consisteth in linnen cloth, and that not onely the people of the towne, but them also in most part of the Villages round about, doe maintaine their liues thereby, the counsell is diligent and carefull, for well ordering all things in that respect, and for the auoyding of fraud and deceit. First, therefore, so soone as the weauer hath finished a peece of cloth, there are three expert sworne Visfiter or Ouerseers, that come to looke vpon it, and according as it is good, or indifferent, they set on such and such marks. If it appeare to be bad and naught, they send it to the Zunftmaster of the weauers, and to the other eleuen Zunftmasters, who condemne the workman in a fine, or cut the whole peece into some portions, of eight Elles in length each one, or else through the midd, or if it bee worth nothing, they burne it openly. This view and visitation is done daily, and there is a Market of linnen cloth, which hath certaine Lawes, for the obseruation whereof, they that deale in such Merchandize are strictly bound.

After that the cloth hath bene seene and approoued, the sworne Measurers do both Ell it, and marke it. The Measurers haue some other sworne men of the Mystery, to be their adiuncts, and the Merchants haue with them the Ouerseers of the measuring. They call them Dirreiff, measurers of linnen cloth, which are of diuers lengths: but a whole peece consisteth of 134 Elles, and may not be of any greater length. There is another view made at the whistlers, when the cloth is thickened and whited. These Viewers are called Dirreiffen Schotter. They looke that the clothes haue their requisite whitenesse, and whether they sustaine any harme in the thickning: and according as they finde, they marke, or condemne the whistler in a fine. Likewise there are certaine Merchants and Weauers, that visite the whistlers houses and grounds, to see if all things bee fitting and conuenient there: whether they haue sufficiency of wood and ashes, that none may be wronged by delay. Every yeare the Masters whistlers take newly their oaths, to doe their duties as becommeth them.

As for the clothes which the Viewers (which they usually tearme Blaw und Schwarzgishower) thinke fit to send to the Diars: the cutters of linnen cloth, named Lintwirtschnyder, do cut them iust in the midd, and there are other committees, to regard that they haue their iust measure. After they are dyed into colours blew or blacke, if the Ouerseers finde the dying to bee well taken, they marke the peece, and when they haue plained and smoothed it with a Rowler; others come to approue it valuable, and they set on the Seale. Contrariwise, if it be spoyled and viciate in the dying: they cut it, or dip it againe, if it may bee done, and the Plainer and Diar are condemned in some fine. All these things aboue named, are very carefully obserued, and if any dare do otherwise, hee is severely punished. For the Towne or City of S. Gall hath this priuiledge, to condemne in criminall suite, to fetch men out of places of refuge, and to punish them that vse any fraud, in weauing, marking, sealing, dying, plaining, or misusing any Linnen clothes.

Something likewise must needs bee said, what order they of S. Gall take, to auoid the inconueniences of fire: because they hauing bene heretofore much endamaged thereby, it hath made them (suruiuing) to be the more prouident. Euery euening, for the space of a quarter of an houre, there is a Bell rung, and it is called Die Feurglocken, the Fire-Bell: which admonisheth euery one, to looke to the hearths of their Chimnies, for feare lest fire shold take in any part. Then are there two Zunftmasters, that four times yearely do visite the hearths, furnaces, & chimnies in all the houses; and thereupon are called Die Feurglocken, Visfiter for fire. They regard also, what Armes and prouision of foode the Bourgeses haue: and whether they be prouided and furnished, according to the ordinances of the Seigneury.

Beside, if there rise any impetuous windes, or any rough stormes or tempests happen (beside the ordinary Captaines of the watch, whom they call Die Wachtbitter) there are two other, named Masters of the watch, Die Wachtmaster, who take with them two men of euery Tribe, well appointed, and goe with the Captaines of the watch, to walke the round through all the streetes of the City, to prevent the dangerous accidents of fire.

Euery night, two and thirty men keepe watch on the Towers and Walles, and in other places of the City, beeing appointed as Sentinels, by the cheefe Zunftmaster, with the Captaines of the watch.

Concerning the Grisons in elder time.

If fire take in any part, some of the Citizens runne to the Gates, some on the Towers and Walles, some into the cheefest streetes; some keepe company with the Confull, and others labour to quench the fire. There are foure Captaines of the lesser councill, that haue a care of all this businesse, commanding euery one to that which is to be done, and punishing greuously the disobedient. If the fire be without, and neere the city, they send forth a certaine number of men with their Captaines, to prouide against the inconuenience. Others keepe watch at the Portes, upon the Walles, and in other places, where they are by them appointed.

I spare to speake heere of Schooles, Almshouses, and Hospitals, because they of S. Gall gouerne themselves therein, as other well pollicied cities do, and carry a faire and comely order among them. Likewise, I will not speake of the election of the Ministers of the Church, nor of their establishing and charge, neither what order they hold in their assemblies: because in this worke, we treat on the matters of policy onely, referring to discourse on the other, at some after time and place.

CHAP. XI.

The Common-wealth of the Grisons.

HE name and dominion of the Grisons heretofore was of great extandure: but now wee vnderstande by that word, a people of the Alps, who the French and Italians haue named Grisons, and the Switzers Gratopundter. In ancient times, they inhabited Rhetia in the Alpes, neere to the source or head of Rhine, and of Inn.

The Grisons are diuided into three Leagues. The first is called the League

Grise, and hath ten Communalities, to wit, the Abbey of Dissentz, which the ancient Cardes or Mappes called Dijertine. To this Abbey are ioyned Tumach, Trumb, and some other places. 2. Waltersbourg, 3. Oberfachs, 4. Lazmitz, 5. Fals, 6. Thanz, 7. Schlewis, 8. They of Laax, Siaiss, and them enuironing about the wood. 9. Thannen. The Grisons call these nine Communalities; the part about the wood, Die obber Wald; and the other ten, they call, vnder the wood. 10. Flims, 11. Trimon, 12. Saßen, 13. Ratzuns, the ancient abiding of the noble Family of the Barons of Ratzuns, 14. Hentzenberg, and Tafis, 15. Schoppe, 16. Schamps, 17. Spugen, 18. Mafax, 19. Rufflee.

In each of these Communalities, they yearly elect a soueraigne Magistrate, which many of them do call Amman, who with the Iudges or Assitants, elected by the same comminallity, doth iudge suites in law, and condemneth delinquents, according to the exigence of the case. Beside these Amman, there is a great Prouoost of the whole League, whom they call Der Landrichter, who is chosen by euery one in the general assembly of all the communalities, and sitteth President in the dayes meetings for all the League.

These meeting dayes for this Grise League, is in the Village of Trumb, which is the cheefe comminallity, and there also meet the Seigneurs of the Iusticial court, wherein the Landrichter sitteth President, who hath fiftene Assitants, one Clarke or Secretary, and one Officer. The Lord of the Castle, and of the Barony of Ratzuns, is yett above the Landrichter, by an ancient prerogative, belonging to the race of the Barons of Ratzuns, in whose rights, the Lords of the places haue euermore succeeded.

The second League is called Der Gottthubpundt, The League of Gods Household, or of the Cade or League Cathedral, because of the Bishoppricke and Colledge of Coire: and it hath one and twenty Communalities, which sometimes were reduced into eleuen much greater. The Towne or City of Coire is numbered in the first place, as the cheefe of the League: and alone (among the eleuen Communalities) is compounded of two lesser. But as the citizens are enclosed in the same walles: euen so are they counted but for one Comminality, and the other twenty reduced into ten, make vp ten great Comminalties. The city (for so we will call it) of Coire, hath a common-wealth apart by it selfe, like (waiting but little) to that of Zurich, and to other governments of the same condition. For first of all, the citizens are wholly diuided into five companies, from each of which are chosen fourteene men, who are of the great councill publike: so that the great councill and generally, is composed of feventy. From these feventy men, are chosen five of each company, for the lesser councill: to whom are ioyned the five Zunftmatters of the precedent year, whereby the lesser councill hath thirty counsellors, whereof fifteene called Senators, gouerne the common-wealth.

In the councill there are two Consuls, who are Presidents (turne by turne) a whole year. The councill and the Officers of iustice, are yearly elected on the eleuenth of Nouember, being the day of S. Martin. The thirty of the lesser councill do iudge in criminal causes, and the Governor or Provoost sitteth then as President, remaining in that charge a year: at the ende whereof, another taketh his place, and they two are (in this Office) as two Consuls. Next, there is a Court of iustice belonging to the Lieutenant, who hath fifteene Assistants, to witte, the five Zunftmatters, and ten from the thirty of the lesser councill. This Court taketh knowledge of ciuill causes, and pecuniary actions concerning debtes: there is appeale from them to the lesser councill, who doe decide also matrimoniall matters.

The second Comminality, which wee should count for the third, because Coire takes it selfe for two, is named Die vier Doerfer, the foure Villages. 4. Bergon. 5. Tiefencastlen. 6. Stalla. 7. Trincken, with Reamps and other Villages, which with Tiefencastlen, make one iurisdiction, where the Bayliffe of Reamps iudgeth ciuill and criminall causes. 8. Fatz the high, where sometimes dwelt the Barons of Fatz: this Comminality is ioyned with the fourth. 9. Fursthon. 10. Ortenstein in Tumelch. 11. Sinnada. 12. Zutz: these two are in Engadin the high, and make one of the great comminalties. 13. Ardette. 14. Sculaine. 15.

Reamps: which with two other small comminalties, maketh one of the great. 1. Bergell about the Port. 17. Bergell vnder the Port. 18. Pesilaw, or Postlaaf. 19. Bruschi, which is ioyned with Postlaaf, and maketh one of the eleuen great Comminalties. 20. Munsterthal. 21. Mals. Each Comminality hath his Ammans, Podesjats, and vnder Officers as they teame them in least authority, vnder whom they are maintained in liberty.

The third League tearmeth it selfe the League of Iuridictions, or the League of Rights. The first and principall of the ten, is called Tafas, in regard of a Village so named, where the house of the League is, and where the dayes meetings for the ten Comminalties are held. 2. Beelfort, or Almanu. 3. Churwalden. 4. Langwyl. 5. S. Peter de Schanjk. 6. The little Abbey in Bretzgow. 7. Jenais, or Caelfer. 8. Schners. These eight iuridictions doe acknowledge the Arch-Duke of Austria to be their Soueraigne. Anciently, the Barons of Fatz were Lords thereof: but all their race sayling, the Counts of Toggenbourg succeeded them. And after them, the Counts of Amat, whereof one being named Gaudenius, dying in the year one thousand, foure hundred, eighty nine, left these eight iuridictions to the Arch-Duke of Austria.

The Arch-Duke established a Governor there, which to this day is chosen among the Grifons. The Governor dwelleth at Caelfers, and presideth in sentence of criminall causes: he manageth and conserveth the other rights of the Arch-Duke, who hath not the same right and equal authority ouer the eight iuridictions: but each of them enioyeth his priuiledges & particular customes, the instruments and charters whereof are kept at Tafas. The first and fourth iurisdiction have great priuiledges and immunities, farre beyond the other.

The ninth Iurisdiction is called Mals, by reason of a Village so named, betwene the Riuer of Langwyl, & Mount Rhetica towards the South.

The tenth is named Meysenfeld. These two last did belong sometimes to the Barons of Fatz, afterward to the Counts of Toggenbourg; then they fell vnto Wolfhard de Brandis, in respect of his Wife, who was of the house of Werdenberg. The they

they became ioyned (with the other eight Iuridictions) to the two Leagues of Grifons, and made the third; referring to the Lords of Brandis, the right iustly to them appertaining. Afterwards, these three leagues together bought these Iuridictions, and sent a Governor thither, who dwelt in the castle of Meysenfeld, and fare President to iudge in criminall suites: he condemned men in fines, and to death, & gathered the tolls, and other publike reuenewes. The ten Iuridictions allyed themselves together, in the year one thousand, foure hundred, thirty six, conditionally, to succour one another, & be abiding in all things (iust and reasonable) against enemies, repelling all wrongs that should be offered to any of them, & procure the peaceable enioying of their liberties. Also, all rights and duties appertaining to the Lords, they should be duly rendered, they permitting them to possess their franchises and priuiledges: all the rest being careful and proud to preferre the good and benefit of one another.

In the same year, or the next following, these Iuridictions made perpetuall alliance with the two other Leagues, and so the three leagues became ioyned as in one body, the particular parts whereof have bene already mentioned. But in our numbering and setting them downe, we haue rather followed the situation of the place, then the ranke which they holde in the dayes of assemblies, wherein notwithstanding are many opinions: & therefore I will describe them heere, according to the comminalties of the two first leagues, & as they are comprized in their alliance with the Switzers. The Comminalties of the Grife league, are the valley of Luginz, Ylanis, Oberjachs, Waltersburg, Laax, Simis, and other places about the Woods, Flims, Schewis, Trimmis, Retzuns, Hemmenberg and Tufis, Schamps, Rhinwald, Mals, and Ruffee, Safen, Thannen, Schopine, Fals. The Comminalties of the league of Cade, are in order as they followe, Coire, Fursthon, the foure villages descending on Alpremont, Fatz the high, Reamps, Tiefencastlen, Grifonheim, Benio or Stalla, Auers, Bergel about and belowe the Port, Zutz, Sinnada, Postlaaf, Steinberg, Schuls, Remiff, Munsterthal, Mals, Galsen, and Schantzen. As for the ten Iuridictions, I vnderstand their order thus, Tafas, the three Iuridictions of Bretzgow, Beelfort or Almanu, Churwalden, S. Pierre, Langwyl, Mals and Meysenfeld. I know very well, that some doe name these Comminalties otherwise, but that importeth nothing, because in each Comminality there are many times notable villages, so that the Comminality sometime takes his name of one, and sometimes of another. For mine owne part, I haue named the principall places of the Comminalties.

Thus then there are three leagues of the Grifons, containing fifty Comminalties, which (neuertheless) doe make but one Common-wealth. For, although many of the Comminality haue their Iudges lawes, customes, & iustice, alwel ciuill as criminall; yet notwithstanding, the Soueraignty is with the councill of the three leagues (which they name in their Language, Ein punds tag): dayes of meeting or assemblies of Ambassadors, from each comminality of the Grifons: whether some of them send two Ambassadors, others but one only. If the councill be ordinary, the Grife League sendeth thirty 28. Ambassadors or counsellors; that of Cade 2. and from the Iuridictions, 14. If either one or other doe send a great number, they haue no voyces there, but according to the aboue-named account. Sometimes also, the councill general of the whole Nation (which was made no long time since) doe meet together: but that is very rarely.

The fore-mentioned councill, manageth the affaires of the common-wealth: yet in such fort, that the counsellors or Ambassadors deale not according vnto their owne best feeling, but as the commaunds and remembrances from their comminalties, and which they bring with them in writing on the dayes do direct them, and whereto they conforme their resolutions, which passeth by plurality of voices. The councill of the Grifons is (almost) like to that of the Switzer: for there they treat on the selfsame things which concerne the good of the whole country: of peace, of warre, of alliances, of Ambassages, lawes and ordinances, & causes of appeales from the Baylywickes. There are three places appointed for the to sitte in councill, to wit, Ylanis in the Grife league, Coire in the league of Cade, and Another principal Councell or Senate for them all.

They have another Councell or Senate, which they name Cin bytag: where the principal Magistrates only, and, as being the cheefe of the three Leagues, do assemble themselves together. These men, are the Iudge-Principall for the Grise-League; the Councell of Coire for the league of Cade, and the Amman of Tafas, for the League of the tenne Iurisdiccions. At all times, and as often as neede requireth, to provide for the publique affaires; and it appeareth not convenient, to call all the Deputies of the country together; then those 3. Principals do meete, with some of the cheefest of the three Leagues. But they cannot determine absolutely, only they referre separately unto the Communalities of the three Leagues, whatsoever hath bene difficult among the Councillers, and that which is approved by plurality of voyces, is receyved of all. There is appeal also from the councell, to the Communalities, and then matters are propounded in the Communalities, whose sentences are set downe in writing: and being conferred on, they are gathered to a resolution and an arrest, by the pluralitie of Voyces.

When variances happen amongst the Leagues, how they are to behave themselves.

the same League. But when the Communalities of divers Leagues are at difference: the councell of the three Leagues, namely the Iudges, are to provide therefore.

When one Comminality, or some particular person therein, hath proccesse and suite against the three Leagues, or any one of them; two or three Iudges of each League are then to be chosen for it. And when two Leagues are at difference against the other, fixe Iudges of the two Leagues, and fixe of the other alone, are to be appointed. If they cannot conclude the strife; an arbitrator must be chosen, by plurality of voyces of the three Leagues. These judgements are to be delivered first at Ylantz, nexte at Coire: a second time againe at Ylantz, then againe at Coire, and at Tafas the last of all.

It would much weary mee, if I should describe at large the Statutes & customes of the Grifons: notwithstanding, I shall not greatly displease or offend the Reader if here I glance at a worde or two. First then, it is agreed vpon betwene them, by the consent and aduice of the whole councell, that neither the Byshoppe of Coire, or any of the Ecclesiastical Order: shal elect or establish any ciuile Magistrate, nor aduance a Governour or Amman, for any Comminality or Iurisdiction whatsoeuer; but that the people of the Grifons (by their suffrages only) shal elect and choose theyr owne Magistrates.

Such as haue obtrayned any Offices of the Byshoppe, may not be accepted into councell, so long as they do remaine in his seruice.

As concerning the Ministers of the Church, every Parish electeth their owne: may depose them, pay them their Wages, which are too little in many places.

Thoroughout the country of the Grifons, no small Tythes are payed, and as for the great, they pay but the fifteenth part, and giue nothing in the field, but they giue it in the house, and alwayes after the haruests both for their Grapes and corne.

within their Iayd Comminality.

Thoroughout all the countries, one weight and measure of things liquid and dry, is to be vsed, to wit, the weight and measure of Coire. And it is not lawfull for the Bourgeses of Coire to alter any thing therein, without the consent of the other Leagues.

For our conclusion, we are to speak of Governements and Bayliwickes, wherein the three Leagues of the Grifons do command equally. On this side the Alps nere to Coire, they send a Governour to Meyensfeld and to Melaniz. On the other side the Alps beneath Bergel, toward the riuer of Maire, the Government or Bayliwick of Plurs first presenteth it self, which is a great village in the field neighbouring to the Alpes and on the bankes of Maire riuer, and euen as sightly to bee lookt on, as if it were a good Towne. In this place, there are digged infinite Chauderons of Rocke stone coales, which serue as fewell for the kitching; and it is faithfully reported, that the nature of this stone-coale is such, as when Fish commeth to boyling, they make them mount and leape out of the kettle into the fire; these coales are very abundantly sold in Italy. All the villages round about, are answerable and like to Plurs, where the Governour (whom they terme Podstat) decideth causes, & is soveraigne in that place in name of the Grifons, and deputed by them.

Next is the Towne and countie of Clauenna, whereon Plurs in elder times depended. Clauenna is a Towne about the Lake of Coma, about fivie miles, as Antonius obserueth it also, in his booke of the wayes. The Grifons call the Governour of Clauenna, Commissary: & he is the most apparant, next to him of Sondria. The third more spacious and noble gouernement is that of the vale Telma, famous for the excellent wine, which there is made in extraordinary plenty, and is thence transported into Switzerland and Germanie. The whole vale of Telma, is diuided into fixe Bayliwickes. The first is that of Bormia a Towne about the valley, towards the Mountaine of Braull: this Bayliwick hath many priuiledges and franchises, farre beyond the other. The second is the townie of Tiran. The third is Tel, whereof (as some thinke) the vale Telma first tooke name. It is a Towne seated in a very high place, & appearing to be so naturally: & it is counted to be the best fortresse of all the Province. Sondria, the most renowned town of all the vale Telma, maketh the fourth Bayliwick. It is the most rich & powerful among all the rest, and he that is Governour thereof, is called Captain, because ouer and beside the Bayliwick, hee hath an eye to the whole valley when it is chief in Armes. He hath his Lieutenant, who iudgeth with him the ciuill causes of the the Bayliwick. Hee iudgeth also the criminal matters of all the vally, hauing lawyers and learned men to his councell, and giuing sentence according to the Lawes and Statutes of the vale Telma, which ne (uertheless) may be moderated & made milder in the Bayliwick by the Podstats. Beside all this, all causes may be appealed to the councell of the Grifons Seigneuries, or to them that they haue ordained commissaries, and sent to iudge: or finally, to the councell of the Communalities, who haue the soueraigne power. The fixt Bayliwick is called Morben, and the fixt Trahon, which is last of all.

This is the order of the Bayliwickes of the vale Telma, yet some doe not set the Bayliwick of Bormia in this ranke, but diuide the whole vale into three partes; whereof the first comprehendeth Tiran and Tel; Sondria maketh the second; and Morben and Trahon are the third. In electing the Bayliffes, they follow the order of the Leagues and Communalities. As for example, if the Grise League establish a Capitaine at Sondria for two yeeres, the League of Cade sends one thither for the two following years: at the end whereof, the League of the Iurisdiccions sends one for two other yeeres, this order is obserued in each League of the Communalities. And sometimes the Communalities, who should send a Bayliffe by their turn, would elect him only; but now the councell of the Grifons makes the election. The byshop of Coire, and the City, do stampe money. The Abbot of Disentis hath the same priuiledge also, amongst many other.

4. Sondria.

The Governour of Sondria is called Capitaine, and iudgeth in causes both ciuill and criminal for the whole vale.

CHAP. XII.

The Commonwealth of the Valaisians, or people of Valois.

The diuision of the country of Valais or Valois, the higher, & the lower.

THE whole country of Valois is diuided into two parts. The higher Valois from the source or spring of the river of Rhone, so farre as the river of Morfia, which vnitheth it selfe with Rhone, somewhat beneath Sion. This was the dwelling of the ancient Viberines and Sedusians. The lower Valois, is from the river of Morfia, so farre as Saint Mauris, and this was the country of the Veragrains.

Suen Iurisdiction in the higher Valois.

The higher Valois is diuided into 7 Iurisdiccions, which they call Dixaines, wards, and Zenden in the Alaman tongue. I know not whence this worde is deriued, for it cannot produce the number often, because there are no more Iurisdiccions. A friend of mine told me, that the worde intended so much, as Diocesses, because that euery Ward hath his Diocesse or Iurisdiction, his Common-wealth, and priuiledges apart by it selfe. Others do hold that the word Zenden cometh of another word, signifying, an Hundred: as in the Lawes of France, the Offices of the Earldomes or Counties, the Vicariates and Hundreds are number; and in some places of Germany, they are called Zengraues, the Iudges of some certaine Iurisdiction. But without standing so strictly on the words originall: wee may verie sely reame them Diocesses or Comminalties. So then, there are seuen Comminalties in the higher Valois, to wit, Goms, Brighe, Vespie, Raron, Leuck, Siders, and Syon. These seuen Comminalties haue thirty parishes. The lower Valois hath fixe Comminalties, which they call Banneries: because each one hath his particular standard, and foure and twenty Parishes so numbered.

Hundreds or Banneries, or the account of so much land.

Six Banneries in the lower Valois.

Long warres betwene the Veragrains & Viberines.

The Veragrains or lower Valaisians, had (in times past) long warre against the Sedusians and Viberines. In the end, after fourescore and thirteen yeares, they were overcome and subiected; so that the Se-duisians and Viberines ruined sixteene Castles, the old pitifull foundations whereof, are yet to be seene, and it is not lawfull for any to builde them againe, for feare they should prouee hurtfull to the countrys liberty. And therefore the higher Valois ouer-rueth the lower, and sendeth Gouernors thither to iudge in causes, & manage the affaires of the State. The Byshop of Syon (whom some call Count & Gouernor of Valois) is Prince of the country. Hee is elected by common suffrages of the Chapter of Syon, and of the 7 Dixaines of higher Valois.

Higher Valois ruleth ouer the lower.

The Byshop of Syon Prince of Valois.

Charlemagne gaue the Gouernment of Valois to the Byshop of Syon.

The Annales of Valois do declare, that Charlemagne gaue the County and Gouernment of Valois, to Theodofius, Bishop of Syon, and to his successors with power to beare a sword, in signe of ciuill Iurisdiction, and other priuiledges of Princes of the Empire. Because that Byshop (by reuelation of an Angel) had declared to Charlemagne, that some secret sinne (I know not what) was forgiven him. Howbeit, there are sufficient circumstances to call the country into suspicion, as we haue already made more ample mention in our description of the country of Valois. Notwithstanding, it is certaine, that the Emperors which came after Charlemagne, accorded & confirmed the fore-named priuiledges to the byshops of Syon: namely, the Emperour Charles the fourth, then Charles the first renewed & increaled them willingly, at the request of Mathew Shiner Byshop and Cardinal of Sion, from whom he had deriued many good and gracefull seruices.

The priuiledges of Valois confirmed by the Emperors.

Afterward, the Byshop had another grace granted, that the next most excellent estate to his, should bee that of the captaine or Bayliffe of the whole country whom they vse to call Landts haupman. He iudgeth in ciuill causes, and continueth in his charge the space of two yeeres: being elected by the Byshop, and by the Ambassadors of the Dixaines or Comminalties. Afterward, he is confirmed by publike approbation and consent of all the comminalties, which haue each one his Magistrate, whom they of Goms, Raron, and Leuck, call Maire, the others Capitallan. He iudgeth all suites, especially them criminall, with the counsellors which the comminalties giue him as assistants. There be Ammans also (who are soveraigne Magistrates in the Cantons of Switzerland, but they of Valois are iudged inferiours, and haue Maiores as they are superiours.

Appeale may bee made from the sentence, which is giuen by the Iudges of a comminality, to the counsell of Valois, who are called Den landts rath; and according to the custome of theyr Ancestors, they assembled twice a yeare, in the months of March, and of December. At which times, two or three Deputies of each Village, do meete at Syon, in a Castle named Maierin. The Byshop assisteth there, and the Bayliffe calls for the causes, and then they treat on assayres of the Common-wealth, election of gouernors and publike Officers, & such as shal iudge in the last power, of causes that concerne appeale.

The Barons of Raron, were sometimes great Lordes in the country of Valois. Their successors were the Lords of Chirron, who are Marshallles of the Bishopricke of Syon, Vicount of Syon, and Stewards of Valois.

As for the Maze, which they tearme Murtzen, it is a particular inuention of the people of Valois, to oppose themselves against the power of great and rich men. We haue made ample mention in our description of the country of Valois, and there declared, wherefore it was putte in practise, and how it began.

We haue told you, that the Byshop & the seuen Dixaines of the higher Valois, hold the souerainety of the whole country in their hands. The lower Valois is subiect to them, and is parted into fixe Comminalties, viz. Gnaudes nere to Syon, is the chiefe Castlewicke or comminality of lower Valois. Heeretofores it appertayned to the Canton of Berne, but in thewar which the Switzers made on the Duke of Savoy, in the yeare 1536. the Valaisians did there recover it, in exchange of another country. 2. So that all Valois, is shut or lockt vp by a Tower, & two gates (as it were) at both the endes of a bridge, vnder which the Rhone glydeth. In the yeare, 1475. the Valaisians brake down the wals and fortresses of the fore-named places, except that of Saint Mauris. Without the country of Valois, the Valaisians possessed themselues of 3. Bayliewicks, during the warre of Savoy: as namely, Montey, Trian, and Hochall. Neuerthelesse, some few yeares after that they surrendered Yusan to Emanuel Philibert, Duke of Savoy, and retained both the other.

CHAP. XIII.

The Commonwealth of Bienna.

THE Towne of Bienna made perpetuall alliance with the Bernians, as wee haue already sayde: and it happened in the yeare one thousand, three hundred, fifty two. Thirty yeares after, it contracted perpetuall Alliance with Solleurre; and in the yeare one thousand, foure hundred, and seuen, with Fribourg, so it became allyed with three cantons of the Switzers. It acknowledgege as temporall Lord, the Byshop of Basile, because as concerning the Ecclesiasticall Iurisdiction, it is the Diocesse of Lansanna: but it is a long time, since it was no more subiect to the spirituall gouernement of the Bishop, as in like manner were the citizens of Zurich and Berne.

Bienna made alliance with the Bernians.

The Ecclesiasticall Iurisdiction of Bienna.

Afterward, when it came to passe, that the Bernians got the possession of the Bishopricke of Lansanna, they enfranchised Bienna of the Ecclesiasticall subiection. The Byshop of Basile is Lord thereof very peaceably in temporall power, and establisheth the soueraign Magistrate, whom they call Maire: but hee is chosen out of the number of the Townes counsellors, and the Maire giues oath to the counsell, and they to him. Hee taketh knowledge (with the counsell) of criminall causes; & sitteth as President in censuring them. The moitie of fines, amounting to aboue 3. Liures Tournois, appertaineth to the Byshop, with some tenths, and other reuenues: but the ports, rolles, customs, and such like, belong to the Towne only, and not to the Bishop. For hee is not permitted to impose any charge whatsoever vpon the Bourgeses, nor to engage the Towne: but the Bourgeses are bound to go in warre for the Byshop, and at their owne expences, yet no further then a dayes journey from the Towne. If hee would haue them march any further, hee is bound to pay their wages. Yearly, there is repetition made to the Councell, what priuiledges Byshop Immer Ramstein gaue to the Town, in the year one thousand, three hundred, fourecore, & three. They of Bienna haue as ample priuiledges as in the greater Basile.

The Common-wealth of Bienna is gouerned in maner following. All the Bourgeses are diuided into fixe companies or brother-hoods: yet in such order & carriage, as no one man whatsoeuer may ioyn himselfe with two or more of the companies, who haue each one two Masters, & a seruant attending. The Councell publicke is chosen out of the number of these Bourgeses. The lesser councell is composed of foure and twenty: and the greater, of thirty councellers. The election is made at the yeares ending, and at the beginning of the year following, their names are openly published in the church. There is choise made of some Electours, out of the great and lesser councell: who (in presence of the cheefe Secretarie) do confirme the ancient Councellers, or elect new, if there be any such need.

He that sitteth President in the councell generall, is called Bourgmaster, and is elected by the great and lesser councell. He is next in office to the Maire, & when they deliberate on affaires of the Common-wealth, and question is vrged concerning ciuil cases: the Maire and Officers to the Byshop depart, and leaue the Bourgmaster President. Next to him are the Treasurers, Banderets, voysers, or Surueyers, the Iudges of the Consistory, the Hospitaliers, and others elected in publicke charges, by the great and lesser councell, who are not aduanced to such Degrees, but as they are knowne apt and able. The Banderet onely, is chosen by all the people. Hee hath charge not onely of bearing the Towns banner; but also (with the Bourgmaster) is protector of Schollers, taking care that they may haue diligent and faithfull Teachers and Querseers, and to take their accounts. The lesser councell assemblh three times every weeke, to wit, on Monday, Wednesday, and Saturday; but if any man doe desire to haue a cause extraordinarily decided, paying a Florin to the Maire, the councell shall be then assembled. Bienna hath no other particular Iurisdiction, but the Councell iudgeth all causes ciuill and criminall.

They of Bienna, are Lords of the Valley of Saint Immer, for so likewise is the Seignoury of Argau called, and is diuided into many Comminalties, which haue (each one) their Maire or Amman elected and confirmed euery yeare, in the moneths of May and September. But they of Bienna haue not any bayliffe, for the Comminalties haue their courres of Iustice, and when the parties cannot bee agreed, the cause is sent to the councell of the Towne, who send sometimes assistants to helpe in the country pleadings, and to end their suits: but appeale may be made from their sentences to the councell of the Towne. The inhabitants of this valley, do march in warre vnder the Standartes of Bienna.

CHAP. XIII.

The Common-wealthes of such people as are gouerned in common by the Cantones of Switzerland. And first of all of stipendary Townes.

Our former booke, we haue distributed the people gouerned in common, by the Cantons of Switzerland, into fixe stipendary Townes, and nine bayliwickes or Gouernements. Those Townes haue their Magistrates & Councell by themselves, to wit, a lesser Councell composed of twelue, and a great, of forty Councellers, comprehending the twelue of the lesser in the number. The cheefe of the councell is called: Schultheiss, or Auyer: hee is elected at Bada, by the lesser and great councell.

At Bremgarten, the fixe first Cantons establish one of the two Auyers: who (notwithstanding) is in number of the Bourgeses, onely of whom the other is elected.

The ordination of the seven Cantons.

Hee of Frawenfeld, is elected by the Councell generall but in secret voyce. The Councell of these Townes doe elect Treasurers, voysers, and other Magistrats: for the Townes haue priuiledges, to provide for publicke charges, and haue likewise treasures, and good round fums of ready gathered monies in them, for their condition and extendure, because the customes, tolles, and taxes do belong vnto them. Neuerthelesse, in the town of Bada, which is the passage of Germany into France, the custome belongeth to the town; but the tolle for Merchandizes transported that way, appertaineth to the Cantons. The lesser councell of these townes, provide not onely for the townes affaires, but also do decide suites: for they haue no other Courts of iustice, except at Frawenfeld, & they haue likewise both ciuill and criminall iurisdiction.

Bremgarten commandeth ouer some Villages neighboring to the town, which they call the Bayliwicke of Cella. This country is in the gouernment of the free Prouince, appertaining to the Cantons: but it was engaged sometimes to them of Bremgarten. When the Emperour Sigismund did put them of Zurich in possession of the free Prouince, he gaue them priuiledge, to disengage the country: but they of Bremgarten entreated them, that in regard of the amity, which had til then continued betwene the two townes, they would leaue the country to them, which was easily granted them. Wherefore at that time, by the liberality of them of Zurich, who gaue it them by Letters: they of Bremgarten were put and confirmed in possession of the country, in the year one thousand, foure hundred, and eightene.

Neuerthelesse, they of Zurich referred to themselves the foweragntie, & the punishment of Malefactours deserting death. The year one thousand, fise hundred, twenty eight, a difference happened betwene them of Zurich and Bremgarten; to wit, about the causes of appeale, and to whom it belonged. The seven Cantons ordained thereupon, that the Bayliwicke of Cella, might appeale to the councell of Bremgarten, and from them to Zurich: but as concerning suites moued at Bremgarten, the appeale was to bee brought before the eight Can-tons.

The town of Frawenfeld, beside the councell apart by it selfe, hath an assembly of twelue Iudges, who decide suites among the Bourgeses, and country people in the Villages, that are vnder the townes iurisdiction. But as for criminall causes, and variances touching inheritances, and such like things; the knowledge of them belongeth vnto the councell. These Iudges execute their arrefts, in condemning of certaine fines, and making seizure on the goods of condemned persons. Appeale may bee made from them, to the seauen Cantons: but there is no appeale from the councels sentence.

For the present, by permission of the councell, the Amman of the country is cheefe of those Iudges; but anciently, and about an hundred yeares since, it was to the Apparatur of the town, and afterward to the Agent or Prouost of the Empire.

Vhen any Malefactour is to be condemned to death, the Iudges make choise (as please them selues) of twelue other men of the town, or of the villages resorting thither; and then these foure and twenty men may condemne to death. Frawenfeld obtained this priuiledge of the Emperour Sigismund; and therefore they haue prisons purposely. From the time of the Austrian Princes, they hadde power to put criminall persons to death; now adayes the Cantons conferre and maintaine the rights to Frawenfeld: and although condemnation of death appertaineth to tenne Cantons, yet Frawenfeld stands excepted, which dependeth not, neither is subiect but to the seauen first Cantons, the priuiledges referred.

Moreover, this Towne hath some particular rights, touching testaments and inheritances, and the Bourgeses may exact their debtes thorough all the country of Turgow (annuall reuenues excepted) according to the rights of Iustice of the Prouince, and may (without punishment) lodge such as haue beene banished by the lawes; but they cannot bee drawne into any strange iustice, but the demander must come and pleade at Frawenfeld.

some rightes at Frawenfeld, whereto the Bourgesies stand obliged, and (anciently) the most part of them wer subiects to the Abbey: but afterward, they enfranchised themselves from all charges of seruitude, and now adays, before giuing any Oath vnto the Abbot, they receyue Letters from him, whereby hee promisseth them, not to sel, engage, nor alienate the rights which he hath at Frawenfeld, by reason of the Abbey; and besides, that hee will conferre and keepe all their ancient Priuiledges, Franchises, rights, and good customes.

The ancient power in time of warre.

Finally, in the times of war, anciently, the Seigneurie of Frawenfeld elected the Capitaine, the Ambassador, the Ensigne, and other cheefe offices of warre: which all the countrey of Turgow followed, and tooke Oath to them. Also, the Standard of the Towne is adorned with Images of Saints, like to the Standardes of the Catholique Cantons, to wit, with a Crucifixe, and two crossed Keyes; and on the other side, is the picture of Iesus Christs face, as in a Linnen handkercher. But within some fewe yeares they of the Prouince of Turgow obtained leaue, to haue their particular capitaines and Standards. In meane while the Towne of Frawenfeld, and the places that are of other Iurisdiction, haue theyr Capitaines, Ensigne-bearers, and their auncient Standards.

Of the Bayliwicks or Gouvernments.

The custome obserued in most part of the Cantons for their Bayliwicks.

WE haue already formerly set downe, how many Bayliwicks or Gouvernments the Switzers haue, to what Cantons they appertaine, and how they became Lords of them. The Cantons do send their Bayliffes turne by turne, and in the most part of the Cantons, the custome is; that the charge is giuen vnto one of the Councillers of the lesser councill. The Bayliffe continueth in his charge two yeares, and then giueth place to him that is sent by another Canton. They gouerne the Bayliwicks according vnto the Lawes and customes of the people: neuertheless, in the Bayliwicks on this side the mountaines, the Bayliffe doth not iudge alone in criminal causes; but hath (as adiuncts or assistants) the Iudges of the Prouince, in regard whereof, they do call this course of Iustice, Ein Landgericht. They take knowledge of all suites of importance, and especially, those criminall, and giue sentence; notwithstanding, the Bayliffe is soueraigne, for he sitteth President, and hath power to moderate the sentence.

The custome on this side the mountaine

But in the Bayliwicks of Italy, or beyond the Mountaines, the bayliffes onely condemne to death: they may vrell call some learned men for counsell, but those Councillers haue no power in the sentence. Finally, euery yeare about middelune, they render an account of theyr administration; they on this side the mountaines, at Bada, they beyond, at Lugano; before the Deputies, which the twelue Cantons then send thither, and then they iudge the subiects causes of Appeale. If some strange enemy make warre on the Switzers: all the Bayliwicks send theyr people, who march vnder their particular Standards, and euery bayliwicke ioyneth with the Canton, vnder whose power it is that yeare. As in the warre of Bourgonne, they of the bayliwicke of Turgow serued the Canton of Zurich. But if there happen any ciuill warre in Switzerland, because the bayliwicks do stand as much obliged to one Canton, as another: they are not bound to giue succor, if the most part of the Cantons do not commaund them.

Of Bada.

THE Gouvernment or Bayliwicke of Bada, is much more magnificent then the other, because the dayes meetings and assemblies of the Cantons are held there: for the bayliffe of Bada euermore helpeth there, demanding for the causes in order, and sea-

(sealeth with his Signet, such things as are written in the name of all the Councill. Moreover, if the voyces be equal vpon either side: hee maketh that auayleable, where he ranketh himselfe, and by that means endeth all variance. This Bayliffe hath no authorities ouer the Towne of Bada, but ouer the Countie, which is diuided into many Villages and small Iurisdic- tions: where hee hath his Lieutenants and Officers, who hold their pleadings with Iudges of the Village in name of the Bayliffe; exact the Fines, and render him an account, and sometimes also himselfe is present in those Iurisdic- tions. But when there is question of condemning a Malefactor vnto death, foure and twenty Iudges of the whole Countie of Bada, meete together, and the Bayliffe electeth them: but the custome is, that after they haue bene once thus elected, they continue all their life time afterward in that charge, if some lawfull impeachment doe not preuent it: and when any one of them dyeth, or is dismissed, then the Bayliffe putteth another in his place. These Iudges, giue sentence according to the Lawes: neuertheless, the Bayliffe (who hath the soueraignty in his hand) may mitigate their sentence. Next to this estate of the Bayliffe, is he that is called Secretary of all the Prouince: for, beside the dignity, hee hath profite, because all the Cantons serue him, so long as the dayes are kept. Moreover and beside, hee hath a Lieutenant, who is cheefe of all the Officers belonging to the Bayliffe.

The Bayliwicke and Countie of Bada, hath two small Townes vnder it, the one named Clingenow, and the other, Keyserboul; but the Byshop of Constance sendeth Bayliffes thither, and hee of Bada hath nothing to looke to there, save onely, the acknowledgement of causes criminall appertaining to him, and the people of those places, are comprehended with the rest of the County of Bada, when they goe to warre, with, or for the Switzers. Betwene these two little Townes, is a great Village, neere vnto the Rhine, named Zurzach, inhabited as if it were a good great Towne, subiect vnto the Byshoppe of Constance, and depending on the Bayliwicks of Clingenow. I must needs say somewhat concerning the policy thereof, because it is a place greatly renowned, in regard of two great Fayres very goodly and commendable, which are there kept euery yeare. Many Merchants, not only of Switzerland and Germany, but also of France and Italy, meete there, albeit each Fayre lasteth but one day.

Many do hold opinion, that this village is the place, which Platony calleth Forum Tiberij; and that on this occasion, these Fayres are very ancient, as hauing bene ordained by Tiberius. It seemeth to haue taken this name of M. Iulius Cestius, a famous Romane Souldier, buried in that place, as is testified by an ancient inscription. The Iurisdiction of this village is one of the dependances of Clingenow: the Bayliffe electeth an officer yearly, in the Moneth of Ianuarie, and eyght Senatours, foure whereof, are in seruice a whole yeare, and they are called sworne Senatours; and then the other foure doe succede them, hauing foure Iudges giuen them as assistants. These twelue, with the Bayliffe of Clingenow, who presideth, iudge the causes, and meete once in xv. dayes; but if any man requirith (in the meane time) that the Iudges should meet together, they doe; the party paying thirteene Shillings of the Money of Zucerna.

Moreover, the Bayliffe to the byshop of Constance, cannot condemn any greater fine, then the summe of tenne pounds; but if the crime appeare to deserue more rigorous chastisements, to witte, corporally; then the Officer to the Bayliffe of Bada, executeth the sentence, and punisheth the faultie. But out of the Fayre times, Malefactors are examined, first, at Clingenow; after they haue confited theyr fault, and are conuined of capital crime, they are deliuered into the handes of the Bayliffe of Bada. At the times of the Fayres, to witte, the first day of September, and the first Holyday of the Weeke, after Pentecost, the day before the Faire, all the Iurisdiction of the Byshoppe ceaseth, and belongeth vnto the bayliffe of Bada, who hath sole power and authority of commanding and forbidding, euen vntil the end of the Faire. For in regard that a great number of people doe assemble there, our Ancestors were desirous, that these Fayres might be in the safegard and protection of such as were souveraignes, and had meanes to bee strongest in these places then. In former times, the Princes of Austria, were Lords of the Countie of Bada, but now it belongeth to the eyght first Cantons. As for the government of Zurzach, it is managed by sixteene counsellors, to wit, the twelve before mentioned, and foure assistants. But if there be any businesse of importance, it is referred to the councill general.

Of Turgow.

Turgow the greatest of all the Bayliwicks

Mong all the Bayliwicks of the Cantons, there is not any more plentifully peopled nor of larger extendure then Turgow, which hath more then fifty Parishes. The seven most ancient Cantons send thither a Bayliffe, & to them appertaineth the Seigneury and ciuill Iurisdiction of the countrey. If Switzerland be assaulted by a stranger enemy, they of Turgow ranke themselves with the seven Cantons : but the knowledge of criminall causes, and such as are capitall, belong to the tenne Cantons.

Iuridictions in the countrey of Turgow, to wit, Stekbure, Berninge, Amelach, Ermatingen, Tribeltingen, &c. Many Gentlemen are vassalls to this Abbey. The Abbot of the Hermitage, is also Lord of Elchenz. In like manner, the Abbey of S. Gall, hath Iurisdiction in some Villages, as also the Abbeyes founded in the countrey of Turgow haue, as Tobel, the Comanderie of the Knights of Saint Iohn, Fischinge, the Abbey of Benedictines, Istinge, Chartrouise, Munsterlinge and Tennikon. The Abbey of the Monkes of the Cisterians order. Also Feldbach, Calchere, Saint Katharine du Val, nere to Diessenhow, and some other Prouosts in one or two Villages, and sometimes in many, haue Iurisdiction.

There are great store of Castles, appertaining vnto diuers Gentlemen, who dwell there, and enioy their ancient Iuridictions: the names of which Castles I will recite, together with the Lords vnto whom they belong. The Lords of Vlue dwell for the present time at Wellenberg and Grisenberg. Herdere and Burgelle are to the Lords of Landberg. Wengie belongeth to the Lords of Guel. Spiegelberg, to the Lords of Montprat. Vinsfeld vnto the Lords of Schelnberg, and of Gemminge. Vpon the limites of the countrey, there is a Towne belonging to the Count of Oberstein. Nauenbourg and Mammer appertaine to the Lords of Tum. Salenstein and Blidec, to the Lords of Hannuille. Clingenberg, to the Lords of Herdroneimer. Ottishause, to the Lords of Schenck. Epishause, to the Lords of Hagenuille. Liebenfels, to the Lords of Lanz. Clinge, to the Lords of Brum. Neufere, to the Lords of Stacker. Sonnenberg, to the Lords of Gutenfon. There are many castles also ruined the most part of whole Iuridictions, doe belong vnto Ecclesiasticall persons: but other some of them belong vnto Gentlemen dwelling in other castles, and also vnto some particular men of the Countrey.

Beside, the Abbey of Rinow hath iustice both ciuill and criminal in the townie of Rinow, which appeareth to be very ancient, although it hath no store of beautifull buildings. Some are of opinion, that the Romaines planted there campe there heeretofore, to encounter with the Germanes.

In the lile which is not within the Rheine, the Abbey of the Benedictines is to be seene, one of the most ancient in all Switzerland. The Abbot is Lord of the Towne; neuertheless, if any Malefactor be condemned to death: he is deliuered vnto the Prouost or Amman of the Prouince, and his goods remaine seized and confiscated to the seven Cantons. They of Rinow haue their standard, vnder which they march in Warre for the Switzers. Moreover, there are some Towns in Turgow, which continue in the Switzers protection, and haue their Franchises & priuiledges verie ample, & Iurisdiction particular.

There is another Towne, named Bischoffzell, at the meeting of two Riuers, called Sittera and Tur, which is well into the countrey of Turgow: and it hath his Standard, where vnder the souldiers goe to Warre for the Switzers. But the Governour of the countrey is onely but to be seene there, and can command nothing of the inhabitants, who are subiect (in some things) vnto the Byshoppe of Constance, yet hee governeth according to their ordinances.

The Byshop hath a Bayliffe in the Castle of the Towne, to whom appertaineth the moitie of the Fines: but the Townsmen doe elect the Councell, and the two Presidents out of them, whom they call ancient Senatours, that gouerne the Common-wealth with the Councellers. One of the two, iudgeth in criminall causes, and there is no appeale from the sentence of the Senate: neither is it lawfull to draw a Bourgesse before any other Iustice then that of the Towne. The Impost of Wine, and other Reuenues belong to the common-wealth. When the Byshoppe taketh his Oathe of the Townsmen, hee promisseth first himselfe, neuer to diminish in any manner whatsoever, their ancient Priuiledges and Franchises.

Arbonna is an ancient Towne, on the Lake of Constance, whereof Antoninus maketh mention in his guide of the waies. It is vnder the dominion of the Byshop of Constance, who hath there a Bayliffe: but they of the Towne doe elect their Amman and Councell, who manage ciuill causes. The Switzers haue some Seignioriall rights in that place: for the cattle is open to them in the times of warre, for best accommodating themselves, and the Inhabitants are theyr Souldiers for seruice.

Diessenhow, a Towne vpon the Rheine, betweene Stein and Schaffouse, as also of the countrey of Turgow, and besides the seven Cantons, who are Lordes of this countrey: Berne and Schaffouse haue some right in the domination of Diessenhow. Neuertheless, the Townsmen giue Oath onely to eight Cantons, and haue great store of priuiledges: their councell and Aunger haue the Iurisdiction of some Townes about it. But all are eleeched to bee vnder the government of Turgow, and goe to warre with the other for the Switzers: but yet vnder the Standard of Diessenhow.

But besides the Iuridictions of the Ecclesiasticke, and of the Gentlemen: there are many Villages, wherof the Cantons are entirely Lordes, and they are called the Iuridictions of the countrey of Turgow, and the Officers of the Bayliffe, do holde the pleadings in these Villages. Heeretofore there were diuers formes of pleas, and manie customes: but the seven Cantons (by aduice and consent of the Lords of the Iuridictions) ordained and established a common manner of pleading, thoroughout the whole countrey of Turgow. Beside, if a particular man haue a suite against the Lord of a Iurisdiction, he presents it to the Bayliffe or Governour of the countrey, and of him demandeth iustice.

There are two kinds of Law and Iustice (in the highest degree) in Turgow: for they must pleade before the Iudiciary bench of the Prouince, or else before the Bayliffe and his assistants. The Law or Iustice Prouinciall, it appertaineth not onely vnto the seven Cantons, who establish a Governour in the countrey: but likewise they of Berne, Fribourg, and Solleurre, haue therein their part, whereof wee haue giuen a reason in our former booke.

Sometimes this court of Iustice was held at Winterdau, when as the countrey of Kybourg was ioyned to the countrey of Turgow; afterward, it was helde nere to Constance, when the Emp. Sigismund had engaged Winterdau to the Bourgeses of Constance, & somtimes in other places: but it is fully refolued on at Frauenfeld, and the Cantons haue concluded, that it shal neuer bee transported any whether else heereafter.

Twelue Iudges are chosen by the Bayliffe, foure of Frauenfeld, and four of Turgow: the Bayliffe sits President in name of ten Cantons; or the Amman of country, established by the Cantons; or the Lieutenant whom the Bailiffe substituteth in his place. The causes of appeale, concerning the whole countrey of Turgow, are decided in this Prouinciall Court of Iustice, together with the suits in matters of debt, the knowledge whereof may appertain to this court: also the causes of injuries, crimes, and other offences deferring death. The Bayliffe and his assistants (who most often are the Amman of the country, the Secretary, and the cheefe Vther) do censure also in the same suites: & it is at the discretion of the plaintiffe or demander, to make choise before which of the two courts he will pleade.

The Bayliffe causeth the sentences and ordinances to bee executed, with imposition of a fine of ten poundes, payable by him, that satisfieth not the sentence in ten dayes. The Prouinciall court of iustice, imposeth no fine of money, but banisheth; only referred, that it condemneth him in a fine that pleadeth his owne cause in person (because the custom is, to take one of the Iudges to declare the fact) and enters it into the Court where the Iudges vse to sit. He that is accused to contemne the ordinances of the Bayliffe, is imprisoned.

A man may appeale to the Cantons, from the sentence given in either of the Courtes; and, according to the importance of the cause to the seuen Cantons, or to the ten in taking knowledge. Likewise al Fines (as the goods of persons put to death, confiscations, and fines imposed on such as are accessaries to crimes deferring death) doe appertaine partly to the seauen, partly to the ten Cantons. Heere may be alledged (for example sake) mighty and horrid injuries, yet not meriting death: violence done by any man to him that is strictly commaunded to liue in peace with his aduersary, outrageous acts committed to a man upon the publique high way, by wounding, robbing, or offering him any such like violence. Also, if any man vsurpe, encroach vpon, enelope, or appropriate to himselfe any part of the high-way, transposse or alter boundes, markes, and limits; or change any goods layed to him by way of pawning, or giuen him in trust to keepe, if he violate Fayth, or forswear himselfe openly; or if he carry himselfe insolently toward the Bailiffe or Iudges, &c.

Besides, all such as the Prouinciall court of Iustice declareth guilty of death: are sent vnto the other Iudges with theyr causes, to haue the sentence pronounced on them. These Iudges are in number foure and twenty, and heretofore the custom was, that the Bayliffe ioynd twelue Iudges, to the twelue of the Prouinciall Iustice, and chose them thoroughout the country, at his owne discretion: but now adayes (and oftner then any other) the Iudges of Frauenfeld doe pronounce the sentence of death. This is to cut off charges, which would be farre greater without comparison, if the Iudges should bee called from diuers parts of the country, it being of so large extender.

There is no appeale granted from this sentence: neuertheless it is permitted to the Bayliffe, to moderate the Iudges sentence, or to alter the manner of the punishment vpon the Offender; or else to saue the condemned mans life; but heere may not (by any meanes) aggravate, or make heauyer the condemnation.

CHAP. XVII.

Of Sargans.

HE Countrey of Sargans, hath heretofore had Countes or Earles, that gaue it the name, and sold it vnto the Switzers Countrey. Those Countes were of the house of Werdenberg, by reason of the Counties thereunto belonging, and also of Montfort, being then diuided into many families: but the countrey standeth separated by a certain small Riuer, named Sar. Part of it, about the Riuer, hath some villages; the cheefest whereof whereof is called Regatz, where the law pleas are held: as also the Abbey of Pfauertz, the Abbot whereof hath iurisdiction in those quarters. It seemes that this part was heretofore diuided from the other, so as the name of Sargans belonged to them that dwelt beneath the Riuer, and whereof (vndoubtedly) they borrowed their name. For there is another Sargans, or of Sarunets, whereof Pliny maketh mention, which at this day is called Engadin, and neere the fourse or spring of Rheine: but they which dwell about the Riuer, may bee of the quarter of the Rheguses and Rhucans, at this day termed Rhinthal and Rhucenaberg. They haue their court of iustice by themselves, and other weights and measures, then they beneath the Riuer.

The towne of Sargans is small, and hath a Castle, wherein the Bayliffe dwelleth, and it is the cheefest of all the Bayliewie. There is a councill at Sargans, and an Auoyer, whom the Switzers (being Lords there) do establish: as also in another Towne of the same Bayliewick, named Walhenstat, on the Lake of Kiue. But the lower court of iustice belongeth to them of Sargans, as likewise the principall Villages haue their Court. The last or latest appellations, for causes criminall and capital, are held at Sargans; where Iudges are chosen, both of the Towne, and from the whole Bayliewicke. Oftentimes, in stead of the Bayliffe, the Amman is President of the country. The Bayliffe himselfe pleadeth against the offender, and hath a Secretary and an Officer. If criminall persons are prisoners at Walhenstat; then iudgement and execution to death is done there: but the Bayliffe sitteth President, and not the Auoyer of Walhenstat.

CHAP. XIX.

Of Rhinthall.

THE Bayliffe of this Valley (which taketh his name of Rheine, and is vpon the left bancke thereof, about his entrance into the Lake of Constantine) maketh his abiding in a small Towne, called Rhinck, somewhat below the Valley.

The whole Bayliewicke is diuided into certayne portions or fee-farmes, which they tearme Hofs, and these are their names: Alstett, a little Towne, Marpach, Bernanng, Tall, whereon Rhinck dependeth, and Oberriede. Each hath his iurisdiction by it selfe, and two Ammans; whereof the one is entailed by the Bayliffe of the cantons, and the other by the Abbot of S. Gall. The moiety of the fines belongeth to the Abbot, and the other part to the Cantons. Neuertheless, at Alstett the fines are diuided into three parts, whereof the third appertaineth to the inhabitants. Some say, that the higher and lower iurisdiction of this place, belongeth to the Prince of Austria. The lower court of iustice of Lutzenow (which is a Village in the Bayliewicke of Rhinthal) appertaineth to the Counts of Amsta. The acknowledgement of criminall causes, belongeth to the cantons: and their Bayliffe causeth the sentences to bee executed in those places where the delicts were committed, having Ammans for their Iudges.

The inhabitants of this Valley doe principally employ themselves in husbandry about their Vines, and spinning linnen yarne, which they sell at S. Gall, & liue very commodiously by these meanes. Also they of S. Gall haue flore of lands, and many vineyards in this Valley, with plenty of Vine-dressers and Barne-keepers: in regard whereof, they set a taxation on the wine with the inhabitants of Rhinthal, and set downe a price to be payed by the Masters and others, who buy it before vintage time at publique sale, and pay the mony to the Vine-dressers. This tax bindeth not them who haue not folde their wine before that time. When the vintage draweth neere, the Deputies of each Village doe meete at S. Gall, and the Seignery appointeth one or two of the councill to sit with them; and then they (altogether) set a price vpon the wines. If they cannot agree, but that there are as many on the one side, as on the other: then the Village, whose turne it is to bee Arbitrator, sets downe the determination. For euery Village (in his rancke and place) hath the right and priuiledge of arbitration, when as the taxers cannot, or will not agree together. The price agreed vpon, then they begin to cut and gather grapes for the vintage: but it is not law- full

CHAP. XX.

Of the Barons of Altfax.

Betweene the Bayliwicke of Rhinthal, and the county of Werdenberg, you may see the Seigneury belonging to the Barons of Altfax. Now, although the Barons are fouveraigne Lords; yet notwithstanding, in regard of the situation of Rhinthal, I was not willing to passe any further, without making some mention thereof.

The race of the Lords of Altfax is most ancient, and hee that hath written concerning Lustres and Tournamens, declareth, that the Emperour Henry, firnamed the Faulconer or Fowler, made choise among all the Gentlemen of Swabia, of Frederick, Baron of Altfax, to prescribe to others, the order to be obserued in those Royall pastimes. They of Misank in the Grisons country (whom Pliny calleth * Hiraces, at the Trophee of Augustus) were sometimes subiects to the Barons of Altfax: to whom the Emperour Sigismund gaue the name and dignity of Counts, and Wolffe, Baron of Altfax was in the warre against the Obotrites, in the year nine hundred, thirty five. Some say, that those Counts defended of the house of Altfax, and that there are many Gentlemen (of very ancient race) in the country of the Grisons, descended of the first Rhatians, who were of Tuscany, and vaunt themselves also to be issued of the Romanes.

In Antiquity, the Lords of Altfax dwell in the Grisons country. For neere to the Valley of Lengz, where they inhabite, who (among all other) vaunt and glorifie themselves, to bee of most noble and ancient race; there is the Village of Obierfax, which retaineth yet the name of that Family, and it hath a Castle of the same name. I am of the minde then, that the house of Altfax is Grison by originall, and defended (with many other of the Grisons) of the Tuscans, who were before the Romanes. Also the country, whereof they are Lords to this day, was heeretofore reputed to be of the Grisons: considering, that Strabo extendeth the Grisons limits, so farre as the Lake of Constance.

This Barony hath had heere tofore two strong Castles, to wit, Sax (which was burnt before the warre of Appenzell) and Fortegge, builded afterward, vpon the warranty of Vrich of Altfax, Abbot of S. Gall, at such time as the Barons were in warre against the Counts of Montfort. There are many Villages in this Valley, subiect to the Barons of Altfax. If any warre threaten Switzerland, they chuse their most valiant Soldiours, which they send to their succour. Also Huldreich, Father to Huldreich Phillip, now Baron of Altfax, fought valiantly for the Switzers, in the warre which they had against the Emperour Maximilian, and the league of Swabia; and as a recompence and acknowledgement of his valor, the Cantons gaue him diuers peeces of Artillery.

It is a long time since the Barons of Altfax haue bene Bourgesies of Zurich, the rest of the Cantons neuer had any dominion ouer the Barons of Altfax; but themselves were fouveraigne Lords, and no man might appeale fro their sentence, to any other iustice. At this day, there is no more of this race of the Barons of Altfax left, but one, namely, the Lord Huldreich Phillip: but by the grace of God, it is now augmented, because this lord hath had (by two wiues) five sonnes, already of good stature, and which promise faire hope, namely, Albert Iohn, Thibault Iohn, Phillip Iohn, Iohn Christopher, and Iohn Huldreich.

CHAP. XXI.

The Bayliwicks or Governemets of Italy.

HE first and principall of the four Bayliwicks of Italy, is called Lugano, and the Bayliffe is called a Captain, commanding ouer all the four, if any warre doth happen vnexted.

The second is that of Locarno, almost of of as great and large extendure, as Lugano. I will set downe in this Chapter, an exact description of the Bayliwicke and Towne of Locarno, made (at my request) by M. Thaddæus Dun, Physitian, and a native of Locarno, my very good friend. For thereby may be knowne, what the gouernment of the other Bayliwicks is, which although they are not of the like extendure, neither haue the same policy, yet notwithstanding, they are gouerned in the same manner, in respect of the Bayliffe, and dominion of the Switzers.

The Towne of Locarno, is called Lugari by the Germanes, and Locarno by the Italians. Some do hold it to be so named, as being a place of flesh: because in all the country round about, there is no meane number of cattell. It is seated on a plaine, betweene the foote of an high Mountain, and the Bank of the Lake Maior. Towards the East it hath the head and beginning of this Lake: to the South, the neck of the Lake, and the high Mountaines. It extendeth and shooteth it selfe out along the middle of the Lake, to his fall, and towards the North are also very high Mountaines. To the West, and against the lands belonging to the Bayliwicke of Bellinzona, is a plaine of great length, yeelding yearly a plentifull Hay-haruest, & thwart it passeth Thesina. Neere to the Towne, betweene this plaine, the Towne it selfe, the foote of the Mountaines, and the Lake banks, is a fruitfull parcell of Land for Corne and Wine, and a great goodly field, abounding with grasse; which heretofore hath bene much more spacious, but the neighbouring Riuer (by vndermining it) hath borne away a great part thereof. The Mountaines of long extendure, are very aptly husbanded, hauing goodly and faire vineyards in them.

Heereby we may coniecture, that Locarno is great, by reason of the Families therein, to the number of foure hundred, or thereabout: and there is not any greater Towne about the Lake Maior, neither are there more Gentlemen in any towne of that quarter, by which reason, it is the cheefe and principall Towne. This description doth demonstrate, how pleasant the place is, the ayre also is there temperate, sweete, and healthfull, euen as much as can bee desired. The windes of the South do blow there very little, and euen

as tired, broken, and spent, by reason of the Mountaines defending before it. The North winde is there also sweet enough, because the high Mountaines doe couer the Towne. From the East to the West, the windes breathe at their ease: and there is not a Pond, or Marshy plot in this quarter, so that to say all in a word, the place is sufficiently pleasing.

Heere tofore, the towne of Locarno had a great & strong castle, of very goodly shew, in regard of the many Towers & Turrets, and well engirt with sightly Ditches. It was sometimes the principall dwelling of the Counts of Rusque; and the French were Masters there, the space of thirteene yeares, but yet could not expell the Counts. There is a Pallace within the saide Castle, which is the Bayliffes house: there also abideth the Trucheman or Interpreter, and the two Switzer Archers of his Guard, of whom wee shall make more ample mention heereafter: within the walles enclosure of this Castle, there was a goodly Hauen or Port, where the Ships for warre were kept.

The Castle was square and quadrangular, beautified with Towers at each corner, and had a very strong wall about it. At that time, the Lake Maior washed the foote of the Castle, so that the Ships were easily sent forth vpon the Lake. But now, the Riuer of Madia hath gathered such abundance of sand and grauell, as the place is become faire enough off from the Lake. Since the year one thousand, five hundred, thirty one, the Switzers wholly ruined the Castle, except the Pallace; the foundations are yet to be seene, and the walles of many houses, for there was not any castle so strong in all the country. Also it was munited with Artillery of all sorts, and other furnishings for warre, in great plenty. Frances Guicciardini maketh mention in the fift Booke of his Histories, that fiftene thousand Switzers got themselves together, to go and assault this castle; thereof he speaketh againe in the eleuenth Booke, and at the end of the twelfth.

Long since, in the times of the Dukes of Milaine, the whole country was commanded by the Bayliffe of Locarno (except the towne of Brifag) and it was a county, wherof the Rusques were Lords, they being Gentlemen of marke in the towne towne of Coma, whereof also they were Masters sometimes, but after they surrendered it to the Duke of Milaine, in the year one thousand, foure hundred and sixteene. But afterward, this county was diuided in two parts, and the Vale Madia separated from the Bayliwicke of Locarna.

At that time also, the Vale of Verzasche and Gambaron (whereof shall bespoken hereafter) obtained leave, to elect their Podestats. The extendure of the Bayliwicke of Locarna, may bee knowne by the Parishes, whereof there are twenty and more.

The foote-ground of the Mountains of Locarna, and a great part of the Territory, yeeldeth plenty of very good wines. In the Hilles and Mountaines, the Vines are bound high, and store of good grasse groweth vnder them. On the plaines they shoote vp about Elmes and other Trees, as Hops do about Poles; also the twigs as being wouen together, and bound at the ends, are extended from one Tree to another. But if they stand too farre off, where the branches come too short, then they fixe poles in the midst, whereto they fasten the branches, for feare lesse they should hinder the Cornes encrease, or the other sorts of pulse, which are also there sowne. The Vines are of great and incredible yeelding, the grapes huge, and very ripe, which causeth an extraordinary plenty of wine.

The fields cannot be very spacious, in regard of the so neere neighbouring Lake and Mountaines: yet notwithstanding, they are very fertile, by reason of the grounds goodnesse, which the husbandmen do fatten and labour very diligently. For because there are no great store of fields and meadowes, and the townes is sufficiently peopled; their paines are performed at the better leysures. Many times they render twenty graines for one, and they haue two Harvests in one year. In the Moneth of June, they reape and gather Wheat and Rie: In the Moneth of October, they haue the like of Millet, Pannick, and other Pulses sowed in Spring time.

The Mountaines and Vallies are furnished with cattell in great abundance, especially Goates. Also there is plenty of Partridges, Pheazants, Larks, Hares, Co-

nies, Butter, Cheefe, and admirable store of Chestnuts, for the nourishment of country people. At the beginning, they eate them rawe, then dried, and afterward boyled, roasted, and fried. Also they make Meale of them for Bread, and that Meale serueth the diuers viles: but Gentlemen eate chestnuts among their other delicacies.

When therefore there is a good season of chestnuts, the death of other vituals is not great in that country: where also is store of good Figs, variety of Apples, Peaches, Peares, Cherries, and other dainty fruites, as Plums of diuers kinds, Pomgranets, Citrons, Oliues, Oranges, and other fruites in great plenty. The Lake aboundeth with Fish, dainty and good; especially Trowts, whereof store are brought & sold in Milaine. In briefe, the country is enriched with all good things, for the maintenance of life; yet sometimes there is scarcity of Corne, by reason of the countries narrowness, and Salt is brought thither from other places.

Every Thursday there is a great Market at Locarna, where meete no meane store of people. You shall see many boats arrive there, from all the Townes of the Lake Maior, from whence come diuers Merchants, rather to buy, then sell. They come thither also from sundry parts of the Dutchy of Milaine, from Lugano and Bellinzona, neighbouring Bayliwicks: as also from Misunk, and the Valley of Lini, not speaking of them about Locarna, and the vale Madia. It is one of the goodliest Markets in all those countries. There is a very spacious place neere to the Lake, where the Merchants set vp Tents, to defend them from raine, and such like accidents.

The people of Locarna are diuided into three degrees, to wit, Noblemen, ancient citizens, whom they call Bourgeses, and the inhabitants, descended from diuers parts, and whose ancestors began to dwell at Locarna, more then an hundred yeares before.

There is a fourth race noble, as of the Aurelles, Murales, Magorians, and Duns. That of the Duns is the most auncient, and before the other: their houses and goods beeing partly at Locarna, partly at Scone, which is a Towne neere to Locarna, but not so wel peopled, seated on a plaine neere to the Lake. At such time as the Counts of Rusque commanded, the Duns were fauoured and honoured, more then the other Nobles, and advanced to great estates. And the Arms of the Counts of Rusque, magnificently illustrated, are yet to bee seene (outwardly) on the Duns Pallace at Locarna. Next, vnder name of the people, are reckoned all them that dwell in the Vallies and Villages, dependants on Locarna. The whole body of the Seignoury or Bayliwicke, is called the Comminalty.

As for the Bayliffe, whom they call Commissary, hee is choien by the twelve Cantons, and sent to Locarna every year, by one of the said cantons, as it is then in rancke, according to their lawes and alliances. This commissary is Soueraigne, and hath full power to chastise the fault, yea, to condemne to death, if the case do to require. His custome is to take wife & vnderstanding men, expert in the lawes and manners of the country, to bee his counsellors. Hee is not receiued into his charge, till he haue first solemnly sworn and promised, to keepe the lawes and ordinances, which the inhabitants rearme municipall rights. Which being done, the people there present, do acknowledge him for their lawfull Governor; with sollemne and publike acclamations, & swearing faithfully to obey him.

Now, because the commissary speaketh the Switzers language, and the people Italian; the Lords of the Leagues do allow him a Truchman, who vnderstands and speaks both the languages, to whom they pay wages. By entremise of the Truchman, the commissary, the parties that plead as Attornies or Aduocates, do vnderstand each other, and so debate the causes: which the Secretary or Prognatory writeth downe in Latine. The commissary medleth not with the affaires of the common-wealth, because the people haue full power to elect Magistrates and Officers, to ordaine of all things concerning the publike estate.

Moreover, they elect an ordinary Atturney, who pursueth criminall causes, & keepeth the fines adiudged to the common purse, which they call, The fines Chamber. The Lords of the leagues giue order for the election of this Atturney; who is one of the Bourgeses of Locarna, and continueth as long time in that Office, as please the said Lords.

They establish also the Receiueurs of the taxes. For euery year, in Summer, when the twelve Ambassadors of the Cantons come thither: they giue the farming of the taxe (mitigating a certain summe) to one, or to many Bourgeses, who then also receive ample power, to exact the taxe, and at the yeares end they pay it.

The Commissary chuseth (sometimes) a Switzer Officer, who walketh daily attending on him, with an Halbert and a Sword. He is the cheefest of the Sericants, that arresteth men, and guardeth offenders. When the Ambassadors come to Locarna, hee is their Viceroy: also, they pay him his wages, as well as the Truchman.

The same Commissary electeth his Lieutenant, some one of the Bourgeses, fitte to decide suites and criminall causes. This Lieutenant giues attendance in the Commissaries absence, or when hee is with-held by sicknesse, or any other hindrance: hauing (in those causes) the same power and authority, as the Commissary hath.

Moreover, the councill (of whom we shall speake presently) makes choise of some Sericants among the people. Their charge is to serue the Common-wealth, and to execute the commands of the commissary.

The Bourgeses and inhabitants that are of this County and Comminalty, do meete together according to their custome, which yearely is the first day of Ianuary, and then they elect the one and twenty counsellors of the Common-wealth. Twelve among them are of Locarna; three of the townes of Scone, which is neere: the other fixe are of the Vallies and Villages round about. As concerning the twelve of Locarna, fixe of them are Noblemen, foure Bourgeses, & two inhabitants; yet sometimes three, and fixe Nobles. The three of Scone, there is one of the family of Gentlemen, called Duns, and the two other are of the body of the people. The other fixe, whom I haue said to be of Villages and Vallies, are of such places, as acknowledge no other Gouernour, but the fore-mentioned Commissary.

sary. This I speake in regard of the towne of Brissag, the Valley of Verzasche, & Gambaron: which haue their Podestats or Lieutenants, and some rights apart by themselves, as we shall shew anon, and they do not elect any counsellors.

The counsell of the Bayliwicke of Locarno, hath charge to watch and waite on the affaires of the common-wealth: to conclude on needfull expences & wages: to dispose and set in order, whatsoever seemeth for the good of the weale publike fit and conuenient.

Seven Procurators or Attornies are added to the one and twenty counsellors, who giue order, that the decrees of the counsell may be effectually executed, and that euery man do his duty thoroughly & faithfully. They stand also in stead of Voysers or Suruayors: because they take charge of publike buildings. In like manner, there is a Secretary whom they call Chancellor; and he setteth downe in writing, all things whatsoever that are concluded on by the counsell.

And forasmuch as the Conminality lockes not vp any of the publike monies, there is yearly a new Treasurer elected, who exacteth and collecteth of consuls and communities, such summes of money as are imposed by the counsell. For euery community or parish hath his Consull (so called, because they counsell and aduise that which is necessary for the communities welfare) and is in Office as a Receiver. They leuie vpon euery Father of the Family, or on each house, the money whereat they are assessed by the counsell, and afterward bring all to the Treasurer. The manner of assessing these summes, is according to the estimation of goods, & the number of households in euery community.

There is not any Parish nor Family (how little soeuer it bee) but iustly knoweth, how much it is valued at in the assessment. One of their cottisations amounteth to an hundred pounds of the Empire: which make seven and twenty Florins of gold, or thereabout. The Consuls do first collect this summe of the Families, and then deliuer it into the Treasurers hands, and he afterward paies it to the Seigneurs of the annual accounts. Then it is payed out in wages, to the Bayliffe, to the Physicians, to Masters of Schooles, Officers, and other persons, who are al at wages of the common-wealth: And beside, it acquitteth all other publike charges. The yeare being expired, hee yeeldeth vp his account to the counsell, or to the Procurators. If there be more omitted then received; his successour disburseth it himselfe. Contrariwise, if the receipt doe surmount the ordinary charge, the remainder is deliuered ouer into his successour. Moreover, the fore-named Magistrates make choise of two sufficient men, to haue a care of food and prouision. And other two are elected by the counsell, to see the wayes and streetes duly and decently repaired and well kept.

Now in regard that the country is enuironed with Mountaines and Vallies, replated with woods of extraordinary tall trees, exquisite for their beauty and braue branching (among others the Pine, which produceth very excellent Agaricke, and the Firre-tree, notable for building, and whereof they of Locarno make very great benefit) the Merchant dealing in wood, do elect a Judge or Master of the Forests, who decideth all differences proceeding in such cases. When the taule trees are cut, they bring knowledge therof to him, and then he ordereth their lesser cutting, for more commodious conuaying them through the narrow passages and vallies, as also the Rocky crooked windings, to the Lake Maior. When they are there shipt in apt Barques and Boats, they passe along the Lake, and then on the Thesina to Millaine and Pauia, in great Trunkes, Beames, Joists, and long Planks; together with great quantities of wood-coales, and other brush-wood, for heating Ovens. Afterward, they descend with them from Pauia, by the Riuer Po (wherein Thesina discharge it selfe) to farre as Cremona, and Plasentia, and may goe also to Ferrara, Manua, Venice, and to the Adriaticke Sea. The trunks of the trees haue their length and thickenesse iust, and the Merchants marks on them. The valley of Verzasche, the vale Madia, and other neighbouring places, doe also send away Trees very abundantly, when the Riuer swell higher then their vsuall wont.

The towne of Brissag, which is vpon the Lake Maior towards the North, and at the end of the country which the Svizzers hold, is of the Bayliwicke of Locarno, and

and is but foure miles distant off from Cambrico. It hath also to the East, the Vallie of Verzasche, taking his name of a Riuer so called, and thence descending: Also Gambaron to the South, and on the Lake Maior. These places haue their Podestats, who iudge in ciuill causes: for as concerning their criminall, the knowledge of them appertaineth to the Commissary of Locarno. There is appeale granted from the sentence in ciuill causes, if it seeme good to the party condemned. They of the Valley of Verzasche, and of Gambaron, do chuse (among themselves) such persons as they please, to be their Podestats: but the people of Brissag haue not that authority, but yearly doe elect a Lieutenant, who is of the Family of the Aurelles. Gentle men of Locarno. The Inhabitants of this place are not cottised or selfed, as the other Communities be: but onely pay their part of rentage due, to the Lords of the leagues, and of wages to the Commissary. Beside, they furnish towards the charges, that are in their Villages and Communities.

Of this Towne of Locarno thus described, are descended the Locarnians dwelling at Zurich, and in other places. It is not about thirty yeares since, that some Citizens of Locarno, yet living, affected to the new Religion; tooke knowledge thereof, by the reading of certain books, and afterward constructed it to many of their Townsmen. From the yeare one thousand, five hundred, forty two, vntill the yeare one thousand, five hundred, fifty foure, the zeale and number of them began to encrease, and notwithstanding the persecutions, embraced it the more earnestly. The most part of the Seigneurs and people, not willing to suffer it, expelled (in the yeare following) about thirty Families: namely all such as would not forsake that new opinion, and returne againe to the Romane Church. There were people of all kindes in this troope, Nobles, Gentles, and Yeomen; learned and vnlearned; rich and poore; great and small; husbands without their wives, and wives without their husbands; fathers without their children, & children without their fathers. The men of Zurich receiued them very louingly, and did, and yet do many kinde courtesies to them: so that diuers of the are embraced as Bourgeses, and the rest maintained at the expences of the Seigneury. At the beginning, they receiued a good sum of monie, lent by them of Serne, and another collected at Basile, and in some other Townes of Sauoye, where with the poore people haue bene long time maintained.

S Spaine, so tearmed of Hispalis, or of Hesperia, or Helperus, by being a part of Europe, and neere to the VVest; hath her Confines in this manner. On the East, the Mediterranean Sea: On the VVest, the Ocean: On the South, the fireights of Gibraltar: And on the North, the Pyrenean Mountains, which make diuision of France & Spaine. The principall Riuer in this Prouince, are fixe in number: Myuo, Luria, Traia, Guadiana, Guadalquibir, and Iberus. This Kingdome (by our Auncients) was diuided into three parts, to wit, Baxica, Lusitania, and Tarraconia. At this day, Baxica contayneth three Regions, namely, Granata, with her City Royall, which is called Granada; Andalusia, with the City of Siuil; and Extremadura, with the City of Menda. Lusitania hath two Regions, to wit, Portugall, with the City Royall, named Lisborne: and Galicia, with the city that is called Compostella, where the body of S. James is saide to be. Tarraconia hath nine Regions; as Aragon, with the city of Sarragossa; Nauarre, with the city of Pampalona; Catholonia, with the city of Barcellona; Biscay, with the city of Viluro; Castile the elder, with the city of Burgos or Brage; Castile the newer, with the city of Toledo; Leopuca, with the city of *S. so called. In the kingdome of Granada, there is an Island named Caliz, which hath a city also called by the same name. In the Ocean Sea, and in the Mediterranean, there are three feuerall Islands, subiecte to the gouernement of Valencia, to wit, Jeniza, Matorica, and Minorica. The Portugals vse their nauigation into the East Indiaes; and the Spaniards of Siuil and Caliz, into the West. The circumference of Spaine is about 1893 miles. The kingdom of Portugall, frō the South part, beginneth at the city of Leppa, and on the North it extendeth to Baiona of Galicia. The most notable Ports or Hauens of Spaine, on the North part, are S. Sebastian, the Port Galezia, the Port Andrea; the Port of S. Vincenzo; and the Port of Ribadeo; the Port Ierol; and the Port delle Gragne, or of the Groyne. On the VVest part, are the Port of Monuedra; the Port of Portugall; the Port of Lisborne; & the Port Secuball. On the South part are the Port of Silua; the Port of Siuil; the Port of Caliz; and the Port of Caliz in the Island; and the Port Beger; & the famous Port Cartagena. On the East part is Port Calibre, now called Porto venere.

Spaine hath feuen Arch-Bishoppicks, and the residence is made in Tarraconia, in Sarragossa, in Toledo, in Compostella, in Braga, in Lisbona, and in Granata. Vnder the aboue-named Arch-Bishoppicks, are many Cities and their Bishoppicks, as Barcellona, Girona, Ierida, Tortosa, Valencia, Maiorica, Ostia, Monnedro, Burgos, Salamanca, Corduba, Legua, Tariffa, Almaria, Siuglia, and others.

This Country (in many places) is not reduced to tillage & husbandry, because the ground consists of a very stony earth, and is much squallide and filthy through desertnesse: notwithstanding, in respect of Africa, it is very fertile, and this entueth through the ouer great heate which is in Africa. It aboundeth in all those things that are necessary for man: as in VVine, Come, Fruites, Oyle, Cattell, Line for all garments, yron mettals, VVaxe, Hony, VVaters well stored with Fish, and such other like things. They make no Salt by buying or seething, but dig it out of the earth. And they haue not so many windes as France; neyther are they so stored with marish and fenny grounds, whereby the ayre is much corrupted. There is not found any Gold, Siluer, or Yron, so good and approued, or in such plenty, as in Spaine, and the gold is taken not only out of the Mines, but also out of the Riuers, which when they encrease by much plenty of raine; they doe produce sandes of gold; & especially the Riuer Tagor. There are found out in many places, diuers wells and springs of hot and cold water; maruailously good for the helpe of diuers & sundry infirmities, which happen to the bodies of men. There is likewise great abundance of Beasts, both wilde and tame; and especially of swift horses, which were supplied by our Elders, to be conceived by the windes. They haue no hurtful creatures in any great store, Conies onely excepted, who making their caues vnder the ground, doe much harme to the rootes growing in the earth. Their Riuers glide away very gently, for hardly can their motion be discerned; and therefore they do not ouer-flow, or drowne the fields, being also well stored with Fish, because the Sea (by helpe of the Riuers) doth not send any plenty on land. Galicia is much commended for the Mines there breeding, and sometime it hapneth in this Region, that by prowing vp the ground, the people finde little graynes of gold. The language of the Spaniards, is not much different from the Italians; from whom they receiued it, whē they were subiecte to the Romane Empire. On the Northerly part, the Prouince is not so colde as in that climate of France: for it sendeth into France, Oyle, Hony, Waxe, Saffron, Madder, Barly, dying-coulors, Chuchinelo, Snger, Oliues, Lemons, Dates, Cedar, Pomgranats, and other things; but especially many thousand weights of wool, & much wine, dried plums or prunes, rafines, almonds, chefnuts, bay-berries, salted salmon, and other things, which are sent into Italy, & frō thence transported to France.

The temperature and complexion of the Spaniards, is much more hot and dry, and their coullor more dun & foggy, the that of the French: because they are more colde and moist, hauing their flesh more soft, and their coullor whiter, & the French women are more gentle, and apt to conceiue children, then the Spaniards are. The Spaniards are more raw-boned men of body, the French, and in war they teed with counsell and arte, being silent by nature; as men that know most exquisitely, how to dissemble their owne intentions, walking very grauely, and vsing much ceremonious behaviour in their customs & qualities. They drinke wine temperately, line with great respect, & are of acute vnderstanding & knowledge in their words. In Spain there are a great number of Princes, Dukes, Marquesses, Earles, & Barons, and euery one of them hath the reuenues and profits, from 50. to 60. thousand Ducates yearly. The Marquesses are 20, beside the like reuenues. The Earles are 60, with reuenues from ten, to twenty thousand Ducates. Then there are Viltcounts, Gouernours, and Barons, which are called Adalantadoes. There are great Masters of the Orders of knighthood; as of S. James, of Alcantara, of Calatrana, of S. Iohn of Ierusalem, of the Rhodes, of Montese, and others; who dispend (each one) about 50. thousand Ducates in reuenues yearly. The women go pompeously apparelled, wearing rich eare-rings of Pearl & Gold, hauing their garments plaited, after the manner of Italy. Vhen they walk abroad out of their houses, the men-seruants go before them, and the maids follow after. The most part of them do willingly drinke water, and so paint their faces with white and red, that it is most lothsome to behold. They are discreet in speech, yet prettily wanton and lasciuious, & deliuered with effectual gestures, especially in amorous matters. It is not many yeares since, that the people of this Prouince, hath gotten a great name of military seruice, as men that are most patient in labors, suffering most valiantly both thirst and hunger, and being matchlesse for subtilities in Soldier-like affaires, quicke and nimble of body, both for pursuit & flight. They haue conquered many countries, bringing thence very honourable victories, especially vnder Charles the fifth, Emperor.

THE Kings of Spaine, as great in power, and valorous, in regard of Military prouision, were alwayes held in no meane reuerence among their people. For men bearing ordinarily affection to their Soueraigne, their beneuolence is so much the more encreased, by how much the King liueth vertuously and iustly, according to the ordination of his owne lawes, for so shal hee be both loued and serued. And in conclusion, the worthy deeds of his Lords, that are enriched with vnderstanding and iudgement, doe highly support him: euen as the wicked actions of such as know not how to rule and gouerne, doth ruinate & ouerthrow him. The Kings of Spaine haue possessed this Prouince many yeares peaceably, though it was (a long while) nested by the Moors; whom at length they expelled, and reduced the whole politicke body to a quiet condition, and greatly deuoted to the catholique church, whereon the King attained to the title of Catholique King. The king then is the cheefe Ruler of the kingdom, and ordereth matters as best him pleaseth: but heere it shall not much differ from our purpose, to sette downe some other obseruations, concerning the originall & succession of this kingdom.

Spaine in her younger daies was held by sundry petty Kings and Tetrarches, & afterward became diuided into many commonwealths fix in number, as some haue written. The Carthaginians, a people of Affrica, bazzarding their fortune thereto: held one part thereof, and possessed themselves of many Cities, Townes, and places; vntill they were expelled thence by the Romanes, in the time of the Punicke wars. Since when, it was continually subiect to the Roman common-wealth, & reduced into forme of a Prouince onely, in the reigne of the Emperour Augustus. So it remained till the Emperour Honorius in whole dayes, the Vandales (a people of the North parts) brought it vnder their command. But they (soone after) chased thence by the Goths, who established there the seate of their kingdom; which they maintained (in that kinde) for the space of about 200 yeares. Nor were they then called kings of Spaine, but kings of the Goths. In the reigne of Roderick, king of the Goths, the Moors entred

Spaine, in the year 715, they being brought thither by one named Iulian; in very desperatefull incignation, and to shapen our way to his bloody reuenge, because king Roderick had dishonoured his Sister, or as others say) his Daughter, whereof heretofore we haue spoken more largely. And so did the Moors possesse themselves of all Spaine, seizing the city of Tolledo, which was then the capitall city. So ended the kingdom and name of the Goths in Spaine. Nor rested they thus, but pursued on their conquest still, & there remained but Gallicia, the Asturies and Leon: which countries king Pelagius, Vnkle and Successor of Roderick, had fled too for refuge, & there shutt up himselfe, in regard that those places were enuironed with Mountaines, and might well defend and shelter him for some time. But his Successors being hardly pressed by the Sarrasins, could no longer resist: wherefore, vnder the reigne of Alphonso the second, they were forced to craue the helpe of Charlemagne, king of France, by whose valour and vertue, the Moors were beaten thence a great way, and had bin quite cast out of the country, if the Spaniards mallice had bene no hinderance thereto. Afterward, the kings of Leon and Gallicia (for such were then their onely titles) being so formerly preferred, began somewhat to encrease in power. And in regard of this expeditiō performed by the French, the strength of the Moors was so weakened & diminished, that many other kingdoms were established in Spaine, as that of Nauarre, by Enecho, Count of Bigorre, in the year 950. which hee tooke away from the Moors and Sarrasins, by a very valiant conquest of them. And afterward, in the year 1166. was Arragon reduced to a kingdom, by the will and testament of Sancho the great, fourth king of Nauarre; for loue to Ramyrus his naturall Sonne, who was the first king thereof. This was the same Sancho, who being Earle of Castile, in the kingdom of Leon, tooke on him first the name of King of Castile, which he left vnto his Sonne Ferdinand.

The kingdom of Portugall was also conquered fro the same Moors, by Earle Henry, Sonne vnto the Duke of Lorraine; who held it first of all vnder tytle of an Earle, in the year 1110. but quickly after, he brought it to be a kingdom. Spaine did

The first King of Castile.

Portugall conquered from the Moors.

did continue so (in this kinde of state) for a long time, diuided into many kingdoms: & the Moors had also their abiding ther, possessing still a great part thereof; till such time as Ferdinand, the first, king of Arragon (who was married to Isabell, the onely heire of Castile) wholly expelled the Moors out of Spaine, in the year 1492. In no great distance of time after, he possessed himselfe of Sicily and Naples, invading also the East Indies. But fraudulently he sturped the kingdom of Nauarre, against John d'Albret, who was (indeede) the lawfull King. And it is this Ferdinand, and Isabell his wife, in whom onely wee may truly say, that the kingdom of Spaine had her first beginning. They left one only daughter, named Joane, who was married to Philip the first, of Austria, Sonne vnto the Emperour Maximilian, and Mary of Bourgundy: he succeeded in this kingdom of Spaine, and other countries beside. He was likewise Earle of Bourgundy, of Flanders, and Lord of the Low-countries, in the right of his Mother. In this his marriage, was borne Charles the fifth, who was afterward Emperour. He reigned nine & thirty yeares, preferring his Prouinces very happily: and hee left succession (both in Spaine, and the more part of his other countries) his Sonne Philip the second, who reigned three and forty yeares, hauing ioyned to his other estates, the kingdom of Portugall, in the year of our Lord, 1580. and so (consequently) at that which the Portugals held in the East Indies, and elsewhere; as in Affrica and Brafile, which came vnto him by the death of Henry the Cardinall. He died, aged seuentie yeares, the thirteenth day of September, 1598. No long time before his death, hee had made peace with the mighty and most christian King of France, Henry the fourth. Philip the third, his Sonne, succeeded him, and reigneth as yet to this day. He married Margret, daughter to the Arch-Duke of Austria, by whom he had a Sonne, in the Month of April, 1606. Now let vs returne where we left before, concerning the king of Spaine, who being a good king, and liuing orderly; therefore on him doe depend the following councillors, who are speciall members of gouernement, both in the Court and elsewhere.

Councillors of Estate Royall.

THE supream assembly of Spaine, which is the very same, that (in effect) hath the gouernment of most important affaires in their power; is the Royall or Kingly Council, so termed of the vocable king; because they are (among all other councillors) as the King himselfe among his greatest Lords. These councillors doe prouide for the peoples liuing, in all things that appertaine to a well ordered state: because from them do proceed all meanes and deliberations, concerning matters of Graine, taxations, customes, prouisions, and other substantiall occasions for safe being; but euermore assisted by the Princes authority. These councillors are in number twelue, all principall men of the kingdom, & noble by blood, hauing a President as their cheefe. And from these Noble-men, being assembled together, do come all orders, whereby the whole Realme of Spaine is gouerned: and the appellation of three Audiencies, called the Chanceries of three kingdomes, do all resort to this councill.

The Council of Inquisition.

In regard of the conquests which the Moors (in former times) made of this kingdom, reformation of the people was thought most conuenient, by bringing them to holy Baptisme, and procuring by all carefull meanes, that Religion might endure no danger throughout the country: this councill was first created, and called, The sacred Council of Inquisition. Whereof there is a President, and hee is alwayes an Ecclesiasticall person, as the Arch-Bishop of Tolledo, or the Arch-Bishop of Siull. He is assisted by twelue others councillors, who doe altogether deale in matters appertaining to religion. They giue chastisement to heretiques; haue care of catholique affaires; and peruse all Bookes before they be imprinted, to auoyd them of offence or corruptions. Other like busineses are referred to their charge, for the better preseruatiō of holy faith.

The Council of the Orders.

In Spaine there are three feuerall degrees of Knights, all honourable gentlemen, containing euery one by themselves, one proper & peculiar Order of knighthood, introduced in former times by diuers Kings of the Land. The first and principall among all the other, is that of the knights of S. James: the second, the Knights of Calatrana: and the third, the Knights of Alcantara. These three Orders haue (each one to it selfe) many Citties and Castles vnder their government, gotten and obtained in diuers times: and because their managing is great, and as if it were a kingdome within it selfe, therefore this Council of these Orders was ordained. Whereof there is a President, with foure Counsellors, and these meeting all together, do provide Magistrates of the Orders, of Lawes, and of all other things that appertaine to the foresaid Orders. The King is the great Master of these Orders, & when any expedition is to be performed by the Order of S. James, the King in his Letter, next vnto the ordinary stile or title that is vsually giuen him, writeth; And perpetual Administrator of S. James, &c. Next vnto the King, followeth the great Commendator of Leon, as being Commendator of the Order of S. James; and after him, the Commendator of Castile. These altogether with the King, do dispense the commendums of spiritual liuings: but for that, looke in our Booke of the originall of Knights.

The Council of the Indies.

When it pleased God, by the means of Don Christophero Colombo, to open (in our time) that part of the world, which formerly was shut vp from all of vs now here dwelling, and whereof the kings of Spaine haue (in part) bin Patrones: for government of that part (as necessity required) a Council of the Indies was created, consisting of twelue Councillers, with one President. These then do attend vpon all such matters, as appertaine to the gouerning of India. And therefore they haue their full power, sending thether Governours, Officers, and all kinde of proouision, as is fit for those kingdomes, which are vnder the Crowne of Castile.

The Council of Warre.

When it so fallth out, that any matter of action is to be vnderaken, eyther for defence of themselves, or any new acquisition, the Council of Warre do meete together: among whom are the Lords of the Council Royall, the great Commendator of Leon, the Commendator of Castile, with other cheefe

Rulers.

The secret Councill.

All of all is the Councill for matters of secrecy, wherein the King is present, the great Chancellor, the great Commendator of Leon, and the third part of the Council Royall, with the President. Being set together, they giue dispatch to matters of greatest secrecy, and which do most import the King, as appertaining properly to the State.

Three Judges, and the Restor.

For causes incident to ciuill and criminall iudgement, three Iudges are ordained in criminall occasions, who, as being Tribunes of the common people, do dispatch all criminall occurrences. And when the ordinary Pouletta, or cheefe Officers are there present; the they attend on ciuill affaires: but if it fall out, that hee cannot be there in person, the three Iudges doe then take order in ciuill matters. These are alwayes in those Citties, where the appointed Courts are kept.

The three Chanceries.

Over and beside the fore-named Councils and Offices, the King hath three Courts of audience, called three Chanceries, placed in three kingdomes, diuided the one from the other. One is in Valadolid, consisting of twelue Councillers, and with one President. These do sit euery morning separately in foure Halles, three in each Hall. The second is in Granada, the principall city of the kingdome of Granada, as being the first and cheefe. The third and last is in Galizia, being neyther more or lesse in power, then the two former. To this Court of audience go all the causes of Spaine, and they may each of them (by themselves) expedite their causes, without any intervention one of another. The appeales and chalenges of the Restor of Granada, doe passe to the audience of Granada; and those of Castile, to Valadolid, and so from hand to hand. But in regard that they haue superiours, and for better satisfaction of the people, such as finde themselves grieved in the fore-named Audiences or Chanceries, may appeale from them to the Council Royall. Moreover, each of these fore-named Chanceries haue Restors or Commend-

Because Spaine (as formerly hath bene said) is diuided into diuers kingdomes, the cheefe or principall whereof is Aragon: the King hath and doth vsually send into those kingdomes, Deputies, or Vice-Royes, to gouern there in his name. They are elected and made choise of by him, being first affirmed by the council Royall, to be Princes of the country, men of vertue and valor, and deserving aduancement to so high degree. Valencia hath her Vice-Roy, who gouerneth the kingdome of Valencia, by the same authority as was received from the former Kings of Aragon, and by the ancient lawes and orders of the kingdome. In Barcellona likewise, the principall city of Catalogna, ruleth another Vice-Roy, making vse of the lawes, customes, and ordinances of the kingdome of Barcellona. In Aragon also is another Vice-Roy, who maketh his residence in Sarragossa. This Vice-Roy gouerneth by the ancient lawes of Aragon (as other Vice-Royes do by the Castilian lawes) because it is the head of the other kingdomes. The kingdome of Nassarre hath also her Vice-Roy, abiding in Pampalona, who ruleth this kingdome according to the lawes thereof, and those of the crowne of Castile, because it was last of all conquered by Don Ferdinando, the catholike King. All the fore-named Vice-Royes, doe acknowledge the King of Spaine, and his council Royall, in all their causes.

The Treasurer of Castile.

All of all, there liueth in Court the Treasurer, a most honourable degree, and of great importance, who receiue the monies of all the kingdomes reuenues. Hee hath foure Contadores or Auditors vnder his command, who doe gather and collect the monies from the people, and bringing them vnto the Treasurer, payments are continually made forth, as command is giuen by the King to the Treasurer.

CHAP. II.

Of the Kingdome of Portugall; the beginning, continuance, and present estate thereof, with the Customes, Lawes, and administration of Iustice therein obserued.

HE kingdome of Portugall began in the ycare of Christ, one thousand, five hundred and ten, and after this manner. Henry Earle of Lorraine coming thither, performed many valiant deeds against the Sarrazins, and his high defersings moued Alphonso the sixt king of Castile, to giue him a Bastard daughter of his in marriage, named Tiresta. And in way of dowry, he assigned also vnto him that part of Galicia, which was then contained in Lusitania.

Of this marriage was Alphonso borne, who was the first that ever stiled himselfe king of Portugall: and hee was the first also, that tooke the city of Lisbone from the Sarrazins. For he hauing conquered five of their Kings in seuerall battailes; caused his Armes to bee adorned with five seuerall Crownes & Coat-Armors, which euer after continued the Ensigne of the kings of Portugall, in perpetual memory of his valour. But he quickly stayned this faire fame, with cruelty vsed by him to his owne Mother. For after her second marriage, he caused her to be imprisoned, and albeit the Pope labored the matter greatly, by the meanes of his Legate; yet could he neuer compass his grace and fauour for her deliuerance. Which sinne was seuerely punished on him afterward by his enemies, who tooke him in battaile. And then his Sonne Santo succeeded him, and after Santo, diuers other, to John, who was the tenth king in direct and naturall line.

This John was (at the first) expelled from his kingdome, and made a Knight of S. John of Ierusalem: but at length hee was recalled to his kingdome, where hee made very honourable proofe of his valour, and (among diuers famous deeds) he tooke from the Sarrazins the city of Septia. Hee had seuen Sonnes, among which, Ferdinand (for integrity of life)

Henry another of his sonnes, was the first that found Nova Insula, in the Atlanticke Sea. Hee being very skilfull in the Mathematickes, lived continually with-out a wife, and made his dayly abiding in a Promontorie, which was called the Cape of Saint Vincent, and there he died, in the yeare, 1460. But Edward, who was the eldest Brother, was made King; and he added to the kingdome of Portugall, by meanes of his warres, Zelia, Tegaz, and Alcazar in Africa. Hee had two daughters, or sisters (as some say) named Joane and Leonora; the first was married to the King of Castile, and the other vnto Frederick the third, Emperor, of whome was borne Maximilian the first, who was afterward Emperor, and Grandfather to Charles the first. He had also a son, named Alphonfus, who succeeded him in the kingdome, and begate Iohn and Emanuel, that was the fourteenth King of Portugall. Emanuel had Iohn, who tooke to wife the sister of the fore-named Charles the fifth, Emperour, called Katherine, and begate Lodowicke, that dyed an infant, and Isabell who was wife to the said Charles, and had another daughter also, which was married to Charles Duke of Sauoy. After these succeeded Sebastian, who (in our time) fighting against the Moores, was slain, & the King of Morocco with him, besides diuers other great Lords of the Moores.

Henrie, Vncle to the deceased King, followed him in succession, he being then a Cardinall, and very aged, holding the kingdome some few months. But he dying, Phillip King of Spaine, entred on the kingdome; withstanding the claime and title of Don Antonio, beeing a Brothers sonne to the dead King Henrie, & so outwearing him with troubles, that he could neuer attaine thereto in full possession, and so it remaineth still in the Spaniards power.

Concerning the gouernement of this kingdome, it hath the very same forme & obseruation as all the rest of Spaine hath, as being a part of that Prouince. For, there is a high Constable, and a Lorde Great Steward, with all other dignities else where related. By the Title and name of great Lords, there is the Duke of Braccanza, the Duke of Colimbria, the Duke of Visco, the Duke of Trascoffa, the Duke of Barcella and the Duke of Anuria. There is also the Marquesse of Villa Reale, the Marquesse of Torra Nuova, the Marques of Monte Maggiore, and the Marquesse of Ferrira, with an infinite number of Earles. There is likewise the Order of Knight-hood, called the Knights of Christ, honoured and esteemed much aboue all other, and whereof the King is the Great Maister.

Among these honourable persons in this Order, as an approued man of valour, most signale for many vertues, liberal minde and courtesie, beside speediest intelligence in matters of Military discipline; is the Lorde Flaminio Zambecoro, Lord of Castella in Campagna, who liueth at this day in Florence, and highly affected of the Duke.

CHAP. III.

Of the Antiquity, Originall Customs, Lawes and administration of Iustice, obserued in the kingdome of Naples.

THE Citie of Naples, beeing most ancient and Noble in all respects, giueth the Title of kingdome vnto all the Prouinces which it holdeth and possesseth, even by his owne proper name. Therefore wee may thence frame our argument, what the greatnesse of that Citie hath formerly beene, in regard that all the parts by it possessed, deriued from thence the Title of a Kingdome; which I do not holde to be of any great antiquitie, because the Normanes tooke it from the Grecians, who possessed the Prouince in diuers partes thereof, and then it was termed the County or Earldome of Puglia, or Apulia, as some do yet call it.

Robert Guiscard, a verie valiant and worthy man, hauing expelled (in a manner) all the Grecians thence, & taken Sicily also from the Sarrazins; would needs style himselfe Duke of Apulia and of Calabria, and Earle of Sicily. In no long time after this, his Nephew Ruggero or Roger, hauing conquered the Citie of Naples, which till that time had beene in the Grecians gouernment) obtayned the title of King of both the Sicillies, by Anacletus the Anti-Pope, in the yeare 1130. which afterward was confirmed to him in good and lawfull manner. And from that time, it was called the kingdome of Sicily, on this side Pharos; vntill the reigne of Charles the first, when it became diuided from Sicily, by occasion of that famous accident, called Vespro Siciliano, the Sicilian Euening, wherein so manie of the French were slaine. I finde moreover in many good Historians, that this kingdome hath had 3. seuerall Names, to wit; the kingdome of Naples, the Kingdome of Apulia, and the kingdome of Sicily, on this side Pharos, the bounds or circumference whereof, at this day is thus described.

First of all, by Land-way, measure of the Line, and the Confines of the whole Kingdome, with the Sea-shores & stronds; as also Campagna di Roma, sometimes called Latium, which (at this day) terminateth the river of Ofento, on this side Terracina, and from the mouth of the sayde Riuer, where it entereth into the Terrene Sea, proceeding on still towards the Apennines, with Latium, and part of Sabina: then passing the Apennines, with part of Vmbria and of Picenum, now called Marche d'Ancona, vnto the Confines thereof, is the Riuer Truentus or Tronto, where it entereth into the bosom of the Adriaticke maine. Which Scale or Line, because it doth not directly extend it selfe forth, but passeth on by turnings and windings, euermore from one of the forenamed Riuers to another, by the terminations of those Regions, it containeth about an hundred and fifty miles in length. Passing on thence from Terracina, by the confines of the kingdome, to Ponte Corneo, and Ceperano, and by the confines of Acti, thorow the country of Taylacozzo, to Interdoco, and Ciuita Reale, then to Maritima, and thence (by the river) to Ascoli, till we come to the mouth of Tronto, the Line heere being directly extended, will containe about an hundred thirty miles in length, or little lesse. By the sea-coasts along the banke and shore, the whole kingdome windeth about, like vnto an Island almost round engirt with water, as towards the middest of the Terrene Sea, and so on to the Sicilian sea. On the East side, from the Adriaticke sea, and so vnto the North, part of the Ionian sea, so farre as Monte Gargano, or Santo Angelo, and part of the Adriaticke bosome, from Gargano to Tronto, the Kingdome extendeth it selfe, and imparteth her boundes with the said sea: all which circumference, from Ofento to Tronto, and in length by the sea-shores, containeth in all 1418. miles, in this manner.

From Terracina to Naples, are eighty two miles. From Naples, to the head of the gulf of Policastro, an hundred fortie seven miles. From the head of Policastro to Rhegium in Calabria, an hundred eighty three miles. From Rhegium to the head of Spartimento, so to Capo delle Colonne, now called Lacinium, an hundred and ninety miles. From Capo delle Colonne, to Taranto, two hundred miles. From Taranto, to Capo di Leuca, now called Silento, thirtie miles. From Capo di Leuca, to Capo d'Otranto, fixe and twenty miles. From Capo d'Otranto, to Capo S. Angelo, now called Gargano, two hundred two and twentie miles. From Capo S. Angelo, to the vttermost confines, which is the river of Tronto, two hundred miles. All which sums in this roundure (by the sea boundes) do make one thousand, foure hundred, and eightene miles. Whereunto adioyning the foresaid hundred & fiftie miles, which is the space of the Land by measured line, wherewith if wee ioyne to the other part of Italy, from Ofento to Tronto, it summeth vp, one thousand fixe hundred sixty eight miles. And this is now (at this day) the dimension or measure of the kingdomes circuit.

These following Regions and Prouinces, are contained and embraced within the whole bodie. Latium Nuouo, that is one part, so much as is from the Riuer of Terracina, reaching to Garigliano. For, one part of the true Latium, which anciently extended it selfe so farre as the Riuer Liris, that now adays is called Garigliano, beginneth from Ofento vpon the Terrene sea. And although in these times, there are three partitions made of all the Regions which lye betwene Tenere, Sabina, the Apennines, and Terracina, and termed by three seuerall names, to wit: Latium, Campagna di Roma, and Maremma; yet notwithstanding, in elder dayes (so farre

Olde Campania, which stretcheth from Garigliano, so farre as the river Sarnus: therein is Naples and Capua, a most noble City, as well in auncient as moderne times.

Picenum, or where the Picentines inhabit, holdeth on from Sarnus, to the River Silarus, and the most famous Cities therein, are Sorrento, Nocera de Pagani, & Salernum.

Lucania, called sometimes Sao, contains it self between the river Silarus, and that called Sappio. And therein the Cities of most note are Pontecastro & Salerno elder times also there were Pesum and Buxentum, and among the mountaines are many Castles.

Where the Bruttii do live, it confineth with Lucania, and runneth along the river Sappio vpon the Terrhene sea, so farre as the Promontory of Lencopetra, at this day called Capo dell'arme in the Sicilian Sea, where the Apennine Mountaines do end, which beginning at the Alpes, run all along through the midst of Italy, and the verie toppe over the saide Cape, is now adayes called by Mariners, Punta di Tarlo, the point of Tarlo. In this part, the most principall places are Cosenza, and Rhegium on the Sea, otherwise tearmed Iunio, as a difference and distinction from that Rhegium which is in Lombardy, so named by Lepidus.

Magna Grecia, or Great Grecia, runneth along from Capo dell'arme, turning Northerly towards the Promontorie of Capo di Spartimento, now called Herculanum, by the Seacoast so farre as Taranto, where it entrench into the Adriaticke sea. In it, are Squillace, Taranto, and Cotrone.

The countrey of the Salentines, is on the breast of Taranto, so farre as Capo di Leuca, now called the Salentine Promontorie. In it are situated Callipolis and Argento.

Calabria it selfe, which hath so continued, turneth vnto Capo di Leuca Northward, so farre as Brundisium in the Ionian sea. The famous Cities therein, are Lecce, Brundisium, or Brundisium, and Hydruntum, now called Otranto. These two Regions (I meane Salentium & Calabria, which is that part of Land which extendeth towards the East between the Gulfe of Taranto and the Ionian seas) being ioyned together with one name, now adayes termed Terra d'Otranto, was called by our forefathers Lupigia and Mesopopea. And it is an Island round engirt with waters; for from Taranto to Brundisium, which are vpon the two seas, there is not in firme land above 35 miles.

Apulia, Pucetia, betweene Brundisium & Ostia, vpon the Ionian Gulfe, is now adayes (along the sea-coast) called Terra di Bari, and Louenza, & lyeth betweene the sandy countreies.

Capitanato, of plain Apulia, with his extendure betweene Ostia and the River called Fortore, passeth on, on the Ionian Gulfe, so far as Capo S. Angelo, & thence vpon the Adriaticke bosome to Fortore. The places of most note, are Salapis, Siponto, and Manfredonia, a new city builde by King Masfred. It is also between Terra Luceria, or Nocera de Saracini, and Canoja.

Freuntani are a people living from Fortore to the River Sagrus, or Sagra, now called the bloody river, on the Adriaticke Gulfe. Chiefe cities therein, are Elipsoni, sometime cald Istionum, Larino, & Lacinio.

The Peligni dwell betweene the River Sagra, and that called Pescara, sometime Aternus. The fairest city, betweene Terra Sulmona, and Pentina on the seacoast, is Ortano.

The Marucini do inhabit from the river of Pescara, so farre as Tronto, the verie most ending of the kingdom, along the sea-shore on the Adriaticke gulfe. There is a Sea-Cittie, which is called Francavilla, or Freuntani, and a Land-city called Chieti.

About the Marucini, between the land of the Apennines, and where they do take best rooting, beginning at the confines of the Peligni, so now called, and turning towards Marca d'Ancona, are three other people in order, to witte, the Pesimi, whose City was named Penna, and now called the city of Penna; the Antimerni and Furran, of whose ruines the citie of Aquila was builde, some final distance off.

The Marfi dwell more inward to the Mountaines, whose most famous place is Celano, with her Lake Lucina, now tearmed of the Marfi and Albi. These fixe forenamed people, are all called by one name, Abruzzesi; but oftentimes by writers they are vnderstood vnder the nomination of the Samnites.

Samnio, from the point of Land, and almost to the middest of the Kingdom, hath Latium and Campania in length, both on this side, and beyond the Apennines. At this day it is called Valle Beneuentana, the valley of Beneuentum, which extendeth it selfe in length, so farre as the River Silarus, eighty miles. Places of greatest name heretofore, were Esernia, Sepino, Tellese, Beneuentum and Boniano.

The Hirpini, otherwise called Samnites, do confine with the Picentines, Lucanes and Apulians, partaking at this day with Principato and Basilicata. The most noted Cities, are now Avellino and Agnone.

I finde that all these Regions haue (by our Moderne writers) bene diuided into foue severall principall partes or Provinces, if we may so tearme them, to wit, Terra di Lavoro, Principato, Basilicata, Calabria, Terra d'Otranto, Apulia & Abruzzo. Which Prouinces haue (since then) according to order of later diuision, bene parted into twelue Regions, as I finde them in the Registers of Naples, in this manner.

Terra di Lavoro, which hath in Land, Cities, and Castles, to the number of 198.

Contado di Montifio, hath 108.
Abruzzo the neereft, hath 155.
Abruzzo the furthest, hath 288.
Capitanata, hath 96.
Terra di Bari, hath 50.
Basilicata, hath 103.
Terra d'Otranto, hath 172.
Principato the neereft, hath 129.
Principato the furthest, hath 164.
Calabria the neereft, hath 162.
Calabria the furthest, hath 147.

All which beeing fully summed together, in Cities, Lands, and Castles, as hath formerly bene layde, and all inhabited with plenty of people, and furnished with all things commodious for the life of man, do amount to one thousand seven hundred, seventy foure.

There are certaine Islands also in the bodie of this kingdom, which circle, neighbour, or are opposite: as on the Terrhene sea, directly facing Terracina & Gacta, are the Illes of Ponza, and of Palmara. And ouer-against Nola, is the Ile of Desente. At the encountering of Pozzuolo, is that of Istria; neere to which is Procida, or Prochita, made famous by those young Gallants that deuided & performed the Sicilian Euening beside Nisari and Caprea, so highly beloued of the Emperor Tiberius, opposite to Capo della Minerva.

The three Sirenni do front Pastinaca; one of them being called Gile, another Monti, and the third S. Pietro. There is likewise the Ile of Lipara, which circeth about ten miles, wherein are some Cities. On the Adriaticke maine, right against Varano, are those of Kasuta & Caraganos; and the foure other called Diomedea, now adayes called Tremeto, but they are very litle; and the two greater thereof are called, the one S. Maria, the other S. Doimo, and the two lesser are, the one Galizzo, and the other Caprara. These are Islands of some note and name, omitting other places, which bee comprehended wth in the confines of the kingdom of Naples.

With these might bee ranked that of Sicily, an Italian Island, great & wealthy; but that it is an Ile of it selfe, & at this day deuided from the kingdom. Notwithstanding, it did sometime partake in name with the kingdom of Naples. For some Kings, as Fredericke the eleventh, Alfonso his sonne, Charles the first of Anion, and Alphonso the first of Arragon, possessing both the one and other, wrote their titles both on this side, and beyond Pharos. Whereupon, when we find it written simply the kingdom of Sicily: it is meant of this Ile, & not of Sicily on this side Pharos in Italy.

In this Kingdom are twenty Arch-bishoppricks, to wit, of Naples: which hath fve Bishopps vnder it: Of Capua, which hath ten, Of Salernum, which hath ten.

The Emperour Charles the 5

There are also an hundred twenty four Byshops, which are vnder the aboue named Archbithoppricks; only the byshop of Byzignano excepted, who is not subiect to any one.

It is also to bee noted, that the Title of Pri ce is greater in this kingdome, then that of Duke. And the Principallities there are ten in number, to wit, of Acoli, of Erignano, of Fuoli, of Melfi, of Molfetta, of Moncherole, of Squillati, of Stigliano, of Sulmona, and of Venosa.

There are likewise three and twentie Dukedomes. As of Antri, of Amalfi, of Ariano, of Asu, of Aviano, of Castellum, of Noceri, of Popola, of Rocca di Mondragone, of S. Pietro in Galatina, of Seminara, of Sessa, of Somma, of Sora, of Tagliacozzo, of Ternoli, of Terra noua, and of Traieto, together with those of Granma di Martina, of Montalto, of Montelione, and of Nardo.

The Marquesates are 29. of Anna, of Arienza, of Bedate, of Buccinico, of Campagna, of Capo Triso, of Castel Vetere, of Chierchiano, of Civita S. Angelo, of Corigliano, of Lauri, of Lauro, of Sicito, of Milurica, of Orta, of Oriolo, of Padula, of Beneuentum, of Pulignano, of Quarata, of Santo Lucito, of Terza, of Torre di Frankelise, of Torre Maggiore, of Trivico, of Turfo, of Valle Sicilliana, of Vasto, and of Vico.

There are in like manner, 54 Earles of State, 15 Lords, and 443, entituled Barons. And it is verily supposed, that in any kingdome of the world, there are not so many great Princes and Lordes, as in this, because they are (by nature) of high and lofty courage. And nowe I call to minde, in this matter, that I haue read in some Registers, bearing date of the yeare 1521. that the Emperour Charles the fift, fold many Titles and Lordships in the kingdome, & that many Gentlemen sold their goodes at ten in the hundred, and bought these Lordships at three in the hundred.

This kingdome so highly ennobled, full of worthy Princes, most rich and fertile, as more cannot bee wished; was for long time governed by diuers kings. For beside the Normans, who helde it manie yeares, and (as hath bene sayde) wonne it the title of a Realme; it fell at length to Fredericke the second, Emperour, who had it of Henry the sixt his Father: after whom succeeded Corrado Emperour, son to Fredericke; and after him it came (by reason) to Corradino, Nephew to Corrado. But Manfredo the bastard son to Fredericke, feigning that Corradino was dead vntured the State, and made himself king. But Pope Vrbane the fourth (beeing enemy to Manfredo) excommunicated him, and deprived him of the kingdome: inuelling therein in Anno 1266. Charles the 1. of Anjou, Brother to Lewes the eight, K. of France, who (first of all) slewe Manfredo, and afterwarde causing Corradino to be beheaded, tooke it in full possession.

Charles the second, Sonne to Charles Prince of Salerno had it next; and then succeeded him, Robert the excellent Philosopher; who was a very louing friend to Peirach. After him, the succession fel to Ioane, the Neece of Robert by Charles, and next succeeded Charles the third, K. of Durazzo.

After his death there happened contention for the kingdome, betwene Ladislaus sonne to Charles the third, and Lewes of Anjou: but Ladislaus remaining full Patron, held it till the yeare one thousand foure hundred and fouretee: and then succeeded Ioane the second, his sister; in whose place (making himselfe King by force of armes) rose Alphonso of Arragon the sonne to Ferdinando, who left it vnto Ferdinando his bastard son. Next to him succeeded Alphonso the second, who trobled himselfe not long in the Kingdome, by the coming of Charles the eight, K. of France into Italy, for recouerie of the kingdome, and then renounced it to Ferdinando the second, his son; from whom it came to Frederigo, Vnckle to the sayde Ferdinando.

Afterward it fell to Charles the fift, Em-

Emperor, who had the inuestiture from Pope Leo the tenth. For there was such a constitution betwene the Popes, Emperors, and Kings of Naples, that whofoeuer was Emperor, he could not bee King of Naples: and therefore he gaue it ouer to Philip the first, King of Spain, whose sonne Philip the second, now holdeth it, keeping there a Vice-roy, with most ample authority, and representeth there the Kings owne person. Whereby he is very much honoured and reuerenced of all his subordinate Gouernors, according as he causeth himselfe to be esteemed, both by his valour and authority.

The High Constable.

The Officers or Magistrates of the Kingdome, are seauen in theyr feuerall degrees; but he whom they terme Sindico, that representeth the whole City, and speaketh for all as chiefe Aduocate, is the Constable, or rather high Marshall. He is the first man of the kingdome, and Captain generall for all ordinances of warre. He (as Lieutenant to the king) ordaineth and provideth all such things, as appertaine to the preparation for warre: hauing charge of the Sentinelles, encamping men, providing tents and lodgings, appointing the Ensignes Royall, and (in breefe) hee hath the care for all matters that concerne Armes. In which place, he hath authority to chastise, and to put to death such persons as commit Theft, Rapine, Homicides, and other misdemeanors in the Campe. And this Office continueth so long as warres lasteth. When the King createth him in this dignity, deliuering a Truncheon to him, he sayeth these words: Take this holy Weapon, wherewith thou shalt expell the aduersaries of my people.

The Great Iusticer.

The second Office, is that of Great Iusticer, or Lord chiefe Iustice, who hath iurisdiction as well in ciuil causes, as those that be criminal; and vnder his authority are all the Princes, Dukes, Marqueses, Lords, and Barons of the Kingdome; for to him belongeth care of offences against the Maiesty Royall. His Vicar or Lieutenant, is called Regent of the Vicaria: who hath his Iudges both ciuill and cri-

minall, and his Tribunalis in the Court of the Vicaria, hauing allowed him for his yearely prouision, fixe hundred Ducates.

The High Admirall.

The thirde Office, is that of Great or High Admirall, who hath the charge of Sea causes, and such things as appertaine to Nauall Art and profession. Hee looketh to the making, repairing, building, and appointing of all Shippes for Royall seruice, and keeping of all such vessels as come into the kingdome, from what parts soeuer. VVhen occasion so requieth, and that it is imposed on him by the King, he setteth forth the Nauall Army in order. He appointeth both reall & corporeall punishments for delinquents, and hath ciuill and criminall iurisdiction ouer the Officers and others, that attend on Sea affayres.

The Great Chamberlaine.

The fourth Office, is, that of Great Chamberlaine, or the Chamberlaine of State, choofe yee whether: whose Deputie or Lieutenant hath his iudgement Seate, in the Chamber called sommara. His charge is to haue care of the Kinges person, to prepare and adorne his bedde; as also his Garments, and to take order for all his vnder Chamberlaines, Guardians, and Treasurers. Hee keepeth all the customes of the kingdome, and taketh cognition of the matters belonging vnto the Royall Exchequer, the tenths, tolles, fines, reuenewes, and other things appertaining to the Kings person.

The Protonotary.

The fift Office is the Lieutenant, or rather Protonotarie. Hee standeth obliged to reade before the King, and to conferre the writings and registers. He hath authority to create Notaries, Iudges, and to Legitimate Bastards. But the Catholike King hath (since then) transferred the Office of writings, and of the Registers, to the Kings Chancery.

The Great Steward.

The sixte Office, is that of Great Senef-

This man hath the government of the household Royal, and to provide all things necessary for life, as also garments for the Servants in the Kings Court; hauing likewise absolute power, to correct & punish all the familiars of the Kings house.

Lord Chief Chancellor, the last Office, & his charge.

The seventh and last Office (of most importance in the kingdom) is that of Great Chancellor; who writeth the kings Letters of secrecy, and sealeth all the privileges (granted by the King) to any person. He hath also command over the walkers of Stations, the Beadles, the Studies, and such like things. It is also to be remembered, that the high Constable, the Admiral, and the Protonotary, do sit on the Kings right hand. And the Lord chief Justice, the Great Chamberlain, and the Great Chancellor, on the left hand. But the Great Steward, he sitteth on a stooke at the Kings feet.

CHAP. III.

Of a Law obserued amongst the Rhodians, which enioyned and commanded Fathers (setting aside all other businesse and affayres) to marry their daughters with all possible speed.

Greece the Mother of ancient Lawes.

Here are very fewe people, (in mine opinion) that are ignorant of the Romaine Lawes, which came first forth of Greece, and are continued to this day; surpassing all other nations whatsoever, in the actions of Iustice and Policy, and among them haue many Common-weales flourished, not onely in Military and warlike affaires, but also in good manners and policies. Among the rest, that of the Rhodians is to be esteemed; which not onely established great store of Lawes, to render euery man what belonged to him, & preserve the weaker sort from oppression; but also concerning the marriage of their daughters, because no inconuenience should ensue to them, as to too many elsewhere happened. The Law then made for marriage of their daughters, was briefly fet downe in these words.

We command, that a Father doe not torment himselfe one onely day, for the marriage of ten sonnes, if he should haue so many: but rather to labour and trauaile tenne yeares, for the marriage of one onely daughter, being vertuous. That hee stand in water up to the mouth; That he sweat great drops of blood, and labor in the ground, drawing like a Horse; That he do rather disherit all his Male-children, leaue all his wealth and riches to utter abandoning, yea, and his owne proper life; onely to provide safetye for his daughters chastity.

This Law had bene worthy of obseruation in the countries heereabout, where if it had liued in the like force and vertue; so many famous Families had neuer been dishonoured, by the shamelesse immodesties of ouer-many maidens, as haue remained to very wofull example. For, it hath bin noted, that Fathers (oftentimes thorow greedy couetousnesse) would not allow Dowries to their daughters, answerable to their meanes and qualitie: in regard whereof, they haue caused them to be forsaken, and not sought vnto by any person. Sometimes also they haue giuen them greater estates then either was conuenient, or stood with their owne power, to the ruine and ouerthrow both of the one and other. Wee haue obserued likewise, some ill aduised fathers, who haue neglected their daughters marriages, being ouer-swayed with affection to their sonnes, and bearing no respect at all to their daughters; eyther suffering them to enter too farre into yeares, or else to be shut vp in Religious houses (by not affording them money meete for Marriage) where all their time they haue liued miserably, and (many times) as vnchastly, and with much lesse honour then they could haue done, if they had remained at liberty.

The common Proverb is, that there are three things, which if men do them not, they will be done of themselves: And the third of these is, that if men do not marry their daughters, then they will marry themselves, and oftentimes, to such as are of bad life, or poore, or not agreeing with their owne quality, to the great dishonor of themselves and their parents. When this doth happen in any Commonwealt, alliances loose themselves, and there is nothing but reproch on the one side and other; whereby (too often) great quarrels do arise, suites in law, and other desperate inconueniences.

To auoyd all which dangers, Fathers ought to be aduertised, that it is not good to keep their daughters too long vnmarried; For as one saith very well; It is a merchant life, which being kept, there is nothing gotten by it. Prouision therefore (in this case) should be made, when their daughters begin to enter into their puberty, which is, at 13. yeares of age, or (at the vttermost) at 16. or 18. and to make no longer delaying, if possibly it may be done: for then they are ripe, and ready to yeeld fruit. If they be kept any longer time, for the most part they lose their beautes, and fairest graces. They afford (according to common naturall instinct, as well in beaues, as in men, throwing all reason and respect behinde them) their affection to some such, whom their Parents doe not thinke meete and conuenient, and (in the end) worke some taint or blemish vnto their owne modesty. Or if they doe not; by reason of their frequent familiaritie with men, they shall be sure talked of verie strangely, which now adies is grown so common and reproachfull, that euen the verie chastest that liue, haue worke enough to doe, to exempt and cleare themselves, from badde fame and ill reports.

Moreouer we daily behold, that when Parents doe provide for their daughters, such as are somewhat entred into yeares, they will refuse the men that are thought meete for them, and made offer of to them in good discretion. Alledging that they haue already giuen their liking vnto another, and (as many times it comes to passe) to such a one as is vtter enemy to their house; compelling their parents either to forsake them, without any choise at all, or else (with much sorrow) to consent thereto, onely to auoide the worst, whereby both Fathers and mothers remaine discontented so long as they liue. These warnings do speake themselves, as well vnto great persons, such as are not onely Emperours, Kings, Princes, and other illustrious bloodes, but also to Plebeians, and men of vntuall rank, who do stand no more exempt from ill husbanding their children, then the other do, but are euen as ready to faile therein, yea, and many times sooner. Which I will approue by some Histories, deriued from Bandiello the Italian, and the Annales of France.

Adelasia, daughter to one of the greatest and most vertuous Emperours, named Otho, third of that name, that reigned after Charlemaigne, vntill his time, hauing listened vnto many Kings and Princes, who sought his Daughter Adelasia in Marriage, as well for her extraordinarie beautes, as her other excellent Graces, and Royall extraction: yet here alipsing (as it should seeme) at some greater and more nobler match, or a party of more worth (in his opinion) for his daughter, by means of these delays, brought incomparable misfortune to his Imperial house, which else had flourished in no meane happinesse. Adelasia grew enamored of a young youth, a Sonne to the house of Saxony, and both of them being secretly married, furnished with some small store of money, beside a few Jewels and precious stones; betooke themselves to trauaile, attired and disguised like Pilgrims, Adelasia in the habite of a youth, with full deliberation, to make their abiding in some strange countrey, far enough from Allemagne.

This wandering as fugitiues, to satisfie their owne voluptuous desires: at the length, they were robbed on the Highway, and so by that meanes, were constrained (after long and importunate begging, trauesing manie Countreys) to retire into a great Forrest, situated betwene Att and Sauona, in Italy; where (through great necessity) they began to exercise the labour of Colliers, enduring many stormes and hard afflictions, for the space of eighteen yeares together. In the end, it pleased God to be satisfied with their humility & repentance, and to make them better knowne, by the meanes of one of their sons, named William, who following the nature of his extraction, betooke himselfe to make one in the Imperiall Armies in Italy, & greatly resembling in fauour the Emperour Otho, whereby he was imagined to be issued of Adelasia; which being found to fall done by her to her seruants, desiring (very heartily) pardon both of God and the. So, feigning as if she intended to goe to bed with her young infant, which was about six weekes old; shee went and hanged her selfe that night, on a beame end of a poore Cottage, which they had taken vpon hire, of which mishap, the people of the Towne soon aduertised her parents. For mine owne part, in the same manner as I haue set it downe, it was reported to me by the forenamed Monsieur Megrelin, who made no small account of my friendship, and dyed with verie great griefe, often saying vnto many, that this misfortune thus fell vnto him, by refusing his daughters marriage with a yong Advocate, one of sufficient wealth, and that had requested her many times to bee his wife, which still hee denied, intending to bestow her on a Gentleman.

In the City of Rome, no long while since, there was a young maiden (named Lucretia, daughter to a rich Marchant) secretly espoused to a yong man, called Paulo, sonne also to another Merchant, the two fathers being vowed enemies, and both alike enuious of each others Fortune. The father of Paulo perceiving how fast aged yeares came stealing on him, determined a marriage for his son, acquainting him therewith, that he hadde made choise of one meete for him, commanding him also to fashion himself to good liking thereof, because hee would haue it accomplished within very few dayes. The sonne deferred it off so long as well hee could; yet to declare some obedience to his father, hee craued respite to consider thereof; but in the mean while, it was generally noised thorow the City of Rome, that Paulo must be married vnto another. These newes comming vnto the eares of Lucretia, shee dissembled her inward conceyued displeasure, verily imagining the matter to bee already done. Paulo comming, as oftentimes hee did when fit time fauoured him, to visit his Lucretia in the night time, so iocund and merry as at no time more; after accustomed kindnesse passed betweene them, Paulo fell into a very sound sleep. Lucretia beholding him in that fearlesse estate, with a great Knife she gaue him so many stabbes and deepe wounds, both in the brest and belly, that he fell downe stark dead, and afterward committed the like violence on her selfe. This act, so full of sorrow and sadde mischance, came to the eare of Pope Paulus the fourth, who would not allow them to haue Christian burial. But a learned diuine, a Jacobine by Religion, made so excellent an Oration to the Pope, agaynst the vnkinde parents of the deceased Louers; that Obsequies were granted, & buriall giuen them. And an aged woman, a seruant to Lucretia, who had bene the meane of their priuate marriage, was (by authority of Iustice) burned alieue, because she had not aduertised the parents thereof.

If these Emperors, Kings, Gentlemen and those of meane condition, haue obserued the Law of the Rhodians, which I haue alledged in the beginning of this chapter; they neuer had falne into those dreadfull mischances, which theye owne wilfull folly brought vpon them. They may also serue as a good warning to Fathers at this instant, and such as shall bee hereafter, how to auoyde so enorme an error. I will giue aduice likewise to such Maidens, as hauing past the age of five and twenty yeares, if either auarice, or any other bad humor in their parents doe make them negligent of their marriages, when men of meet match and quality are offered to them, to be bold of their owne liking and choise in marriage; provided, that they first make it knowne vnto their parents. And then if they will not yeeld consent, they may proceed on further: alwayes provided, that they are equall in quality, and no way infamous. And least their Fathers should disinherit them, the Emperor ordained thus in the authentical rule; Sed si post .C. de inofficio testu.

The like ordinance is to be found in the French Code, in the chapter of claudefine Marriages, made by king Henry the second. And there may bee noted another inconuenience, which vnadvised fathers do incurte themselves, that in due time, and vpon iust reason, will not yeelde to theyr daughters marriages.

CHAP.V.

That Tyrants doe liue continually in feares:
and that their ends are most miserable.

HE life of a Tyrant is full of hatred; every man detesteth him; all are offended at him, and he is subiect to infinite perils. What was the life of Aristippus, to whom the wales were dreafull? VVhat that of Alexander Phareus, who liued in an hourly suspicion of his owne wife? What that of Dyonisius the Syracusane, who neuer durst trust his Barber, for feare least in trimming his beard, hee should cutte his throat. Hee had the carnall knowledge but of two women onely, Aristomada and Dorida, and yet he would neuer let them come neere him, vntill they had put off all their garments. The Chamber where in hee liued to sleepe, was round engirt with a wide deepe ditch, and there was no entrance to it, but onely by a draw-bridge.

All things whatsoever, are continually suspected so much by Tyrants, that it was not spoken without good aduice; That Tyranny is the Nurffe of feare. For it commonly cometh so to passe, that such as liue till men feare them, doe also feare them by whom they are feared. This kinde of life, so full of care and dread, Dyonisius the Tyrant discovered to his Orator Damocles, of whom the History followeth in this manner.

Damocles defending in an Oration, which hee deliuered in the presence of king Dyonisius; that neuer was any man more happy then he, for his innumerable wealth & treasures, beside the abundance of all things in his kingdome. O Damocles (instantly said the Tyrant) seeing my life is so well liked by thee, I desire that thou wouldest presently but taste and experiment my fortune. VVhereto Damocles consenting, the Syracusane king caused him to sitte vpon a stately & sumptuous bed, richly embroydered with gold: and before him good Tables and Stooles in magnificent manner, all couered with vessels of Gold and Siluer. He was serued by many young children, endued with singular beauty, &

the seruice was extraordinarily magnificent, with all kindes of delicious and exquisite viands. The golden Hall, which quistred round about him, was perfumed with vnguent of excellent odors, beside Flowers, Chapelets, and curious Noisegayes. To be short, in this so triumphant and royall furnishment, Damocles helde such a proud, enflated, and swolne vp countenance, euen as if in Maiesty Royall: King Dyonisius called to him, and bad him lift vp his head, to behold what was instantly ouer it. There he shewed him a fayre bright Sword, which hee had caused to be fastened to the plancher, directly ouer the head of Damocles. Hee seeing the naked Sword, which hung but by one haire of a horses mane, ready to fall on the least occasion; considering thereon with deliberation, and perceiving that death was his present companion; he began to dispraise the royalty and riches of the King, desiring to bee deliuered from that kinde of felicity.

Hee teupon Dyonisius said vnto him, Doeft thou not see, O Damocles, how greatly thou art deceiued in thine owne opinion? Such is our life, which (not long since) thou heldest to be so happy: but now thou plainly perceiuest, that eminent death is alwayes attending. By which example we may easily iudge, that he can neuer be happy, that is daily afflicted with feare. To this purpose Horace writt these verses.

Not the fine fare of Sicily,
Will saunour sweet and daintily,
Nor the rare sound of the Lyre,
Nor the sweet Birdes in their quire:
All these affoord no pleasure can,
To that wofull wretched man,
That beholds aboue his head,
A naked Sword to strike him dead.

And as Iob saith, The sound of feare and dreadful affrights is alwaies in his eares: and although peace be certaine, yet is hee daily doubtfull of close ambushes. Tyrants loue not any body, and therefore (vpon iust occasion) leamed men rearmed them to be cruell beasts, and plagues to mankind. In the human figure of who is so much sauage cruelty, that Salomon saide directly; A wicked Prince is a roaring Lyon, and an hunger-starued Beare ouer poure people.

And yet God hath and sometimes doth permit, that Tyrants shall reigne, for the chastisement of wicked men, saying; I will take vengeance on mine enemies by mine enemies. God (saith Job) maketh the hypocritical man to reigne in regard of the peoples finnes. And in Hofes God speaketh thus; I will give thee a king in my fury. And in Esay; Assur is the rod and staffe of my fury, I will send thee to a deceitfull people. Neuertheless, they are not acceptable to God, who throws them at length into the fire, as a father doth the rod, when he hath therewith beaten his childe. And it hath alwaies so fallne out, that all these Tyrants, or the most part of the, haue ended their liues miserably, & oftentimes by violent death, caused by their owne friends; and approued by consent of all the people. But because the examples of tragically endes in such Tyrants, are handled in a number of other Treatises, & experience hath made it daily manifest vnto vs; I may the sooner conclude this Chapter.

CHAP. VI.

A most horrible cruelty vsed by the Numantines against the Romanes; and in the end vpon themselves.

Scipio having continued sidge before the City of Numantia in Spaine, the space of a yeare and seuen Moneths, and neuer ceasing: munition and victuals began to fayle among the besiedged, so that very many died with famine. Whereupon they made a vow to the Gods, that the first morfell they would eate every day, should be the flesh of some Roman: and that they would drinke neyther wine nor water, till they had swallowed the blood of such as they slew.

Extremities
are the occasion of desperate
vowes &
promises.

Extremity
still watch
vpon extremity, and be-getteth daily
worse and worse courses.

The Numantines hauing all sworne to this vow, they issued forth of the City, and like men, more then desperate, chased the Romanes, even as if they had bene brute beasts: and such as they slew or surprized, immediately they killed and broyled inhumanely, or being sliced in peeces, they fold the by weight in the Shambles or Butchery. So that a Roman taken by them, or slaine, was of farre greater price and estimation, then to liue and pay his ranfome. Finally, the Numantines perceiving, that they had no more meanes of suppartation, being opprested with famine, and enclosed on euery side: they consulted among themselves, to kill all their aged people; yea, all the women & children in the City; which (without any feare or respect at all) they put in execution.

When they had done thus, all the wealth and moouables of the City, the Jewels & Treasures of the Temples, were brought together in spacious places, & there consumed with fire, yea, and all parts & quarters of the City, without leaving a house standing, suffered the very same consummation; and euery man tooke a sudden & speedy dispatching poyson, whereby they might the soonest dye. Thus the Temples, houses, goods, and persons of the Numantines, which had continued in prosperity foure hundred, sixty & fixe yeares, had finally conclusion all in one day. A sight most horrible it was to behold, that the Numantines did those things liuing, so full of gastly terror, and not be remooued from them at their hour of death. For they left not to Scipio, any goods as booty or pillage, nor so much as a man liuing, for a Trophee or Triumph.

The propriety of 466
yeares continued all in one day.

Scipio seeing Numantia flaming, and afterward, entering thereinto, beheld all the buildings demolished, and turned one vpon another, all the Inhabitants burned; he grieued very greatly, and being vnable to containe himselfe from teares, cryed out thus: O most happy Numantia, to whom the Gods appointed, that thou shouldst rather remaine destroyed, then conquered! Numa Pompilius king of the Romanes, caused this City of Numantia to be builded, & Scipio the Roman, being aged then but two and twenty yeares, saw the ruine of it.

CHAP. VII.

That a valiant Generall or Captaine, ought first to embrace wisdom & providence, before he do make experiment of his fortune: and also that after victory he should be milde and pittifull.

by many dangers. For notwithstanding he shall performe but what hee may and ought, yet if misfortune be present in giuing the battaile, and returne him off with out victory; hee shall neuer satisfie the vulgar, but the people will hold him in bad reputation, although it value his life in the aduenture. Let euery man bee of what quality and wisedome hee may, or would wish to be, & vse the best carriage he can possibly deuise; yet we shall neuer heare a conquered Captaine called wise, or him temerarious, that gets the victory. It is a good thing that Captaines should be wise, but yet much better to be fortunate.

The saying of Scipio Affri-
canus.

Cicero Attic.

A great difference in me-
nures.

Scipio Affricanus vsed to say; That all things ought to bee essayed in warre, before they lay any hand to weapons. And (in truth) he saide well, because there is no greater victory in the world, then that which is wonne without effusion of blood. Cicero writing to Attica, saith; That the Captaine which conquers his enemies by counsell, ought to be no lesse esteemed, then hee that did it by the sword. Silla, Tiberius, Caligula, and Nero, they neuer knew any other course, but to command, and kill: whereas contrariwise, Augustus, Titus, and Traiane knew no better way, then to entreate fairly and pardon, so that by pardoning, they conquered more, then the other could do by bloody fighting. If Captaines would but consider these things, perhaps they would not be so ready in opposing their Armies to such multiplicity of dangers: whence oftentimes ensueth, that in thinking to be reuenged on their enemies, they (in the end) become vanquished themselves.

A noble mind
in the Emperour Theodosius.

Theodosius the Emperour, when hee besiedged any City, he would not suffer his Souldiers to erect any scaling Engines, or make any battery, yntill ten daies were fully past: during which time, hee offered no offence to the Cittizens, but daily admonished them, saying, I grant ye the tearme of ten daies, wherein yee may preuaile with mee by fauour and mildnesse, rather then hazard the trial of my power. When great Alexander saw the dead body of Darius: Iulius Cesar the head of Pompey; when Marcellus burned Siracusas, and Scipio beheld Numantia flaming; and in our later times, when that heroycall Emmanuell Philibert, Duke of Sauoye, & Prince of Piedmont, beheld the illustrious & magnanimous Prince Frances of Bourbon, Duke of Anguien, lying dead vpon the ground at the taking of S. Quintin: All these great persons could not refrain from teares, although the other were their deadly enemies. For albeit their generous soules were well satisfied with obtaining victory, yet notwithstanding, such great and weighty losses did much discontent them, considering their causes might haue bene the like.

Pitty and clemency neuer lost the victory in warre; but on the contrary, the Captaine bloodily minded, cruell, and reuendgefull, hath eyther bene slaine by the enemy, or betrayed by his owne followers. Therefore it was not without great reason, that Iulius Cesar carried immortal renoune among all Princes and Captaines of the world, not for being more faire, more strong, more courageous, and fortunate; but onely because far greater was the number of enemies, to whom he frankly afforded pardon, then those that hee had vanquished and slew with the sword. The famous Captaine Narses, who subdued the Gothes, vanquished the Balthians, and domineered ouer the Allemagnes, neuer vnderooke a daies fight against an enemy, but the night before, hee kneeled and wept to himselfe in the Temple. Trogus Pompeius recordeth, that the most signale victories of the Romanes, were not wonne in regard that their Armies were mighty and strong; but because their Captaines were dexteros, active, and gallant, in all seruices they vnderooke.

It is expedient also, that the Generall or Captaine (about all other things) should be vigilant, & procure, that among the Captaines of his Army, affaires (concerning warre) should be kept secret: because the highest enterprizes neuer can haue good successe, when they are discovered before they can be effected. Suetonius declareth, that it was neuer heard said to Iulius Cesar; Must wee do this to day, or shall we do that to morrow? Only he would answer; Doe this instantly, & to morrow wee shall see what is then to be done. Plutarch writeth in his Moralles, that Lucius Metellus being requested by one of his Captaines, to know on what day he would giue the battaile; made him this this answer. If I wist that my shirt knew the least thought of the things my hart intendeth, I would immediately burne it. It is well done to consult on matters of war with many: but the resolution of them is not, neither ought to bee imparted but to very few; otherwise, they may bee published before they are fully concluded. And especially care is to be taken, that no consultation be had with such men, as are eyther obstinate in their counsels, or rash and headstrong in their actions: for in cases which happen sometime in war, it is lesse harme to retire, then run wilfully on losse.

Alcibiades, a valiant Capitaine among the Grecians, yeld to say: Men of magnanimity and courage, should sometimes rather flye than tarry; because honour commands attendance, and wisdom wils flight. For in great perils, it is better that men should submit themselves to reason; then that they should be commanded by fortune. A Capitaine ought to be counselled in all things, except when he meetes with a danger not foreseene. For many Capitaines at diuers times in warre, haue lost themselves by no other occasion: but because at such time as they should haue brought to effect some notable deed, which admitted not the least minutes trifling; they stood then musing, & idly called a counsell to no purpose. It is necessary also, that a wife Capitaine, after he hath obtained a victory, should vnderstand how to vse and enjoy it. For if Hanniball, on the day at Cannas, could haue told how to haue vsed his fortune, Scipio the Affricane had neuer conquered him.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the Salique Law the originall thereof, and who were the first Authors and Inuentors of it.

See a Treat
written by John Perard,
and I.C. ther-
on.

IN the time of Pope Boniface, the first of that name, and of the Emperor Honorius, in An. 420. the Franconians hauing forsaken their Country, came to inhabit along the River of Rheine, which hauing passed, they remained for some time at Treues. Now as these people were of barbarous manners, liuing vnciuilly & without law; Pharamond their first king, Sent vnto their Duke Marcomir, chofe foure cheefe and principal men of the Saxons, who by their counsel and determination, might giue a law to the people. The names of those foure men, were Frucaist, Lozocast, Salgaist, and Visogast, who by authority of the king and people, set downe a Law in writing, which Pharamond approoued and published, causing it to bee called Salique; eyther by the name of the place Saliehani, wher it was made, as some say, or else by the name of the said Salgaist, who was Chancellor to Pharamond, and cheefe of the foure.

This Law contained the forme of succeeding in the kingdome of France, & the manner of reigning; and it hath euer since bin obserued by the kings of France, and their people vntill this present. Among other articles therein contained, women are declared vnable to rule the kingdome, and deprived of succession to the crowne, although they are the sole & only daughters to the King: nor can they haue any portion of inheritance in the Gallician Lands, but onely vse and profite by the owners consent, implying necessarily, that after their deaths, those allowances returne to the Crowne againe. And this Law is conformable to the Roman Law, called Voconia, which was made at the time betweene the second & last war of the Romans with the Carthaginians, and which was pronounced by Voconius, Tribune of the people. And Aulus Gellius saith, that there is nothing more profitable to the common-wealth, then the said law, which deboueth women from successions; which Tit. Luuius saith, Marcus Cato (a graue man) perfwaded in an Oration made by him.

And although it may be said concerning this Law, that it containeth no equity, because it toucheth the succession of priuate persons: yet on the behalfe of the kingdome, for which it was ordayned, it is iust and reasonable, and by disposition of womens right, they ought not there to succeed in the kingdome, nor rights of the crowne, except there be some priuledge or custome to the contrary. So noeth John de Imola, on the Chapter Granda, tit. de simpliciter neglegen. prela. so the fixt. And for this was made the tenth chapter, Qui feoda poss. ff. hoc autem. C. dilecti, de arb.

de Sena.

The succession in the Crown of France, after
the death of Lewes Hutin,
in a continued descent.

Baldus is of the same opinion, speaking expressly concerning the kingdome of France, and saying, that the king of England, Sonne to one of the daughters of France, in regard of this law, might not pretend any right to the Crowne, and saith, it is cleare and certaine, as hee quoteth on the first law ff. de Sena. And as I haue formerly saide, it hath euermore bin so obserued and held in France.

For example, when Lewes Hutin deceased, he left one daughter, wife to the Count d'Eureux: Philip le long, his Brother, succeeded him, (neuertheless) as well in the Crowne, as in all the Landes thereto belonging. And after the death of Philip le long, although hee left foure daughters; yet Charles le Bel (his brother) succeeded him, as well in the Crowne, as other inheritances. And after the decease of Charles le Bel, notwithstanding hee left one daughter, named Blanche, wife to Philip, Duke of Orleanse, his cousin: yet Philip de Valois succeeded him. In like manner, after the death of king Charles the eight, Lewes Duke of Orleanse, his cousin succeeded him, before Madame Anne of France, his Sister, wife vnto the Duke of Bourbon, and this was king Lewes the 12. who although (by his decease) he left two daughters, Claude and Rece: yet neuertheless, Frances Duke of Valois and of Angoulême, the very neereft in the line collateral and masculine, succeeded him as well in the Crowne, as also in the Duke-dome of Orleanse, albeit the saide Lewes the twelfth, Charles his Father, and Lewes Duke of Orleanse his Grandfather, had held the Dukedome of Orleanse, by the gift and inheritance which Charles the 5. had made to the said Lewes, Duke of Orleanse his Sonne.

For right and iustice requireth, that all Lands which are once vnted and incorporated to the Crowne of France, shall be of the proper nature, quality and condition as the same Crowne is; as well in regard of successions and acquisitions, as other causes. For at all times, and as often as a Land is vnted to the Crowne, it taketh the nature of the kingdome, and must be governed in all things, according to the conditions thereof. For the kingdome is an vniuersall thing, which comprehendeth many other in particular: as it is said in the Law Peculium ff. de Leg. ij.

And not onely the Salique Law is kept in France, but also it is found in many statutes in Italy, and elsewhere, prohibiting women to succeed, which is done, saith the Text of the Law, Facile agnitionis conseruanda, ut dignitas familiarum salua sit. And Baldus saith, that a woman is not the head or Prince of the Family, but the ende thereof.

Soror appellata est quod quasi soror nam nascitur separaturque ab ea domo in qua nata est, & in aliam familiam transgreditur.* That is to say, A sister is so called, as shee that is borne almost apart by herselfe, and is separated from the house wherein shee was borne, and changing the place, goeth to dwell in another family.

Hyfityas, desirous to write to Aristagoras, did shau the head of one that was his trustiest seruant, and wrote vpon the skull-skinne which hee would, containing three or foure Characters, and afterward kept him in his house, vntill the haire was growne ouer as thicke as before, and then he sent him to Aristagoras, willing that he should cause him to be shauen againe, so soone as he was come vnto him, and so he vnderstood the others minde.

How Julius

Cæsar sometimes sent him Missives, when he had any vrgent occasion, and to some peculiar places: and in them were letters formed onely, without any sillables annexed to them. So that when they were lookt on and questioned, no word could be collected to any purpose, but by himselfe, and him to whom they were intended, being a mute and secret inuention, yet familiar to such as vnderstood them.

Many (saith Frontinus) being desirous in actions of warre, to send their letters mis- siue secretly to haue their inuentions known, and yet to auoid all meanes of discovery, haue written within the Scabbards of their Swords, and sent them as acceptable presents whereby they haue cleaſely eſcaped.

Demetrius desiring to make knowne to the Lacedemonians, how king Xerxes was armed and prepared for his Iourney againſt Greece; did write the counsell of the king in small Tablets of wood, which he couered ouer with waxe, and in that manner sent them to the Lacedemonians, who taking off the waxe, read all the contents there written.

The cunning of Hirtius in concealing
his Letters.

Hirtius the Consul sent letters written vpon Lead (but not knowne how to be read, being intercepted) to Marke Anthony, besieged at Modena; they were carried by an honest Soldiour, who wore them as bracelets about his wrists, & with them swom ouer the Riuer Scutena. The same Hirtius likewise tyed letters about the necks of certaine Doves, which hee kept close lockt vp in a conuenient place, where no light was to bee seene, neyther did he giue them any food; that when he should let them loose neere to the walles of the City (as easily he could doe) they being greedy of light and food, might mount aloft vpon the houses, where beeing taken by Brutus, and by the meanes of food, purposely appointed therefor the, he vnderstood what he desired.

Paradise, in his history of our times, writeth, that when as Rhodes was besieged by the Turke, a traytour named Friar Andrew de Merail, a knight of Portugal, making a shew of carefull looking to the Watch; shot a letter (bound about an Arrow) into the enemies Campe, whereby he gaue them aduertisement, in what estate the City stood.

Frontinus
likewiſe.

Frontinus hath many other examples of secret Letters, in matters of loue, of which I will relate two onely, remembered by Aeneas Sylvius Piccolini Pope Pius the second. Pachorus a young man (saith he) sent a loue-letter in a Nolegay of Violets to Lucretia, whom hee dearly affected. And finding no successe, wrapt another in a peller of waxe, which he couered as a snow-ball, and so threw it in at his Mistresses Window.

CHAP. X.

A Discourse concerning the originall of the Normanes, what valiant aſtes haue bin performed by them: and of Robert Guiscard.

THE Normanes are anciently descended of the Gothes, and vnrped that great half-Iland, sometimes called Dacia, and since Dacia: where by the kings of that Province, were named kings of the Danes, and of the Gothes. They had a custome, that the kingdome came to the eldest Sonne, and therefore sent the other Sonnes to seeke their fortune. It came so to passe, that Lutrecus their king (who was not a Christian) hauing two Sonnes, according to the precedent custome, sent the youngest named Biernghus, out of the kingdome, albeir he loued him very dearly, and therefore committed the care of him to a Gentleman of his Court, named Allengus, to whom he gaue in charge, that he should furnish him with a troope of valiant men.

An indifferent Army beeing giuen him, they came vpon the confines of France, and entring Picardy, possessed themselves of most of the Townes and Bourroughs, burnt Saint Quintins and Noyon, and for the space of forty yeares, did infinite harmes to the Realme of France. For after that Biernghus was dead, they elected (as their cheefe Commander & Capitaine) a very valiant and gallant Knight, called Rollo, who made three Campes, which entered France on three severall sides: the one mounted vp the Riuer of Seyne; the other along the Riuer of Loyre; and the third by the Riuer of Gironde, sometime called Garona at Bourdeaux, and so scattered themselves throughout France, raaging and burning wherefoeuer they came. Which being perceived by Charles the third of that name, and called the simple king of France, and knowing also, that he had no meanes to resist them; he treated a peace betweene Rollo and him; by the Arch-Bishop of Roane, named Franquum, which was concluded neere to the Riuer of Epta, the King being on the one side of the Riuer, and Rollo on the other. Therein was an appointment made, that Charles should giue his Daughter, named Giletta, in marriage to Rollo, to whom he assigned as her Dowry, and an inheritance for the children borne in this marriage, and not otherwise, the Province of Neustria, which Rollo caused afterward to be called Nortemanie, which signifieth a Northern people. For Nort (in the Dacian tongue) is as much to say as North, and man implieth Homo, so interpreted of it selfe, from whence, by a corrupt kinde of speech afterward, it was called Nortmandie.

* That which is now called Nortmandie.

The king created that Country to be a Dukedome, and gaue his Daughter in marriage to the said Rollo, as formerly it was concluded, yet with this condition, that Rollo should become a Christian: whereto hee condescending, he was baptized in the yeare 900 and 12. & by Franquum, Arch-Bishop of Roane, beeing then named Robert, by Robert, Count of Poitiers, who was Godfather to him at the Font. And by the example of Rollo, all the Normans that were Pagans, caused themselves to be baptized; which caused Duke Robert to do homage to king Charles, for the Country of Neustria, then conuerted to be Normandy.

Rollo is baptized and named Robert;

Duke Robert
performed
his homage in homely manner.

Historians doe report a pleasant and ridiculous acte, which Rollo did on the day when hee came to performe his homage to the king, for some aduised him to kisse the feete of his Maiesty, according to a custome in that case obserued. But hee disdayning to fall on his knees, tooke the kings foot, lifting it vp to reach his mouth, and so ouer-high, that the king fell backward from off his seate. VVherat the Normanes fell into a great laughter; but the French were offended and vexed, taking this behauiour in very ill manner. Neuerthelesse, this deed was imputed to simplicitie, because Rollo, in making his excuse, auouched, that such kinde of kissing the foote, had beene an ancient custome in his Country. About a yeare after, Rollo seeing himselfe peaceably possessed of all Normandy, repudiated his wife Giletta, & put her to a pittifull kinde of death, not hauing any child by her in which respect as well by right of forfeiture, as by other conditions contracted in the marriage, without all question, the Country and Dukedome should haue returned to the Crowne of France againe, as at the first.

The Duke
disuorced his Wife, and put her to death.

Long time before Rollo became a Christian, hee had carnall knowledge of the Daughter to Berengarius, Earle of Beuennais, the beeing named Pompetta, by whom he had a Sonne called William, that afterward was rearned Long-Sword. Hee being borne in vnlawfull and sinfull copulation, out of marriage, and the acte committed by a Christian with a Pagan, was consequently disabled from succeeding in the Dukedome. But howsoeuer it came to passe, the Normanes finding themselves so strong and dreadfull; possessed this William of the Dukedome; and the kings of France were enforced (by reason of hauing so slender meanes in those times) to endure and suffer all. So that the Successors of Rollo or Robert, enioyed still that Country, though by corruption of faith, and no true tytle thereunto.

William
Long-word
the battard
sonne to Rollo, became his successour
in his Duke-dome.

Of this William came Richard, surnamed Long-shankes; and of that Richard a second Richard; and of this second Richard a third Richard; who was Father to Robert, that was Father to William the Baltard, which conquered England. VV hereby it very plainly appeareth, that of the fore-named Rollo or Robert, the Dukes of Normandy, and three Kings of England received originall.

Now concerning Richard, the Sonne to William, Sonne to Rollo or Robert, hee had two Sonnes, the one named Robert, and the other Richard also, who beeing desirous of glory and fame, went into Sicily with great troopes of men, and there they made war successfully many yeares together. These two brethren beeing dead, the Normanes beeing then in pay to the Duke of Salerne; made choise of a new cheefe Commander or Capitaine named Tristram Castello, who hauing slaine a Serpent, and beeing inlected with her poyson, dyed thereof. After him succeeded Raymond, and some other (afterward) elected for their Capitaine, William Ferrabach, Sonne to Tancred, Come de haute ville, who had twelve Sonnes, to wit, Sarno, Gadfrey, Dregon, Tancred, William, called Ferrabach, that is to say, Armesstrong, Haufray, Robert, surnamed Guiscard, Roger, Pickard, Gadfrey the second, or younger, Fruemensino, and Muloger.

Tancred with his twelve Sonnes, continued among the Normanes in the exercise of Armes, and Michael Catalaicus, Emperour of Constantinople, held then by usurpation Ponilla and Calabria, vnder the government of Malocco, one of his Captaines, and Lieutenant for him in those Countries. Some other places also were invaded by the Sarrasins, who possessed Sicily, continually molesting the said kingdom. The valiant and generous William, being created Capitaine of the Normanes, made a league with the Princes of Capua and Salerne, and also with Malocco, Lieutenant to the Emperour. All these passed together (with their Armies) into Sicily against the Sarrasins, and having vanquished and expelled them thence, diuided the prize equally among them. But Malocco surrendered the lands of that Isle to those Governours which the Emperour had sent thither before the warre. Whereat William being offended, yet dissembling his anger and intentions, marched with his Army towards Ponilla, where hee possessed himselfe of many places, and entring Melphes, there strongly fortified himselfe.

Melphes farprized by William.

When Malocco heard these newes, he departed from Sicily, and suddenly went with his Army to Melphes; but William being come forth of the Towne, gaue such a valiant assault vpon Malocco, that killing the better part of his followers, & chasing him from the greatest iurisdiction of Ponilla; hee fully enjoyed it, and made himselfe Earle thereof. After the death of William, Dregon his Brother obtained the Seignury of Panilla, and being a man of great valiancy, as also very well experienced in Arms, fought three times in one day against the Grecians, and overcame them, encreasing his Countries daily more and more.

About seven years after, Dregon died, and Haufray or Huifroy his Brother succeeded; and after him, Gadfrey, who left Balegard his Sonne successor in the Earldome. But Robert being a most valiant young man, displeased that his Brother Gadfrey had not left the place to him after his death; expelled his Nephew by force of Armes, and so held the Counties of Panilla and Calabria; annexing also Troy thereto, which (till that time) had continued subiect to the Romanes. This is that Robert, who for his excellent spirit & witty providence, was surnamed Guiscard, which in the Norman Language, signifieth ingenious and cunning: although some others say, that such a surname signifieth errant and wandering, because the Normanes went wandering thorough many Countries. Afterward in the time of Pope Nicholas, second of that name, hee was created the first Duke of Calabria, & of Ponilla, in the yeare one thousand and sixty.

In the ende, Robert having by his prowess, and with his Brethrens helpe, wonne (in eightene years) the whole Isle of Sicily, and many other Regions in Italy; fought moreover to make himselfe Emperour of Constantinople, for which he leuied a mighty Army, and fought with the Venetian and Imperiall Armies twice, and vanquished them. But being retired to Cassipolis, a Promontory in the Isle of Corfu, and there surprized with a most violent Peauer, hee finished his dayes in that place, in the Moneth of Iuly, in the yeare one thousand, eighty two, having liued gloriously (and won many victories) for the space of threescore yeares.

This most noble Family of the Normane Guiscardes, had a lamentable ending, in the yeare one thousand, one hundred, ninety five, in William, whom the Emperour Henry the sixt caused to be guilded, to the ende hee should haue no ability of producing any more issue by him. And moreover, he made him to lose the sight of his eyes, by Basons extremely heated, which hee constrained him to looke vpon so long, untill the reuerberation of the heat, had vtterly deprived him of sight. This impiety, and more then barbarous cruelty, did the Emperour vnto him; because none of that race (afterward) should hinder his enjoying the kingdom of Sicily.

CHAP. XI.

Of two young Iouthes of Paris, that translated to the Indians, to cure themselves of the Neapolitane disease, or French Pox.

Nithony du Verdier, Lord of Vauprinaz, in his Booke of diuers Readings, hath well described the original of the Neapolitane disease, otherwise called the great pox, & how it was brought from the Countries of the new found world, discovered first by Columbus, in those Islands which the Indians call Haity, and Quisqueia. And as this disease is very familiar in those lands; so is the remedy thereof also found there, by the meanes of a wood, called Guyacum, whoso of there are diuers Forests, and by the vse thereof it is easily healed. Many people in these parts, who haue read the fore-named Chapter, haue highly contrariet it: especially such as haue had, and yet at this present, do finde no ease thereby, albeit they haue drunk euery morning and euening of that decoction, hauing afterward soundly sweated twice a yeare, in those two temperate seasons, the Spring time, and fall of the lease, nay moreover, haue drunke no other drinke (with their meate, and without) for a whole yeare together.

The authors illustration of Verdier.

For mine owne part, I dare maintaine, that the said Lord of Vauprinaz, hath said nothing but the truth, and if the greater part of sicke persons, infected with that disease, haue found no remedy by the woods; the fault is in such as sell it, & haue not well ordered it, nor hauing knowledge what kinde of Guyacum should be vsed, nor the place, nor the climate, nor by whom it is brought thence, being ignorantly perfwaded, that there is but one kinde thereof onely, against the opinion of some that will meddle with prescriptions, not hauing bin in the country where this wood naturally groweth. Wherefore I purpose to make good what I write, by a history of two Parisian youths, who were healed by the vse of Guyacum; not such as is brought hither to vs, and how it hapned, I will set downe the whole discourse.

I being at Paris in the yeare 1553. I had great familiarity with the two youths, being both borne in the City, of good and worthy houses; but I conceal their names, by reason of their infection with that venereal contagion, it being most commonly taken by disloneit dealing with leud women, and so by consequence, carrieth shame with it. This sickness they concealed so long as they could, but in the end, it made it selfe to be knowne, by losse of their haire, by red pulses appearing in the fore-head, by aches in the bones, both of their armes, legs, thighes, and shoulders, as also in the former part of their heads, from the beginning of night, till break of day the next morning, with other such like signes; as paine in the throat, being scarcely able to swallow any food. Now, albeit that all these euidentnes are not fene, in all such persons as are touched with that disease; yet it plainly appeared, that in both these young bodies, all the fore-named testimonies, and many more beside (which I let sleepe in silence) were apparently noted.

In regard of these rehearsed accidents, which were so manifest, the Parents to them both had intelligence, that they were touched with this disease; and yet for more certaine assurance therein, they caused them to bee visited by very skillfull Physicians and Chyrurgions, who performed all that which arte could permit, and yet they were not able, neither could they cure them. A second time, other Physicians were called to this businesse, who applied likewise the vttermost of their knowledge; but all in vaine, and the disease it selfe grew worse and worse, rising into knots and topies in the foremost part of the head, and in the bones of the armes, thighes, and legs, they procured insupportable nightly paines. For when night drew neere, and all the time while it continued, they cried and complained incessantly, so that the neighbors (on all sides) heard their pittifull lamentations, by meanes whereof, their bodies became wholly dried vp.

The Physicians alledged that there was some great extraordinary matter in the disease. For these two young men came nothing neere to one another in consanguinity, but were of diuers temperatures and complexions. For the one was delicate, soft, merry, whitish, and of tender disposition: but the other was of blackish color, strong, hardy, and many times addicted to penitence. Neuertheless, contrary to the common order of nature, and all the Apomes in the arte of Physicke; their diseases seemed conformable, which neuer hapneth to other persons, offended with the same contagion, because some haue accidents farre different and contrary to other. Hereupon the Physicians referred the cause of this disease (sympathizing so directly, yet in such different bodies) to the venom of some paillardizing women, that had infected them.

But to make short, after these youthes had endured much extremity of paines & anguish, as well by Physicians and Chirurgions, as Empericks that had charge of them: the harme had extended so farre in expences, and no meane heart-greuing of the Parents, al which notwithstanding, they were given ouer as incurable, & because there was no likely-hood of their healths recovery, they daily desired the seizure of death. Matters standing in this lamentable estate, God tooke compassion on them and their Parents, because they were deuout persons, & gaue almes very liberally to the poore daily, presenting them remedy in this manner. The Lord of Chantonay, a Gentleman of Burgundy, and of the Franche Comte, was sent (by the King of Spain) Ambassadour to Charles the ninth, King of France, who ordinarily made his residing at Paris. This Ambassadour was lodged directly ouer against the house, to one of the Fathers of the sicke young men, and both their chambers being outward on the streetes side; it caused the said Lord Ambassadour (who was none of the sleepest men) to heare the greuous moanings, which the poore sickly Neapolitan continually made, whereupon he entreated his Hoste to informe him, whence proceeded those wofull lamentations, thus nightly made by the sick young man. His Hoste hauing tolde him nothing but the truth, the Ambassadour wrought so by his Hoste, that he might come to see the sickly youth; which accordingly he did, in the company of his Mother.

cordingly he did, in the company of his Mother.

The Lord of Chantonay, well vnderstanding whence the disease proceeded, & those nocturnall heauy greouings, said, that he had seen many in diuers Provinces, as in Burgundy, Germany, Flanders, Italy, & Spain, afflicted with the selfsame sicknesse; and notwithstanding all curious and carefull attending, yet they could not any way be cured, but onely by going to the Indies. For instance hereof, he called for his Secretary, who presently came thither, and had (as well as his Lord) passed the voyage, therefore hee was the better able to confirme his speeches, and related at large, how euery thing happened.

The Mother to the sicke youth, after she had thanked the Lord Ambassadour for his aduice, withdrew herselfe, and acquainted her husband (who was Master of the Chamber of Accounts) with all that the Lord of Chantonay had said vnto her. He being a very learned and wise Gentleman, conferred further (concerning this matter) with the Secretary to the said Lord Ambassadour, whom hee found to be a man of good iudgement, & one that had past through the Pikes, as we vnto rearme it.

The Sonne to the Master of the Accounts, imparted this matter vnto his sickly Companion, who aduertised his Mother also thereof, and she her husband, who was a Merchant trading in silkes, and furnished the house of the Queene, Catherine de Medicis, then Regent in France, and hereupon both the Fathers conferred together. In breefe, they concluded to hazard their Sons in the performance of this voyage, perswading themselves, that seeing they reputed to bee incurable might fall out, that changing the ayre of the climate, and by their passage vnder the Equator, ynder which, such as sayle, doe oftentimes become sicke, and dye in the voyage, making the Sea their graue, as the most part doe, of them that aduenture to the Indies, to which fortune they freely committed their Sons. But if it came to passe, that they might there be cured, as diuers others formerly had bene; they stood bound in the greater thankfulness to God. For they being daily in their sight so diseased, to their no little discontentment and shame, beside the charges attending thereon; they could not determine on any estate for them, neyther make mention for their marriage, the reason of their sicknesse being so noyed quite through the City of Paris. Thus these two Fathers resolved to lend their Sonnes to the Indies, eyther for their viter losse, or healthfull recovery.

Now because it was not lawfull for any to passe thither, without permission from the King of Spain; Queene Mother, vnderstanding by her Metcer (Father to one of the sicke youthes) the purposed voyage of his Sonne; wrote vnto her Daughter, then Queene of Spain, for her assistance to the poore passengers, to fauour them with Passe-ports, and recommendations vnto the Kings Lieutenants in the Indian Countries, to such as were Captaines of the Seas, and other. Being assisted by two men, who had formerly voyaged both by Land and Sea, and peace being accorded with the Protestants and Catholiques, they trauielled to Spain, and there presented their Letters.

The Queene immediately solicited their licence and dispatch: but first they were visited, to know whether they were Spyes or no. For it was no long time before, that the Spaniards had slaine all the French, which were to be found in that part of Breffe, called by the Tononians, Nambouts, saying, that all the Indians appertained to them, by due right granted to them by the Pope. When they were found to bee diseased persons, they were discharged, and going on to the Port of Stidly, fortune was so fauourable to them, that there they found a Fleet of Shippes, ready charged with men of warre & Merchandizes, bound also for that part of the Indies, whereto these sicke men intended to go; which was the Islands of Haity and of Quiqueia, named by Columbus, Hippaniola, and afterward the Isle of Saint Dominico.

They went aboard a Merchants Ship, hauing agreed for threecore Ducates, both for their passage thither, and their returne backe againe. The voyage succeeded so well, that although it contained aboute eightene hundred leagues by land; yet within two Moneths, they arrived there, landing in the Isle of S. Dominico, where the Vice-Roy lay. To him they presented their Letters of fauour and recommendations, who gaue charge to a Gentleman of his Court, to see that the young men and their company should be kindly entreated, sending them vnto Physicians, that remained there in the Country at the Kings pay. But they thought it more convenient for them to passe thence to another Island, which was called Saint Iohn de Portorico; where the women there dwelling, were very skillfull in curing that malady, and when they were come thither, thus it succeeded to them.

First, the Governour of the Island; by commandement giued him from the Vice-Roy of the Indies, lodged the young men so well as hee could in that sauage Country: which was in a Lodging made with palisadoes, or wall of Pales, which being bute backe ioyned together, was filled vp with bundles of leaues.

The Roofe consisted of leaues of Trees, so were their Beds also, and in stead of Feathers, they were filled with Cotton: their Shertes being of plaine Fullian, and all their vtenisles of wood, or of earth.

Their ordinary feeding was on Cow-flesh somewhat tender, of great Serpents roasted, which serued highly to their healing, and also on strong Tortuises, as great as an indifferent Porker.

Their bread was Biscuit, and is much better in that Country, then elsewhere; for within the space of foure and twenty houres, it will grow mouldy, and if it be eaten hot, it is indigestible. But howsoeuer it were, the Spaniards gaue them courage, nor to greue themselves, and brought a Muslin vnto them to delight them, whose Instrument was made of the bone of a mans thigh. They likewise sent a woman to attend them, that made little or no account of them; but tolde them, so soone as they were cured, she did assure herselfe, that they would very well content her.

This Woman so affrighted our young Parisians, that they could very willingly there haue dyed, as neuer hoping of any helpe by her means. For she went stark naked, her skin being of an

Her head was shorne close before, but behinde, the hayre hanged so low as her heeles, all frised, and like to the tayle of some ill-fauoured Cow. The nayles of her fingers and feete, exceeded halfe a fingers length, and were bowing crooked. She had no haire where nature commonly affordeth, neyther in her arme-pits; and her teeth looked of a hew betweene red & yellow, long, cleare, and wide enough asunder. At each of her eares hung a Stone of violet color, the least of them weighing a-boue two ounces: her vpper lip was slit in the middle, in the top whereof stood another stone of grayish color, and thence passed her spittle continually. All the other parts of her body were round & fat, and in indifferent fashion, faire, & affable enough for a sauage creature.

This woman prepared a drinke, which she made of the little loppings of a yong Guyaicum tree, hauing first bruiued them betweene her goodly teeth, the afterward she boyled the in an earthen vessel, without any thing to couer it, and contrary to all courses obserued in our Countries. This drinke she caused them euery morning to take, each of them to the quantity of a Parisi Chopine, at two or three draughts. Then they must walke a while, exercise Fencing, or some other cheerefull stirring of their bodies; or else traueil to a Mine of gold, which was not far off fro the Village, so to weare out the space of two houres. Then returning backe againe to the house, all sweaty, they would change onely their shirts; and going to dinner, they must drinke of no other water, but of a much-troubled standing Poole, wherein was nothing but raine-water. The Spaniards would offer them Gallspands or Cocks of India, which they did eate foddren for the most part. But after they had bene vfed to it eight or ten dayes; they could eate Toads, Serpents, and Lizards euen as well as other, and found them very sauiory meate; beside diuers kindes of fruites, the like whereof hath neuer bene seene in these parts. About three houres in the euening, they must drinke as much of the Guyaicum, as they did in the morning, and vfe the same exercises. And without any other ceremony, remedy, or deuises vfed to them, they found themselves to bee thoroughly healed, iust within the space of six weeks: onely their gums excepted, which were become swolne and enflamed. But they were made sound, with a sharpe-pointed bone of a Fifth, by pricking and piercing them therewith in many places, and they thus healed, were perfectly recovered. The knots and bumps on their bones, vanished away, all their nightly afflictions ceased wholly within fiftene daies: appetite came afresh to them both, and their haire being lost, was restored againe in more firmer manner then before. And now there remained, not so much as the print of any push or blaine, cyther in their fore-heads, or on their breasts, likewise all vlcers which they had in their secret parts, dried vp and were gone.

They perceiuing themselves to be thoroughly cured, were willing to content the woman with golden coyne, as hoping they did well therein: and this they did, by the aduice of a cunning crafty Spaniard, relegated to that place, and to worke in the Mines. He very well knew, that the Indians, making no account of Gold or Monie; purposed to begge it of her, not doubting but easily the world giue it him. But it fell out farre otherwise, for these refused the Gold, and would by no means touch it, but ran into the house, and took a Bow and Arrows, intending to kill them, but that they fledde away from her. Perceiuing this, they called another Spaniard, who had alwayes made signes of amity towards them, and caused him to speake to the woman, because they vnderstood not her language. Conference by signes hauing past betweene them, the Spaniard learned of her, that shee would be payed in some small wares or trifes. They not knowing where they should fo provide themselves, the Spaniard tolde them, that there dwelt a man in the Village, who made profession of selling such things; and of him, for the value of two Ducates (which amount heere but to twenty Solz) they bought these following trinkets. Six very bigge Combes, six little knives, sold for a Sol a peece in Paris, with their sheathes, six small looking-glasse, a dozen of points, fixe needles, a glasse spoone, & a dozen of Ballads. CHAP. XII.

Why there is not found so much vertue in the Guyaicum that is brought hither, as in that whereof the Indians themselves do make use, against the Neapolitane disease, and the description thereof.

S God hath bene, is, and euer more declareth himselfe to bee good & mercifull, knowing the inhabitants of the whole Countrey of India fore-named, to be naturally subiect to this infection of the Pox; so hath he giuen them the Tree of Guyaicum, by the means whereof they can cure themselves, which they attained vnto, onely by experience; for they haue not anie knowledge of Letters. The Spaniards which had conquered those countreyes, hauing co-habited carnally with the naturall Women there abiding; receyued from them this disease. For at certaine seasons, this malady possesseth the Indians; as Fellons or VVhitlawes, and Feauers do seize on vs. And hauing perceyued that they recovered themselves by Guyaicum, our Merchants brought some of it hither; which in the beginning, rotted of it selfe, by reason they brought thence the very youngest: which to prevent, they brought then of the oldest that in regard of his soliditie could not rotte or perishe. And our Physitians (by their own report) appointed the receipt of that, to such as (in these parts) were so infected; but to little effect; for beside the breuage or drinke made thereof, they sayled in anointing (oftentimes) the diseased body, with hotte Oynments, compounded with Quick-silver, whereby some of good habitude, perceiued themselves to be cured, and others not.

Now, by that which I could gather, from the discourse of these two yong Parisiens, the olde Guyaicum, which is brought hither to vs, is of the grosse trunk and strong bodie of the Tree, that hath no vertue against the disease, neyther doe the Indians any way vfe it. And our de-ceiued Physitians, appoint the receipt of this

her selfe highly beholding to them. She presently sung a Song, after her countrey manner, made them a Feast, wherein were serued foure small Ginny hennes boyled, two Toads very fat, vnbowelled and roasted. They dranke a Beuerage, made of Turky wheate, passable enough. And afterward, she gaue them halfe a dozen of Bowes, and some store of Arrows, to beare away with them homeward; beside she gaue to each of them, siue Hand-kerchers of Cotton, properly made.

They returned thence to the Island of Saint Domingo, where they presented themselves vnto the Vice-roy, who was most ioyfull to see them recovered; and there they remained one moneth more, not feeling any sickness by the change of ayre, or of the climate, whereat each one greatly meruailed. In this time, the Merchants made them ready for their return, and some bands of soldiers, who went to refresh themselves in Spain. Being entred their ship, within two other months they arriued happily in the Port of Siwill. Thence they went to Madrielle, humble to thank the Queene, who gaue them Letters and Passe-portes, for their more secure arriuing in France. Being come to Paris, they were most louingly entertained by their parents and friends, who did conceale their voyage and sickness, so much as in them lay.

It was my hap to finde them there, and to me they reuealed the whol adventure, euen in such maner as I haue set it down; to the end, that such as fall into the like inconuenience, & being forsaken of Physitians heere, may trauaile for their recovery, as these two yong men did. this blacke Guyaicum, which is of thofe great trunks, and call it, the heart of Guyaicum. They alfo perfwade thefelues that there are two kinds of Guyaicum, to wit, one that is wholly blacke, and the other nothing blacke at all. Neuertheleffe, they are both of one tree, in fomuch as that which hath no blackeffe, is of the branches, and enmore the oldeft, albeit they take it for the yongeft. Thefe young Parisians, beeing of good and apprehen- fufpifits, did well perceyue, that that which men brought hither to vs, had ver- ry little power or efficacy: for they had made many diets, without receyuing the leaft eafe thereby.

But the other of India, which was yong, fomewhat tender, hauing hardly attained to two yeares growing, and no higher the the stature of a man, did heale very eafily. For in the making thereof, there would beefele and perceiued, a very delicate and Grape-like gumme, pleafing vnto the heart, which is not to bee found in that made heere among vs. And they conclu- ded, that the drineffe and coldneffe of the trunks of the trees, then which there is no other brought to vs, is the only caufe, why fuch an inkefome difeafe cannot bee cured.

Yet do I not inferre heereby, but that the aged Guyaicum brought hither to vs, hath fome power and vertue: as in prepa- ring the bodie (to receiue the vnguentis for the difeafe) that is of a cold or me- lancholly nature, and hauing made vfe thereof eight or ten dayes, then to take the Vnguentis. Or elfe, when one is fup- pofed to haue that fickneffe, and there re- maineth paines or aches in fome parts of the body, or fome Vicer is feared: fome haue beene obferued, that by the vfe of this old Guyaicum, within three weekes they haue appeared to be found. Some alfo haue beene fore afficted, yea, diuers times left in deploable condition; yet hauing made vfe hereof for a year or two, as in their ordinary drink, and their bread commixed with a decoction of Guyaicum, and their meate boyled in like manner, they haue bene cured, and (among other) an Atturney of the Parliament at Rome: but this is very rare and extremely pain- full.

The voyage to the Indies feemeth not fo dolorous, nor yet fo greatly chargeable: for thefe two young Parisians, of whom wee made mention in our prece- dent Chapter, it coft but three hundred Crownes betwene them, yet each had a man of honor with him, and a groomer or feruant to attend them both.

The decoction of the Guyaicum which is heere among vs, doth not ferue onely for the Pox, or thofe offended therewith, but likewile for all perfons ouer-abound- ing in moyfture, or that haue difeafes caufed by fome cold humors. Altho' fuch as haue opilations in the Luer, Spleene, and other of the bowels, caufing them to twate after the receite. Many haue found great comfort and eafe alfo thereby; as fome touched with palfies; others that haue had fwolne legs; others with vlcers fubieft to certaine times; and defluxions, deafnes, catarrhes, rheumes, and other imbecillities, they haue found themfelues thereby to be releafed. But people offended with heftique feauers, muft keepe themfelues from any way vi- fing it. I will now defcribe the forme of this Tree.

The Tree of Guyaicum is great and groffe, as are the Oakes in thefe our coun- tries, hauing the Bark or Rinde of black- ifh coullor, thicke, gummy, and fat. The wood thereof is much harder then Ibo- ny, and the rinde feperateh it felfe very eafily from the trunk, when it is dry. The Leaues doe appeare like thofe of Plan- taine, but they are much leffe, and more hard. It beareth a yellow flower, and the fruite is as big as a Nut, hauing with- in it ftones, like to thofe of a Medlar: no vfe hath beene made of the fruite, fo farre as I can learne, and yet there muft needs be fome vertue in them. Thus you per- ceiue what I know, and haue vnderftood, concerning the Wood called Guyaicum, in the vertue whereof, many heere among vs haue found themfelues to be cured; by thinking that it had the felfe-fame fa- culties, as that which is young and tender, and found in the Indies.

CHAP. XIII.

From whence it proceedeth, that Graine or Corne is not fo long time preferued in our Countries, as it hath bene, and still is, in Egypt. Also in what manner our Lands and Vines should be corrected and quali- fied, without dunging. With many reme- dies, for the preferuing of our Corne from corruption, and being eaten with diuers kinds of Vermines.

Some haue fupposed, that fuch feuerall kinds of corn as were kept for the space of fiftene daies, or there- about (safe and foundly) in the royall Granaries of Egypt, by the aduice of Ioseph, to provide agaynst the dearth of Graine, which should for feuen yeares after follow, according as he Pro- phetically foretold; came to paffe as by matter of miracle, and extraordinarily. I muft needs confeffe, that there was there both great abundance, and as great ster- ility of Corne, in the feuen consecutine yeares, and all thorow the extraordinary power of God. But for the conseruation of them, it is a matter ordinary to Egypt, that Corne should be kept there five and twenty yeares in pure goodnes, yea much longer time. Alwayes provided, that it bee not transported from place to place, and be not made fubieft to any heating: neither that it should bee eaten by anie Vermines, as many times our Corne is heere in our Countreyes, and the caufe thereof I will declare vnto ye.

The reason for it, is, that the Egyp- tians neuer vfed to fatten their groundes, but contented themfelues with fuch ma- nurance, as the foyle it felfe, and Nylus o- uerflowing them, onely affoorded: neuer vifing any dung, as heere we do, neyther Vines, Leyftals, and other excrements of beafts, which is the onely caufe, why our Graine cannot be preferued; but is fubieft to Wormes, VVecuelles, Mites, and other fmall creatures, that doe great harme thereto, whereby it yeeldeth no fauourie tafte, neither can bee kept in goodneffe for any long time. Hippocrates feemeth to be of the fame opinion; affir- ming; that fuch as vfe breade made of Corne, which any dunged ground hath yeilded, they cannot liue fo healthfully, neither fo long a time, as others, feeding on the contrary.

Some one may fay vnto me, the what shall we do in thefe countreyes, where if our fieldes be not manured and dunged, the Land will yeelde nothing, or (at the beft) very little? Is it not apparant euery where among vs? That there are verie good meanes whereby to franke and fat- ten ground, with other things then dung and filth, Hefiodus plainly enliructeth vs; for in his Booke of Husbandry, he fayth: There is nothing better, to cherifh & fatten a leane and meager Land, then the strong straw of * Lapines, the chaffe of Chiches, of Beanes, of Tares, Lentilles, and other fuch like, vnterly reiecting all vfe of dung, which many haue charged with blamefull imputa- tions.

Of this opinion alfo, Lieband appea- reth to bee, in his Booke called Majon Kuitique, or the Countrey Farne, where he fayth: Infed of dung, they may rife the straw of Lupines, backs or cut small: Or elfe to fowe the ground with Lupines, and other Pulfes, and afterward when they beginne to grow, to labour then the land ouer and ouer, and this will ferue for dung, much better then that of any beaft.

There is mention alfo made, of ano- ther kind of manuring the ground, which is not fo good as the precedent, alledged by Hefiodus; but approaching fomewhat neere it, as thus. To cut fome ftore of Heath, Broome, Briars, and Thorns, and all other kinds of shrubbes that haue bufhy ftalkes, or vnder-woods, and then to couer all thofe Lands therewith, which are intended to be fowen: there let thefe feuerall matters by drying about the fpace of ten or twelue dayes, or longer time if neede require it. Then in the night time, let them bee fet on fire, and fo carefully tended, that they may bee altogether re- duced into afhes, by kindling the fire ftill where it would not tafte. Afterward, let thofe groundes be Tilled after one manner onely, and then fowed and couered. This kinde of Husbandry wil caufe great quan- tity of Corne, which the poore make vfe of in many places, where they haue no concerning the long keeping of Corn

in Egypt.

The Grain or Corne of Egypt may bee

yeares and more.

The reason
why our Corne
cannot be pre-ferued for any long time.

Cattle: and it causeth the earth to yeeld a great moylt graine, which is not subiect to corruption.

Here it is to be remembered, that where I say in Egypt, the grounds are not manured: I meane none but those that lye along the current of Nylus, on eyther side three or foure Leagues in largenesse, or little lesse on either side. But in other parts, as in the mountaine countreyes, they manure their Lands, though they be greatly fruitfull: yet not with dung, but with straw of diuers Pulles, according as I haue formerly sayd. Howbeit they haue great Heards of Oxen, and Flockes of Sheepe, also their fields are almost couered with flights of Pigeons, which after their owne manner manure the grounds, and it is verie excellent good in that Nature.

As for the dungs heere in our Countreyes, they are very laborious to bee made: for some dung must lye rotting a whole yeare together, before it can bee well employed. And then it is (oftentimes) full of feedes of wilde or sauage Hearbes, which fall into the Hay, that beasts of labour eat, and so passe thorow in their excrements vndigested, or else are found among the strawe, whereof they make their litter. Whereby ensueth, that the earth (oftentimes) produceth more store of bad Hearbes and VVeeds, then of good Corne, because they take away his true vertue of nouriture, and do meere ly smother it.

Beside all these things fore-named, especiall care is to be hadde, in knowing what dungs are good or bad; and for certaine groundes, and for some peculiar feedes. For Horffle-dung will serue well in one place; that of Oxen and Kine in another; and likewise those of other Cattle, Sheepe, Goates, Swine, Pigeons, and others beside. It may not be forgotten also that some groundes are to bee fattened in certaine quarters of the Moone, and others in other seasons: which is not any way to be obserued, in those other kindes of manuring, whereof I haue formerly written.

Here I must not ouer-passe, to write somewhat concerning the husbanding of Vines, which some vse to dung, albeit to much lesse purpose, then grounds bearing Corne. As about Paris, in the lower Ly- moine; about Lymoges, and else-where. The doing heereof is a great deale lesse tollerable, because it is a matter very difficult, that a ground nourished and made fat with dung; should not still retaine in it, the fauour of the sayde Dung, and so (in the end) impart it to the wine. For, our people are verie ill aduised, to charge their Vines euery yeare: by reason it is the cause, that their wines (for the most part) haue an vnpleasing tast, and becoming fat and Oily, are easie to turne of themselves. Moreover, dung maketh our Vines to waxe aged immediately, and soone to grow barren; because they are too liberal of their goodnesse in the first yeares.

Seruius hath lesse written vnto vs, in those Commentaries which he made on the ninth Booke of the Ennetes, that the man was named Pitunius, who inuented this manner of manuring groundes by dung. And therefore he was called Sterquilinus, that is to say, a dung-hill carrier. It is to be presumed, that he was bred in the Latines countrey, in some place that was neuer fertile. These fewe notes I haue selected out of verie good Authors that did well vnderstand themselves in Husbandry, concerning the manuring of groundes & Vines, but they neuer approued the vse of dung.

Now, because I know verie well, that whatsoeuer Hesiodus, those other authors and my selfe also haue written, that our groundes and Vines should no longer bee manured in such stinking, foule, and grosse manner, but to follow those other instructions, most sweete and wholesome: in excuse of their neglecting so good aduice I will say with them, that that which hath taken roote for so many thousandes of yeares, can hardly be taken away vpon the sodaine.

Therefore, I will now set downe vnto you some certaine receipts and aduices, for the long conseruation of our Cornes safe and soundly, and that they may not bee any wayes bitten or eaten with Vermin, because it will bring exceeding great healthfulnesse vnto the people. For, without all doubt, when Corne and other nourishments of life haue any corruption whatsoeuer, they doe daily encrease and augment diseases amongst the people.

First

Of bringing Corne in sheaves into the Barne.

Of places where no Barne are vied.

What care is to be vied for providing a good Garne, or Corne-loft.

For the roote.

For the floor and walles.

Corne-heapes.

Scituation of the Garne.

How to auoyd vermine that do great harm to Corne.

First of all then, men ought to be very circumspect, that before they bring their Corne in sheaves into the Barne, the said sheaves be very dry, and free from all moisture. Next, not to lay them on the earthen floor, without there bee some dry boards betweene the Corne and it, Then that there bee no much-hill, or lakes, eyther in the Barne, or neere it, for all fauour will soone communicate it selfe to the Corne; and aboue all, let the Barne bee very well ayred. If it be in such a place, where they haue no vse of Baines, as in the most part of Langueadocks, then order must be taken, that the Stacks of Corne be (at least) so well couered and enclosed, that no raige may get power of entrance, for otherwile, the Corne will sproute it selfe, and afterward rot, corrupt, and putrifie.

After that the Corne is threshed, and meete to be laid vp in the Garne or Corne-loft, chiefe must be made of one that receiueth the bright splendour of the East, breathed also moderately with the North and West windes: but the South-erne blasts, and those leauing that way, by no means to enter it. The Couerture ouer head, need no great costlinesse, because of the ayres eather entrance thorow the Tyles, or other the like; that the Corne may not be heated, or chafed. The floore may bee of earth, or paving tyles; and the walles of whited mossier. You must bee respectiue, that your Corne-heapes bee not great or thicke, to auoyde ouer-heating; remoouing and changing them from place to place, at two Months and two Moneths. The Garne must be farre enough from moist places; especially from houses of office, which yeeld a noysome fauour, or any such vnst being; from Stables of Oxen, Horses, Swine, & such like.

The planchers and walles of the Garne, wherein you purpose to house your Corne, must be washed with vinegar, or such water, wherein hearbes, or some bitter drugs haue bene boiled: as Wormewood, Southernwood, the leaues of wilde Cowcumbers, the pithe or graine of Coliquintida, or of Lupines, or Oxegauls; without all question to the contrary, these haue bene truly tried, that no VVeuels, Mites, or Wormes can bite or touch the Corne, where they haue bene vied. And they that Corne to take this paines, may lay some wormwood vnderneath, aloft, and about their Corne-heapes, or Southernwood, or dried wilde Marierome. Or else annoint the walles and planchers of the Garne, with Lye made of the oyle of Oliues; or if it may not be had, with Sheeps yring To salt powder the ground vnderneath the Corne, with ashes made of Oaken wood, it is the present killing of all Mites and VVeuels.

Now to keepe the Corne from heating or warming, ouer, and beside our forenamed remoouing, let there bee layde vnder euery Stack of Corne, one of Miller, or if it be mingled therewith, it is easily separated afterward with a running Sine. Sale-Niter and the scum thereof, is very good for Corne-heapes, and preferueth them wonderfully, as also fro sprouting: many Sea-Merchants haue made vse thereof, to their no meane profite. In breefe, a good and charitable man shall neuer stand in need of so many remedies, if he keepe his Corne with intention, to helpe and lend to the poore, and without interest. For God saith by his Prophet Ezechiel, That hee will preserue the goods of them that keepe them to helpe the poore. And contrariwise, That he will suffer them to rot, and their Corne shall bee eaten with yermine, that hoorde them vp, to get great gaine by them, and hurt the people vexed with famine.

CHAP. XIII.

Of the great difference, which both Ancient and Moderne Writers, haue obserued to be betwixt the Royall title of a King, and the disagreefull name of a Tyrant.

Before I begin to describe the difference, that is betwixt a King and a Tyrant; I hold it to bee a matter most convenient, to set downe a definition both of the one and other, to the ende, that the deportments of them both, may the better be knowne.

ture, as he desireth his Subjects to bee towards him: forsaking naturall liberty, & a propriety in the goods of any man. I observe in this definition, that Subjects ought to bee obedient to the Royall Monarch, to declare thereby, that in him consisteth Soueraigne Maiesty. The King also ought to bee obedient to the Lawes of nature, that is to say; to gouerne his Subjects, and to guide his owne actions by naturall iustice, which maketh it selfe to bee seene as cleare and brightly, as the splendour of the Sunne. It is likewise a Royall marke or note, when the Prince sheweth himselfe as milde and playable to the lawes of nature; as hee wisheth his Subjects to be obeyfiant to him. Which he may easily do, if he feare God about all things, be pittifull to the afflicted, proud in his enterprizes, hardy in exploits, modest in prosperity, constant in adversity, firme in his word, wise in his counsell, careful of his Subjects, succourous to friends, terrible to enemies, courteous to good men, dreadfull to wicked persons, and iust to all.

A Tyrant is such a man, as defileth the lawes of nature with his feete, abuseth the liberties of free-borne Subjects, even as if they were his slaues, and maketh the goods of other men to be his owne. The name or word Tyrant, is Greeke in his owne propriety, and was honourable, signifying nothing else in times of antiquity, but a Prince that had possessed himselfe of the State, without the consent of his Citizens and Subjects, and of a companion, had made him his Master. Such a man was called a Tyrant, although he were a most wise and iust Prince. In like manner, Plato writing to Dionysius the Tyrant, gaue him this quality as his honour: Plato to Dionysius the tyrant, health. The returne and answer was: Dionysius the tyrant, to Plato greeting. And to declare that the word tyrant, was as well attributed to iust & good Princes, as them that were wicked; it evidently appeareth herein: because Pittacus and Periander, two of the seuen Sages of Greece, were called tyrants, for having seized the Estates of their Countries.

But such, as eyther by power, or else by cunning had invaded and obtained the Soueraignty, perceiving that their liues were exposed to the mercy of their enemies; were constrained (for the better security of their liues and goods) to haue Guards of strangers about their persons, & strong Garrisons in Castles, for whose payement of wages and maintenance, great tributes & impositions were leuied. And when they saw, that their liues could not be secured, hauing but poore friends, and potent enemies; they did eyther put to death, or banished some, to please and enrich others: and they that stood in desperate condition, they made rape both of their goods and wiues. And this was the reason, that tyrants were extremely hated and malliced. For we read, that Dionysius the elder tyrant, of one part of Sicily, had daily ten thousand Soldiers for his Guard, and ten thousand horsemen, and foure hundred Gallies, readily hyred and armed. And when he could not make vp this account among so few Subjects as were vnder his seruice; he wrang & griped his people in so small an Island, whereof hee gouerned but in part onely, and contained no more then six hundred and fixteene Italian miles in all.

Now because euery one hath not the iudgement to distinguish a good King from a Tyrant, calling him a Tyrant, that (for great store of good reasons) maketh himselfe formidable, and stood in awe of, beside that which I haue already sette downe, I will make him some what more easily to be knowne.

The most notable difference betweene a King and a Tyrant, is; that the King conformeth himselfe to the lawes of nature, and a tyrant trampleth on them with his feete, that one maintaineth piety, iustice, and faith, the other hath neither God, Law, nor Faith. The one maketh what he doth, serue for the weale publique, & tuition of his Subjects: the other doth not any thing, but for his owne particular profite, reuenge, or pleasure. The one enforceth himselfe to enrich his Subjects by all the best meanes he can deuise: the other will not build his owne house, but with the ruines of theirs. The one reuengeth the iniuries of the publique Estate, and pardoneth his owne: but the other reuengeth cruelly his owne iniuries, and pardoneth them that are done to others. The one spareth the honour of modest women: & the other triumpheth in their shame. The one taketh pleasure to be aduised in all freedome and liberty, and will be wisely reprehended when hee faileth; but nothing is more irkefome to the other, then the counsell of a graue and vertuous man.

The one striueth to maintaine his Subjects in peace and vniue; but the other moueth dayly diuisions, to make the one part ruinate the other, and then to fatten himselfe with their Confiscations. The one, delighteth to bee sometimes seene, and heard of his Subjects; but the other euer more hydeeth himselfe from them, as from his enemies. The one, maketh reckoning of his Subjects Loue, but the other of their Feare. The one, neuer feareth, but for the wel-fare of his people: but the other dreadeth nothing more then them.

The one, will not charge his Subjects more then needes must, remembring alwayes the publique necessity; but the other drinketh their blood, gnaweth their bones, and sucketh the verie Marrowe of his people, onely to weaken them. The one searcheth out men of best condition, to employ in publique Offices; but the other employeth none but Theeues, and most wicked persons in his seruice, like to Spunges. The one maketh free gifts of estates and offices, to auoide concussions, and crowdes of people; but the other selleth them at as deare rates as hee can, for their better meanes of enfeebling the people by Thefts; and then (afterward) cuttes the Theeues throates for theyr vvealth, because he would be reputed a good Iusticer.

A King measureth his actions and manners, by the foote of the Law: but the tyrant maketh the Law to serue his manners. The one is beloued and reuerenced of his people: and the other generally hated of them all. The one hath no other recourse in war, but to his Subjects: but the other, will make no warre but with them. The one, hath no Guards or Garrisons but of his owne people: but the others defence is onely in strangers. The one delighteth in an assured repose and tranquility; but the other languisheth in perpetuall feare. The hope & expectation of the one, is euermourning life in blessednes: but the other cannot auoid eternall punishment. The one is honored in this life, & desired again after death: the other is infamous in this life, and cometh in peeces with shame after death. But because the continuation of this chapter might seeme ouer-redious to the Reader, if I should verify all these relations by historickall examples, I will referre such as are willing to take the paynes, to read the histories themselves, both in Greeke, Latine, & other languages, where they shall find that to be most true, which hath bin spoken of Kings and Tyrants.

CHAP. XV.

In what high account and esteeme, Philosophers, & other men of knowledge (in what Sciences soeuer) were held in elder times, by Emperors and Kings.

E need not now complaine, that in these dayes of ours, there is such want of excellent spirits, in all kindes of Arts and Sciences: but if we survey with more wary iudgment, we shall plainly perceiue, that there are learned men enow, who may iustly find fault, that neither they are in such esteeme, or any way so well recompensed of Princes in these times, as many worthy men were heretofore, by Emperors, Kings, Princes, and great Lords, in those famous daies of reuerend antiquity. Instead of concluding, and acquainting yee with the iustice of their reason, I will lightly passe ouer; & instead of long speaking, onely remember yee with some histories and examples of Famous Potentates in former ages, who were Friends, and Nurfing fathers to Philosophers and Schollers; to the end that their actions being compared with those of these dayes, it may be knowne, whether they haue cause to complaine, or no, in a case so highly importing.

And first of all, I will beginne with the excellent and renowned Captain Pompey, who (as we read) after he had vanquished the puissant king Mithridates, & obtained many other victories and adventures in war, coming to Athens with all his warlike furnishment, such as the Roman Consuls and Captaines vsed to haue borne before the he was aduertised that Pollidamus the Philosopher lay sicke in his bed. Being desirous to go and see him, he would not onely honor him with his personall Visitation; but when he came neere the door of the house, he caused his Standards and Imperial Ensigns to march in before him. For it was euermore his saying; That Kingdomes and Empires ought to obey vertue and Learning. Thus he behaued himselfe to this poore learned man, which hee would not haue done to the greatest Potentate then liuing.

Dionysius the Tyrant, king of Syracusa, hauing obtained of Plato the excellent diuine Philosopher, that he would come & see him in Sicily; when hee heard of his neere appreching, he went to meete him on the way, causing him to sit with him in his owne Chariot, drawne with white Horses. Such was the reputation which wife and learned men had in those times. When Alexander the Great, had determined the vtter ruine & subuersion of the Thebans, he gaue especial charge first of all, that no man should touch the house of the Poet Pindarus, but to leaue it wholly standing. If I should tell yee, how highly Virgill was honored and esteemed by Octauianus, is a matter so perfectly known, that it needeth no report of mine. According to Pliny in his sequenth Booke, whensoever he entred into the Theater, there to deliuer some of his Verses, all the people would stand vp on their feet, and offer as great reuerence to him, as if it had bin to the Emperor. And that which is much more, Silius Italicus, a Spanish Poet, did yearly solemnize the day of his Nativity, and with farre greater deuotion, then hee did his owne. The gifts and presents daily giuen him by Octavian, Mecenas, and many more, were so great, that Seruius (who writeth of him) saith, that his goods (in very short time) amounted to the value of fixe thousand Sesterties, which a rife vnto two hundred and fiftie thousand Crownes. He had in Rome a very honorable Palace; in regard whereof, Iuuenal in his 7. Satyre saith, That he was one of the richest men in those dayes.

Vpon a day, in the presence of Octavian, and Livia his wife, the mother vnto Marcellus, Virgill vntered certaine Verses of his bookes Æneidos, and comming to the end of the sixt Booke, where hee discourseth most elegantly of Marcellus, lately dead before; the hart of the mother became so strangely and passionately moued thereat, that she fell into a swoond, not hauing any power to heare the rest. But being reuiued to her selfe againe, she commaunded, that for each of those whereof shee had lost the hearing, Virgill should haue ten Sesterties giuen him. The remainder (which she heard not) being one and twenty verses in number; the valewation of his reward, contained the summe of 5000. Ducates, of our instant money.

It is found faithfully recorded, that the Syracusans had some Athenian prisoners, that could rehearse (by heart) certayne verses of Euripides the Greeke Poet; and daily pronounced them; by which occasion only, and in honor of the Poet, they were deliuered, & permitted freely to go home to their owne country. Scripi the African, during his life time, had alwayes with him (in his wars, the Statue of Æneas; and when he died, he tooke especial order, that it might be buried in his owne Sepulcher with him. The Emperor Domitian, caused Silius Italicus (an excellent Poet, and borne in Spain) to bee made three times Consul of Rome, as Marshall witnesseth in one of his Epigrams, beginning, Augusto Placitura.

But I know not what to say, of our moderne and later times; or what our late liuing Princes haue done, either to Poissin, Pontanus, or Sannazar; and to speak of our Modern Frenchmen, as Ronsard, Belloy, and other excellent Poets. But perhaps you will answer me, their hopes may bee to come heereafter, because some of them are yet liuing, young in yeares, but old in wisdome and vnderstanding, and worthy to bee equalled with many of former times. But because I see so little respect, let vs goe backe againe to those renowned Ancients. King Atthridates held Plato and his learning in so high reputation, being desirous to haue his statue; sent to find out a Syllian to performe it, because he was a most excellent workeman. For in those dayes, the greatest honour that could be, was (in publike places) to erect Figures & Statues; yet none might be permitted, except it were of some worthy man, made famous, and knowne by some vertuous deeds, or for his dignity in learning. For this cause the men of Athen made one of Demosthenes, with a title of the very greatest honor that euer had bin giuen vnto any other; and these were the words of the inscription. If the power and strength of Demosthenes had bin equal to his spirit, wisdome, and learning: the King of Macedon could neuer haue surmounted the Greeces.

The words of Great Alexander, of Homers Hlaids

A famous Philosopher of Prusa

the very greatest honor that euer had bin giuen vnto any other; and these were the words of the inscription. If the power and strength of Demosthenes had bin equal to his spirit, wisdome, and learning: the King of Macedon could neuer haue surmounted the Greeces.

Iosephus the Jew, being one in number amongst the captiues of Ierusalem, was brought prisoner to Rome; & yet notwithstanding, in regard of the Bookes hee had made of the Jewes Antiquities, they repute him worthy to haue a Statue. The Athenians considering the wisdome of Demetrius Phalerens, scholler vnto Theophrastus, caused his Statue to be erected in thirty places of this City. Now if men of merit were so highly honoured, doubtles they were as well rewarded. For Athenes writeth in the 5. book of his Gymnosophists that Aristotle for his Booke de Animalium receiued of Alexander 800. talents; which of the currant money now in France, valleweth foure hundred & fourescore thousand Crownes, which is verified by Pliny in his eight booke. There hee declareth, that Alexanders desire was so great to haue this booke performed by Aristotle, that he sent many thousands of men thoroughout all Greece and Asia, with letters and expresse commandement, that they should be obedient to whatsoeuer hee required, touching the manner of hunting and flying of Fowles, Fishes, and all the like exercises, because they should know & vnderstand, the nature and properties of all kinde of Beasts, Birds, and Fishes, & then to aduertise Aristotle thereof. Vndoubtedly if Homer, the very best of Greek Poets, had liued in the time of Alexander, it is to bee presumed that hee would haue bin as bountifull and beneficiall to him, as hee was to Aristotle. Because when a chest or Casket was presented vnto him, wherein K. Darius kept his most precious Vnguent, the Chest being very pleasing to him, he said; I will make this Chest the keeper of far richer treasure: and presently hee did put thereinto the Workes of Homer, which he euermore tooke great delight to reade in continually.

The Emperor Traiane, in regard of his learning onely, did so especially honour the Philosopher Dyon, that when hee rode abroad in the fields to take the Ayre; hee would haue him to sit neere vnto him in his owne Chariot, and so ride on along with him thorough some, making it as his triumphall entrance.

In the warre which the Emperor Octavianus made in Egypt, against Mark Anthony, hee sayde; That hee did forbear to destroy Alexandria, for the respect hee bore to Alexander, that builded it; but much more for his loue to the Philosopher Arius. The same Emperor also, made Cornelius Gallus Tribune of the people; onely because hee was a most elegant Poet.

Suetonius in the life of Vespasian, sheweth, what rewardes were anciently giuen to the Learned. For he saith, *Although Vespasian was taxed with counteneyling; yet notwithstanding, he greatly fauoured exercises and Arts, and gaue as pensions to each Master of them, such quantity of golden pieces, as being reduced to the summes of our monyes (according to Berallius and Budens) their stipends valleweth two thousand and five hundred Ducates, but as some say Crownes.*

By the Testimony of Pliny, in his sequenth Booke, and the ninth Chapter, writing of Socrates the Greeke Orator, a man may very easily perceyue, in what account and estimation the learned were then. For he saith, that this Socrates, hauing made an Oration for a certayne man; hee rewarded him with twelue Talents, which vallew (according vnto our present computation) twelue thousand Crownes.

Wee finde it likewise written, in the life of the Emperour Antoninus, Sonne vnto Suerius, that hee gaue to Appian, so many Ducates of Gold, as there were number of Verses in a great worke which hee had (at that time) made, concerning the Nature and property of all kinds of Fishes.

The Emperour Gratian, knowing that Antoninus composed well in Verse; gaue him (onely for his desert that way) the Consulshippe, which was the very greatest dignity, nay euen next to that of Emperour.

Domitian, albeit hee was a most wicked man, yet he gaue great honors & gifts to the Poet Eustathius. And in a solemn Feast, hee caused him to sit at his Table, Crowned with a Garland of Lawrell; where-with all our gaue Elders vnto Crowne theyr Poets. Seleus Bassus, a Ly-

That Learning is not onely necessary in Kings and Princes: but also for Generall, Captaines, and Commanders, that follow the Exercise and Art Military.

Could alledge manifold Histories, besides true,
good, and sufficient Reasons, that Princes (in ancient times) found no better forme, or direct

rule for their orderly government, then Learning, and Knowledge. And because the euident heereof remaineth so plaine and pregnant vnto vs, I will obserue some few examples, tending to this purpose.
When King Phillip vnderstood the birth of his sonne Alexander, and knowing Aristotle to liue then in Athens, he sent a very notable Letter vnto him (recorded by Plutarke, and Anulus Gellius) wherein hee thanked the Goddess, not so much for the safe birth of his sonne, but because hee was borne in the life time of Aristotle. By which few words, may be apparently discerned, how much the King thought leaning and knowledge fitte for his sonne, to the end, he might proue to be such a King and Captaine, as hee was indeede afterward. Whereupon, when hee grew vnto yeares meete for the embracing of studie;
he made Aristotle his Mayster, sent him
great gifts, and (in meere loue to his son) builded a Cittie, which he had formerly destroyed, and erected also a Schoole (admirable for cost and curious workemaship, such as no time before had afforded) wherein his sonne might receiue instruction.

Antigonus, King of Macedon, knowing how needfull a thing Learning was, for his owne good government: and being mightily prouoked by the continuall renowne of Zeno, a singular Philosopher, and Prince of the Stoicks; desired earnestly to enioy his company, which hee
further laboured by Letters, and manie Embassies. Of which Letters, *Diogenes

uertheless, I know wishall, that in true felicithou wouldest come and liue with me, which I pray thee to yeelde vnto; that I may enioy

whereof, be well assured, that thou not onely shalt be master of me; but shalt also be a tea-

These Letters being receiued by the venerable Philosopher; in regard of his deepe stepe into age, it was not possible for him to condiscend thereto, or (in person) to satisfie the Kings earnest request.
But he sent him two of his Schollers, excelling the rest in knowledge & learning, by whom he was worthily taught and instructed.

The learning of Aristotle, vnder whom Alexander was tutored full whole yeares together, tooke such roote and efficacie
in the Scholler; that he became so excellent a King, as no one in the world was able to compare with him. Being in the midst of his Armies, he would not giue ouer study, but euermore layd (with his Sword) on the pillow of his bed, the Iliades of Homer, and other bookes. And it appeared, that such was his loue to Leaning, that he could as easily apprehend it,
as he conquered kingdoms by force of Armes. Plutarke, Anulus Gellius, and The-mistocles doe affirme, that Alexander had published certayne bookes of naturall Philosophy, whereof he had been an Auditor vnder Aristotle; in regard whereof,
he wrote a Letter vnto him.

The Letter of great Alex- ander, to his Maister Aristotle.

composed. For, in thine owne iudgement, wherein can I pos-

wherein thou hast instructed me, cometh

Farewell.

When this was vnderstoode by *Ari-truly say of him, that he was no lesse in-

he made himselfe a Scholler, before hee was a Souldier: and afterward as often as he had any leysure, he frequented the Academies of the Poets, and in walking, he would both reade and write. Vpon a time, being at Alexandria in Egypte, to saue
himselfe from an imminent perill, he ad-

declaring thereby, that he affected them

A notable answer.

Notonely Cesar, but all the Romanes also, do beare witness of that which wee say, who (in my poore opinion) were reputed and knowne to be good Captaines and Gouvernors. For, the first thing which they undertook for their children in their infancie, was to haue them well instructed, and therefore provided good schoolmasters for them, which they chargeably sent for out of Greece. Both the Catoes were knowne to be excellent scholars, & soldiers. The great Censor was wonderfully addicted to learning, as the Booke written by him do plainly testifie: hee was a worthy Orator, Historian, and endued with many vertues, and euen toward the ending of his dayes, hee learned the Greeke tongue. The other Cato, styled of Utica, though he was not of such a sharpe and ingenious spirit in apprehension of Sciences; yet notwithstanding, hee kept company with most excellent Schoolmasters; among whom was the Philosopher * Antipater. And he gaue his minde so much to studie, that Cicero sayth, in his Booke De Finibus, he did nothing else but reade; yea, whensoever he sate in the Senate house, hee alwayes had some Booke or other about him, to reade at all times when he pleased.

Scipio Africanus, the victorious triumpher ouer Hanniball, was extremely addicted to Learning, and euermore had the Poet Ennius with him. After all his Victories, he gaue himselfe againe afresh to Learning and reading. Hanniball his Competitor, although he was of Africa, had alwayes booke with him in his Tents and Pauillions: in the time of warre, hee would not giue ouer reading, but in one place or other (howsoever it were) hee would haue Silanus and Saxilus (two learned Lacedemonians) with him, by whom hee was well instructed in the Greeke Language. We haue formerly read, that Dionysius the Tyrant of Sicily, had Plato to be his Schoolemaster, and kept company alio with many other learned men. Afterward, when hee was expelled out of his kingdom, one (in mocking manner) demanded of him, whereto now serueth the Philosophy which he had learned of Plato, to whom hee returned this answer, It serueth mee to support my present necessity with patience. Themistocles, a most excellent Captaine, declared himselfe to be no

lesse diligent in learning, when hee was in Armes: his Master was * Alexandros, the Milesius. Epaminondas, and the other Captaines of Greece, were all studious and worthy Orators. Atthidrides, in the warres which he had against the Romanes, for the space of forty years together, notwithstanding all the furious assaults, desisted not from his studying, hauing euermore diuers Schoolemasters and Philosophers with him.

Octavius Augustus, limited to himselfe certaine houres in the day, onely for study; and when he was in warre, yet he kept his times of studying still: hauing therefore diuers worthy Masters with him, as Apollodorus of Pergama, the Philosopher Asperavius, Asinius Pollio, Valerius Messala, Virgil, Ouid, and many other. And before this Emperour, there was a famous Captaine, named * Lucius Lucullus, who during the wars, gaue himselfe to study; & when the wars ceased, hee applyed all his diligence, in cherishing and maintaining learned men. Paulus Emilius, victorious ouer the king of Persia, ouer & beside his beeing a very learned man, endeauoured also that his children might bee the like; so that at his instant request, the Athenians gaue him * Metrodorus to bee their Schoole-master. But wherfore do I take so much paines, in naming so many one after another? Pompey, Quintus Fabius Maximus, Marcus Brutus, Trasianus, Adrian, and Marke Antonius, were all learned men, and compiled Booke, Orations, and Letters of great learning, and memorable example.

In briefe, if I erre not greatly in my judgement, it may plainly appeare, that few Captaines are found of ancient times who were excellent in nothing so much as by their learning. There are two onely, of whom wee finde nothing remainyng written, expressing whether they were learned, or no: the one being named Caius Marius, and the other Marcus Marcellus. And yet I reade, that Marcellus highlie loued and favoured men of knowledge: whereby it is to bee credited, that surely himselfe was learned, though nothing (to that effect) bee written of him. And it may the more manifestly appeare, by the prohibition he made (as we haue formerly alledged) at the surprisall of Syracusa, that Archimedes should not bee slayne. And

And although he miscaied, notwithstanding his strict command to the contrary: yet it was not without great greefe of the said Marcellus.

Let then the Captaines of these our dayes, say what they list, that learning is not so expedient for them (I meane such as thrust the stile of Captaines on themselves) coueting with their owne opinion, or rather oblinacy, to cloud and couer their dulnesse and ignorance. It is sufficient for vs, that wee see how highly our grane Predecessors esteemed Booke and Learning, equall with the courage and manhood of infinite Captaines, worthily affected and addicted to learning; as we finde it vnparially set downe, in that iudicious Booke of warre, written by Kobertus Valturinus.

CHAP. XVII.

Of diuers secret naturall properties, being in the Viper: and how he may be sed on, and eaten, without any danger.

THE Viper is a kinde of Serpent, sufficiently knowne to many: and although it bee little, yet notwithstanding it is very venomous, for with a little pricking, it can kill a man. But as our Lord God made not any thing but to profitable vse: euen so this creature, with all his venom, serueth man for diuers medicines and maladies, especially for any paine in the throte. It is a thing very excellently good (by a secret property in nature) to beare the head of a Viper about a man: for luing, it killeth, and dead, it healeth. Tiriacle, or Treacle, as we vicerme it, is properly good against venom: but in the making thereof, and in the confection, there is necessarily required some part of this beaſt, to the end it may be the more perfect, and of the greater efficacy. And it was named Tiriacle, because that the worde Thirion in Greeke, signifieth a Viper or venomous Beaſt. Some (and not vnſightly) doe giue another etymologie, and reason for this name. But before we report the benefits ensuing by the Viper, me-thinks it were not amisse, to remember what is said by Pliny, Isidorus, and Aelianus. They report, that when this Serpent conceiue, the Male putteth his head in at the mouth of the Female, whereby shee receiueh such immeasurable delectation; that with her ouer-sharp teeth, she byteth off the head of the Male, becoming thereby widowed, yet violent in assaulting. The matter conceiued by her, groweth to bee Egges, which forme themselves within her body, according as the spawn of fishes doth: and of those Egges do Vipers ensue, at such time as she is to deliuer her young ones, yeelding euery day, one, till they amount to twenty. Now because they are so many in number, they which remaine behinde, hauing no power to attend their fit time, do teare the belly of their Damme, so that by her death, they enter into the world, and lue. If it be so, surely it is a matter very maruailous: for it should seeme thereby, that (euen naturally) the children do reuenge the death of their father.

With this opinion of Pliny, do many other Authors consent; as Plutarch in his Treatise against Scorfes. Neuertheless, there are a great many other, who do contrary it, denying that the Viper dyeth in her teeming: with which opinion, I also rest resolved, because the other seemeth to me not naturall; neyther haue I seene the experience thereof, or know any person that hath seene it. In like manner, Philostatus is flay against it, in the life of Apollo Thyanens, introducing Apollo himselfe, who reporteth, that hee had seene a Viper, that after she had fully yeelded all her young ones; licked them very lovingly, and liued healthfully. As much may be gathered from the words of Aristotle, who setteth them downe thus. *The Viper onely (among all other Serpents) deliuereth her young ones, because she first formeth them in her body of Egges, as the ſpawne of Fishes is. Afterward, when they are formed, they remaine three daies wrapped up in a tender thinn skin; which breaketh at the limited time, and so affordeth the young ones liberty (in regard whereof, Apuleius in his Apologie, calleth them Quiperes, and not Vipers, as much to say, as engendered of Egges) and very often it happeneth, that that wrapper breaking (of it selfe) in the Dammes belly, they issue forth euery day one, so the number of twenty and more: these are the very words of Aristotle. ther place, I meane in his third Booke of Beasts, speaking of the reeming of Serpents, he saith. Before the Viper yeeldeth her young ones, she formeth them within her body of Egger. And I am perswaded, that hence ensueth those speeches, of the young ones tearing the belly of their Damme. For it seemeth to them that stand in defence thereof, that when Aristotle speaketh of this first fawning or reeming: hee purposed to say, that they did then breake or teare the belly of their damme.

But leauing these circumstances, I say that the viper, how dangerous soeuer it be, yeeldeth great helpe and succour to man. Dioscorides saith, that the flesh of a viper, being boyled or sodden, may safely be eaten: being very medicinable for the nerues, and for the sight. But in preparation to the eating thereof, the head and taile must be taken away: then being fleaed and well dressed, it is to be tempered with strong Annise-seedes. He saith also, that there is made of this flesh, a certaine kinde of Salt, or salt-powder, excellently auailing to procure a good appetite, being prepared in this manner. You must take a new earthen pot, and put the viper thereinto, wled as formerly hath bene declared, then put Salt and flamed figges to it, with a competent quantity of hony, and the pot being well couered, let it boyle and bake a long while in an Ouen. Which being done, beate and reduce it into a powder: and whosoever afterward will make vse thereof with his other meate, shall finde it very pleasant and profitable for the stomacke.

Paulus Aeginetus saith also, that the flesh of a viper is singularly good against leprousie and meazeldnesse; making therefore great esteeme of the Salt-powder fore-mentioned, and affirming with Plinius, that a certaine nation in India, eateth the flesh of the viper. Dioscorides auoucheth, that whosoever will eat the flesh of the viper, shall liue long time, and very healthfully. Against the byting of this Serpent, there are store of remedies, whereof Theophrastus maintaineth one, saying, Whosoever is bitten thereby, mellodious sounds and songs doe greatly benefite him, because Musike is very medicinable, as we haue already, and shall prouoe hereafter. Galen saith, that this beast ca-teth not any thing all the time of winter: but hideth her selfe (as dead) in the earth; and whosoever then findeth, toucheth, and handleth her, she cannot bite him: but when summer cometh, she then resumeth all her forces. The like affirmeth Plinie, of Lizards, Snakes, and all other kinde of creeping creatures.

Aristotle saith, that they containe themselves three or foure moneths, without feeding on any thing. Aelianus auoucheth, that those vipers which breed in the Provinces of Arabia, although they doe bite, yet their biting is not venomous, because they doe feede on the Baume tree, and sleepe vnder the shadow thereof. Aristotle further saith, that they are very desirous to drinke wine; and many people doe take them, by setting vessells of wine in the places where they resort: for they will become drunk by drinking, and alter they take them sleeping. There are many things more to be spoken, concerning the qualities and properties of the viper, which I doe purposely omit for breuities sake.

C. Radianus* calleth it Phalangium, which at the beginning of summer is so venomous, that whosoever is bitten or stung thereby, except he be very suddenly succoured, hee looseth all all sense and vnderstanding, and dyeth instantly. But if any one (being so bitten) chance to escape death: yet he remaineth insensible, and wholly voyd of any capacity; for which dangerous inconuenience, experience found out a remedy, and that is Musique.

The iudgement of Authours hereon, speaking as eye-witnesses, and hauing scene the prooue thereof, is thus. So soone (say they) as any one is bitten or enueomed, the best helpe is, to bring instantly before him, such as vse to play on Vialles, Flutes, and other Instruments, to play diuers Lessons, & sing many Songs: which Musike being heard by the party wounded, he will presently begin to daunce, deliuering variety of gestures and motions with his body, euen as if all his life time he had well inured himselfe to dancing, in which fury and power of dancing, he continueth, vntill such time as the venome be dissipated. Alexander Alexandrinus proceedeth farther, affirming, that he beheld one wounded by this Spider, to daunce & leape about incessantly, and the Musicians (binding themselves wearied) gaue ouer playing: whereupon, the poore offended dancier, hauing vterly lost all his forces, fell downe on the ground, as if he had bene dead. The Musicians no sooner began to play againe, but hee returned to himselfe, and mounting vp vpon his feet, danced againe as lustily as formerly hee had done, and so continued dancing still, till he found the harme asswaged, and himselfe entirely recovered. Heereunto he addeth, that when it hath happened, that a man hath not bene thorowly cured by Musike in this manner; within some short while after, hearing the found of Instruments, hee hath recovered footing againe, and bene enforced to hold on dancing, and neuer to cease, till his perfect & absolute healing, which (questionlesse) is admirable in nature.

* Aclepiades writeth, that the found of Instruments, and voyces sweetly singing to them, hath wrought extraordinary cures on Lunatics and mad men. We reade also, that * Esmeas the Thebane, healed many diseases and infirmities, only by his sweete and melodious playing on Flutes. Theophrastus and Aulus Gellius say that Musike appeaseth the paine of the Sciatica, and of the Gout. We likewife finde it recorded in the sacred Scripture, that Danid (by Musike) cald Saul of the passio, which the euill spirit wrought in him: so great is this property, proceeding from the entire amity, which the nature of man beareth to Musike. And if good consideration be made hereof, wee shall not account it strange, that infinite infirmities haue bene cured by the means of Musike. For it hath evidently bene scene, that there are diuers beasts and other creatures, that kill by laughing, others by weeping, and others in sleeping, according as Plutarch writeth of Cleopatra, and as diuers other good Historians haue faithfully affirmed.

CHAP. XIX.

Of a strange medicine, whereby Faustine of Rome, wife vnto the Emperour Marcus Aurelius, was cured of an infirmity of dishonest loue: and of many other remedies against that powerful passion.

Concerning that affection, or imprisonment of the will, as we may iustly terme it, which ordinarily is stiled by the name of Loue; whether it be a powerfull passion, working wonderfull effects in the soule or no: there need no further question to be made, but examination of such mens iudgements, as (by good experience) haue knowne it, and whose examples remaine notorious to vs. More especially, of very worthy and excellent persons, who haue suffered their wits to be so strangely transported thereby, that extremity of death hath ensued thereon. Julius Capitolinus, among diuers other examples, reporteth what happened to Faustine, Daughter to Antonius, and Wife to the Emperour Marcus Aurelius, who became so excessively enamored on a Fencer or Sword-player; that by ouer-abounding in desire to enioy his company, shee fell into such a consumption, as very greatly endangered her life.

This being vnderstood by Marcus Aurelius, immediately hee assembled a great number of Astrologers and Physitions, to finde some aduice and remedy for to the Sea, and being not carefull in fea-ting himselfe on the Dolphines backe, or how to fit for his safest holding on; it chanced, that one of the sharp-pointed finnes, which riseth out of Dolphines wings (for so are they tearmed by Pliny, and others) ran so far into the childes belly, & wounded him in such sort, that instantly he fell downe dead in the water. Which when the Dolphin perceiued, and the blood of the dead childe trickling downe his sides; heooke vp his deare loue a childe so well as he could, and returning backe to land suddenly, even as if he intended to reuenge this offence vpon himselfe; hee swam furiously on land out of the water, and presently dyed by the childe.

This Historie is also recorded by Pliny, with many other examples of Dolphines, that haue declared great loue and kindnesse to men. Particularly hee reporteth one, in the time of the Emperour Othavian, that a Dolphin (in the very like manner) tooke delight in an infant, on the Sea-coast, neere to Puteoli, and whensoever this childe, being named Simon (for it is said, that Dolphines will suddenly runne to the very found of that name) came to the shoare; the childe would mount vpon his backe, and be carried into the Sea, passing and returning alwaies safely to land. He faith moreover, that the childe dying by sicknesse, & the Dolphin often comming to the visuall meeting place, & not finding the childe there, dyed with griefe and sorrow. The younger Pliny, Nephew to great Pliny, declareth many meruailes of a Dolphin, in the 9. Booke of his Epistles: especially in that Epistle which beginneth, Indici in materi- am certam.

CHAP. XXI.

Of a man, that by receiuing a wound at his enemies hand, was deliuered from a deadly danger, wherein he had long time liued: With sundry other examples to the same purpose.

Wee haue formerly related, that Musique hath bene the meanes of curing some diseases, and no way to be reputed incredible: considering, that wee finde by other stranger meanes, very great infirmities haue likewise bene holpen. Plutarch, in a notable Treatise by him composed, declaring how men may deriue profit or benefite from their enemies, reporteth; that a man had a certaine enemy, named Prometheus, who hated him extremely, and fought all the meanes he could deuise to kill him. It fortuned, that meeting with him on a day, hee gaue him diuers hurts, and among the rest, hee chanced to wound an olde vicer, that had long lyen in the flesh, couered ouer with skinne, a matter of great danger to his life, and (for which) all helpe was viterly denied him. Neuerthelesse, this wound proued the onely meanes of his helpe, and safe deliuerance from the former danger: for in thinking to kill him, and so to quench his malice, hee gaue him life and soundnesse of health. Valerius reciteth the very same history (among other noteworthy matters) in his Booke of miracles: but he affirmeth the mans name that was healed by this wound, to bee Iason Phereus.

Pliny writeth of another man, named Phalerus, who had an incurable disease, in regard of a fluxe of blood, continually flowing out at his mouth, caused by breaking a veine within his body. And finding himselfe in desperate conclusion of any curing; he entred suddenly into an Army, without any Armes for his defence, that being there slaine among the enemies, his hope and helpe might both finish together. It came to passe, that receiving a dangerous wound vpon the breast, there issued forth such an abundance of blood from that hurt; that the fluxe (hauing formerly his vent at the mouth only) ceased, and Chyrurgions afterward, with the aduice of skillfull Physicians, consolidating the broken veine, hee remained soundly healed of all harmes.

I finde it also recorded of Quintus Fabius, that hee hauing had a Feauer quartane for many yeares together; giuing battaile one day to the Allobroges, now named Sauoyans, the extreme heate in desire which he had then to fight; quite expelled the Feauer, and it neuer toucht him afterward.

The Chirurgions in dressing this latter harme, did very well perceiue that the nerves which had bene cut before; beganne to stretch and restore themselves in such sort, that being cured of this second hurt, his thigh was soundly recouered, and hee went as vpright as euer hee did, and without the least limping. So did it happen to Telephus, one of the sonnes to Hercules, and King of Mysia, who being wounded in his owne Countrey by Achilles, could not any way be cured, till eight yeres after, he was wounded againe by the same Achilles, and in the selfe same part of his body, before Troy, then besieged, and the rest of the same Speare that formerly had hurt him, proued to be his onely help.

F all the fruites which the earth yeeldeth (I mean those whereof liquor is made) there is none (in my iudgement) more profitable then good wine; provided, that it be temperately taken. For this cause was it that Anacharsis sayd, The Vine produceth three Grapes: The first of Pleasure: The second of Drunkennesse: And the third of Teares and Sadenesse. So that hee which passeth the first Cuppe, that is to say, a little, and moderately receiued; proceedeth on to shame and danger.

Prophane Authours, that neuer had any vnderstanding of the sacred Scriptures, doe name vs diuerse inuentors of wine. Diadorus Siculus, in his fourth booke attributeth the inuention of wine, and first planting of the Vine, to Dionysius the sonne of Jupiter, named Bacchus, and Liber pater, so styled, for the liberty of wine. For this inuention a Temple was erected to him, vnderneath the Capitoll at Rome: where they celebrated his Feastes, which were called Dionysians, or Bacchanalsians, very dishonest, and full of great lubricity. That the inuention came from these Dionysians, Pirrol giueth assurance, at the entrance into his second booke of Georgicks. Howbeit, Marcianus Capellus saith; that Dionysius only instructed the Greeks, in the manner of making wine. Others say, that Icarus father to Erigone, first taught the indultry of making wine to the Athenians: and becoming afterwards drunke thereby, the people slew him. In Julie, they say, that Saturne did first plant the Vine there, before the yong suckers and plants from the ile of Candia thither. And Plutarch writeth, that Arurus Hetruscus brought Vines first into France. But the truth of historie, is, that the first inuenter of wine, was Noah, and the first that made himselfe drunke therewith: whereof are Authours (besides that which is recorded in the ninth chapter of Genesis) Lactantius, Firminus, and Iosephus. Noah, at his comming forth of the Arke, planted the Vine with his owne proper hand, and drunke the iuyce of the raisin, whereby he became drunke: and discouering his nakednesse in sleeping, it happened to him by his sonnes, according as we reade in the same chapter of Genesis.

Afterwards, men attayning to know the fauour of wine, did drinke it, at the first, wholly pure of it selfe, and without the commixtion of any water: for, as Pliny auoucheth, one named Stafius was the first that did put water into wine, to temperate and qualifie it. By the meanes of which aduice, great good and healthfulness ensued to the world: because, wine being so made moderate, procured verie good and excellent effects. In like manner Plato, alleadged by Macrobius, in his second booke, sayth: Wine moderately taken, strengtheneth the vnderstanding of a man, augmenteth his force and vigour, maketh the heart chearefull and deliberate, and taketh away irkesome thoughts, and all offen-

Plutarch sayeth, Plinie sayeth, The use of Wine, receiuing it temperately, multiplieth our forces encreaseth blood and colour in the face: The nerves are fortified by wine, sight strengthened, the stomacke made vigorous, and appetite awakned: It prouoketh urine, impeacheth vomiting, expelleth melancholie, maketh the heart brightly, and serueth for many other good things. Asclepiades the Physician, wrote a booke by it selfe, wholly concerning the vertues of wine. And Saint Paul writing to Tymothy counsellereth him to drinke a little wine tempered, to strengthen his stomacke.

Physitions do make vse of wine in many medicines, because wine restoreth all the humours, re-enforceth blood where it faileth, gladdeth a melancholy disposition, dissipareth and dryeth vp flegme, humecteth and helpeth to purge chollier. Plato, introducing Socrates, sayth thus in commending wine, Like as moderate rains doe encrease our heauens, and tempests and inundations of waters doe rent them up and destroy them: Even so, wine temperately taken, cleareth the spirites, and fortifieth the vertues of the body, whereas contrariwise, over much, and immoderately receiued, destroyeth all. Not so much as the very odour and smell of wine, but it is highly commended (beyond all other odours) by our naturall Philosophers: because it is very comfortatiue, giueth great vigour to the spirites, and is exceeding liuely and piercing. But yet wee must consider withall, that the chiefe vertue of wine is euermore vnderstood, when it is qualified and made temperate.

The ancient Romans did wholly take away the vse of wine from women and children: as Valerius sayth, speaking of the customes and lawes of the Romans. So that, as Plinie affirmeth, at such time as Romulus reigned in Rome, a husband slew his wife, because shee had drunke wine; and in regard that the murder followed vpon this occasion, Romulus pardoned it. The vice of drinking wine, was held to be so odious in women, that Fabius Pictor reporteth, because a Romane woman had deceiued the Clarke of a celler, onely to drinke wine which was kept therein; her parents caused her to be starued to death. And heereupon grew the custome of fathers and mothers kissing their children on the mouthes; onely to perceiue thereby, whether they had drunke wine or no. We finde it in good record, that N. Domitius being Iudge of Rome, hee deputed a woman of her Dowry, because shee had drunke more wine, then was allowed her for her health. Salomon in his Proverbs sayth, It is not for Kings to drinke wine, or Princes strong drinke, lest he drinke and forget the Decree, and change the iudgement of all the children of affliction. And yet we reade, that the Kings of Egypt were permitted to drinke wine, so it were moderately, and in a certayne measure.

Vpon a time, Romulus being then King of Rome, and invited to a bountifull banquet; he would drinke but very little wine, saying, To morrow I am to determine a matter of great importance. Ancien sayth, In giuing children wine to drinke, it is an aduision of fire to fire. Aristotle expressly forbod the giuing of wine to children, and likewise to the Nurseries that gaue them sucke. Plato by the laws which he made in his Booke, for the common-wealth, although he seemes in the first booke, to admit a tolleratiue of wines, yet in the second he sayth, A man ought to drinke a little, and well qualified. This allowance stretcheth not to any one, till he had attained to 18. yeares of age, and so to continue till hee were forty: but it must be alwayes doone in the presence of folde men, to the end that he might be reprooued, when in the least manner hee exceeded. From forty yeares vpward, hee permitted that a little more then hee had formerly demanded, should be giuen him; to make the colde and melancholy disposition (of that age) the more temperate; and yet it must be doone in a certayne measure too. It was his charge also, that seruants should drinke no wine, neither Iudges, Magistrates, or any that held any publike iurisdiction: and as for young men that studied, he aduised them, not to drinke any. Ancien alloweth Plato's law, in this poynt, as a rule for Phisicke: And thereto likewise Galen consenteth. Alexander Aphrodisiens sayth in his Problemes, Hee which drinkeeth nothing but water onely, hath his sight and other senses more liuely, then he that drinkeeth wine.

Now, as concerning in what fashion and maner, wine should be tempered and qualified; there are many rules, and diuers

ities of opinions. Hesiodus the Greek Poet saith, That in one quart of wine there should be three quarts of water mingled. Athenius sayth, that the ancient Greekes vsed to put five partes of water into two partes of wine, and most times three partes of water, into one of wine, which is the rule of Hesiodus. Heere also is to be obserued, that the Greekes did not put water into their wine, but wine into water, and Theophrastus assureth vs, that by this way, both the one and the other are much the better mingled. Morauer, ancient men did not onely moderate wine in this manner, but albeit it was thus tempered, they would drinke very little thereof. Eubulus the Greece Poet doth affirme, introducing Bacchus, to speake thus vnto the Sages: I will neuer make more then three gistes of wine: The first, for health: The second, for taste: And the third, for sleep; therewith saureth of disorder and drunkenness. Apuleius Panastus, who wrote of meates, deliuereth the like Iudgement, attributing this manner to three feuerall daughters. The first, to the Graces: The second, to Venus: And the third, to shame and danger. Julius Caesar was very temperate in drinking wine: as Suetonius witnesseth by the testimony of Cato, who was vter enemy to Caesar. Demosthenes, the excellent Oratour, was the like. And Apollonius Thyaneus of whom so many famous things are written, did neuer drinke any Wine, or feede vpon flesh.

In our Christian Religion, temperance (in drinking) is much commended. Saint Iames the lesler, did neuer drinke wine, or strong drinke, nor did euer eate any flesh; imitating Saint Iohn the Baptist. Wee finde the like affirmed of Saint Stephen, King of Portuzall. Iosephus in his Antiquities commending the holiness of the Essians, (who helde one of the three Sects amongst the Iewes, whereof the other two were Pharises and Saducees) sayth: That the Essians did neuer drinke wine. In an Epistle Saint Hierome reprooued Priests, that addicted themselves to drinke wine, telling them, That Saint Paul the Apostle did forbid it, and that in the ancient Law, such as serued in the Temple, did not drinke wine, or any other drinke that might procure drunkenness.

Such as are reamed good drinkers, vse to say, that good wine ought to haue foure properties, to answere foure fences or vnderstandings of the body: To the taste, by sauiour: To the smell, by a perfect odour: To the sight, by a neat and cleare colour: And to the care, by a good report of the Countrey where it was made. Of this good wine men vse to make vineger, which hath many good properties and inconueniences likewise: wherein I will be silent, because they are matters too vulgar and common.

CHAP. XXII.

Of many dammages and daungers, which ensue by the immoderate drinking of wine. And how it hath bene held as a healthfull thing (by some Phisitions) to be drunke sometimes.

Although the liquor called Wine, be apt and whole some for diuers infirmities: yet notwithstanding, so many harmes and annoyances do arise, from the excessive immoderate taking thereof, that the euills doe superabound all the goods ensuing thereby. So that it appeareth, that it were better not to know it, but rather to content our selues with water, which God hath giuen vs for our drinke; because hee thought nothing meete for vs, and all other creatures doe well content themselves therewith. Heereto also may be added, that wine hath bene the onely occasion, by which many haue become distracted in their senses; some haue lost their liues, and others not meanely endangered the saluation of their soules.

Now, although the harmes ensuing to men (by Wine) are too apparently knowne: yet notwithstanding, they are so far from thinning & auoyding them, that they daily seeke after new occasions, and strange deuised appetites for drinking. And in our best French language, these new appetites are tyled by some;

Four feuerall properties necessarily required to be in good wine.

All creatures but man onely doe well content themselves with the drinking of water.

New deuises lately inuenced to procure appetite for drinking.

A spur or prouocation to a cup of wine; by others, A thooing horne, to draw on a quart or two of good wine, so that a llice of a Gambone of Bacon, is held (in this case) for a precious relique, and few hours in the day or night doth passe ouer them, but the cup is kist with found deuotion in drinking; sometimes taking five or sixe cups more then are necessary. Pliny saith, eth, there are some men, who will drinke before they be thirstie, and wine onely (among all other drinckes) hath this property, to cause it selfe to be drunke, before a man haue any need of it. He saith moreover, that some do drinke in such sort as they iustly deserue, for it giues them (immediately) the due punishment to such sinners: for the vapour mounting vp into the braine, bereaueth them of all vnderstanding, so that they remaine as men senselesse. And hauing plaid it off lustily (as they vse to tearme it) for some quantity of time: it plaith with them as the Cat doth with the Mouse, either kills them outright, or (at least) engendereth so many harmes and infirmities, as are much worse then death it selfe: as Gouts, Palles in the head, hands and feete, imbrodering the eyes with a scarlet coulor, burning vp the Liuer, and scuring the face, beside diuers other such vndecent and scarce-gracefull qualities, no way fit to be vsed among men indeed.

Cato said, Drunkenness is a voluntary folly. And Pliny saith, it confoundeth the memory, and procureth dreadfull dreames. Seneca, writing to Lucullus, saith Wine maketh the legges and armes impotent, and causeth men to become luxurious. Dyonisius Areopagita, alleading Plato to haue spoken the words, saith: Drunkenness is a luscious and merry Minstrill, and yet it makes our legges to faile vnder vs, giuing (as wee vse to say in France) a strip to our heeles, and lying vs along on the ground. Saint Paul writing vnto the Ephesians, aduised them to shunne wine, because therein is luxury. And Salomon in his Proverbs, among the imperfections of wine, saith; It is a deceiver, and whoeuer drinketh excessively thereof, cannot conceale a secret faithfully. Heereupon then arose the ancient Proverbe; That wine walketh without any shoes; that is to say, It treadeth secretly, softly, and without any noyse, because no one should perceiue the power thereof, nor how it discovereth our secret and vicious qualities. To this purpose the Poet Aeschylus saide: A Glasse or Mirrow maketh knowne the gestures of the body, and wine serueth as a Glasse to the soule & heart of a man. Plato likewise said: Wine principally laith open the manner and conditions of euery man. We haue example thereof in Noah and Lot, for Noah being drunk with wine, discovered his parts of shame, whereby he became mocked and scorned. And against Lot, Sodom could haue no power; but wine ouercame him, & made him to lye with his owne Daughters: these are the benefits ensuing by wine.

Among the Lawes which Salomon one of the seven graue Sages of Greece gaue to the Athenians, it was especially ordained, that the Prince, when hee became drunke, should be slaine. Pittacus, another of those wise men, ordained, that a drunken man committing any delict or great offence, should bee doubly punished: once for the fault it selfe, and next for drunkenness, which caused him to do it.

Aristotle in his Problems, yeeldeth areason, why such men as are ouer-much addicted to wine, are greatly disable in the begetting of children: and likewise, why some drunkards are very pleasant in their drinke; and others terrible, some sad and weeping, others iocund and dancing.

Neuertheless, some Physitions (among who are Aesculap and Rasis) haue helde opinion, that it is a wholesome thing to be drunke sometimes: but the reasons which they giue in this case, doth not content me any way, neither doe I allow of their opinion. And yet I must needs confesse, that very great personages haue bene subiect to wine: whereas on the contrary, if they had stood cleare and free from it, their glory and renowne had bin farre greater.

Alexander the Great, was as greatly taxed with this vice, so that (as diuers good Historians doe affirme) being ouercome with this fury; he slew one of his most intimate friends; and comming (afterward) to acknowledgement of his fault, he would haue slaine himselfe. Beside, it is further alledged, that the cheefest cause of his murders and slaughters, was onely this poyson to all goodnesse.

The Emperour Tiberius was defectiue in many things; but in regard hee was a great drinke, it was the sole cause of all his other imperfections: and whereas his name was Tiberius, as a nick-name, they would often call him Biberius, and his ende was miserable.

Dionysius the younger, a Tyrant of Sicily, was so extremely affected to wine; that it did eate his eyes, and made him to become stark blinde. Cleomedes, King of the Spartans, would needs purifie and imitate the Scythians, in excessive drinking of wine: but in the end, he became a foole, quite insensate, and without iudgement. It is saide, that the Philosopher Aeschylus died in notorious drunkennesse.

The Poet Anacreon was a very great drinke, and as he was drinking, he strangled or choaked himselfe, with the stone of a Grape or Raisin, which entred into his throat vnaquiescibly.

Flaminius the Bishop, an Historian of worthy credite, writeth, that the Emperour Bonifacius was so addicted to wine, that Aurelianus said of him: Hee was not borne to lye, but to drinke. And heerein hee had an admirable quality, for notwithstanding the immeasurable quantity of wine, which he dranke daily, yet hee was neuer drunke. I guesse that this ensued, by his continuall auoydance of vrine, which went from him as fast, as hee tooke in his wine. Neuertheless, his ende was auersable to his deservings, for being vanquished by the Emperour Probus, he was hanged or strangled. It is recorded, that King Antiochus, who was conquered by the Romans, vsed to drinke so much wine, that he slept the most part of his time. In regard whereof, he gaue the cheefest authority of his kingdomes government, to two of his choyest fauourites, and because himselfe was addicted to banquets, and the amorous embracings of a young Gentlewoman: when he came to fight a-

Athenius writeth, that Aeschylus the Greeke Poet, would diuers times be drunke, whereupon Sophocles said vnto him, Aeschylus, those things which thou doste or writest, are done by chance, or at aduenture: and not by any knowledge remaining in thee, or that thou dost rightly vnderstand them.

CHAP. XXIII.

Certaine aduises and instructions, against such forward affection to Wine. And some reasons deliuered, why two things doe appeare to bee three, to such as bee drunke.

Some haue said (how certainly I know not) that there are diuers receipts, whereby Wine, in how great a quantity soeuer it be taken and drunke, shall not procure those yke some effects, which are related in the former Chapter.

Pliny and Solinus do both of them affirme, that there is a blacke Stone, hauing Vermillion couloured veynes in it, and named Dionise, which hath such a property, as if it bee layde in water, it yeeldeth the perfect saueur and relish of wine; and whoeuer drinketh of that water, euen so much as himselfe pleaseeth, shall neuer be drunke therewith. Physitions say, that if a man will preuent drunkenness, he must first eate Honye, or some other sweete things: And hee that is drunke, must be urged to vomite, and then giue him a morsell of bread steeped in Honye, which will immediately recouer him, because Honye hindereth all vapours from ascending vpe into the Head.

admirable physick, to preferue him from being drunke, albeit he daily drank more wine then any other one man of his time: for he could not drinke all commers, yet neuer be drunke, or bereft of his iudgement. But in the ende it was knowne, that (visually) before hee entred drinking, he would eate hie or fixe bitter almonds, whose power and naturall property was such, as it impeached the wine from alienating his spirits. And experience thereof was afterward made, for when they abridged him from the meanes of eating bitter Almonds, and he vsing to drinke as formerly he did, he became as soon drunke as any other man. That these Almonds haue this peculiar property, Pliny affirmeth it, adding further: that eating a Radish route before hard drinking, auoideth drunkenness. He saith also, that Colewortes eaten before hand, keepeth a man from being disordered with wine: and being eaten after drunkenness, they remove instantly the distemperature, as Saffron also hath the selfe-same power. There are many other remedies for this imperfection, wherein I will be silent, speaking onely of one, recited by Pliny. He saith, that taking a quantity of wine, mingled with the egges of a Chough, and being drunke two or three mornings together, he that drinketh it, will hate wine in such fort as he will neuer after drinke thereof. Heere to he addeth, that a Swallow being taken and burned to ashes, then beaten into powder and mingled with a little Myrrine in the wine; whosoever receyueeth a draught of this porion, shall neuer be drunke, for this was experimented by Horus, King of Affryia.

Aristotle, in the third part of his Problems, and Auicenne, in his sixt Booke of Beasts, do yeeld a reason, why in drunkenness, when a man locketh vpon any one thing, it appears to him as if it were two, and albeit they doe both produce diuers reasons, yet will I alledge but one from each of them. The first shall be Aristoteles, who saith, that thorow excessive heat of vapours in the wine, ascending vp into the brayne; the little nerues, called Optici nerui*, which go on directly to the eyes, do worke and mooue with such power, that the visall vertue, and the spirits of sight (altering in their motion) do cause whatsoeuer drunken men gaze on, to stirre very strongly and quicke; because the Organe of sight moueth it selfe in that manner, and maketh the common sense to receiue the Images of things, in a multiplyed quality to the eye. For such kinde of motion, maketh single things to seeme double, and because this motion is so sudden and insensible, it causeth two things to seeme as one to the sight. As any man may easily make tryall of; by laying his finger vpon his eye-lid, and then removing it thence, it will appeare to him, that it is the thing remoueth it selfe, which he beholdeth. Auicenne deliuereth another reason, saying: *The vapours of wine, which ascend vnto the head of him that is drunke, are moist, and because the little nerues and muscles which reach to the eyes, doe engrosse or swell themselves by this humidity, so much more the one (then the other) doe thereby mount themselves the one higher, and the other lower. From hence ensueth, that the visible rayes do not equally diuide themselves forth-right from both the eyes, neither by a direct or right line: which is the cause, that the Images of things visible, doe extend to either eye by themselves. In this respect only, things simple and single, appeare to be double, the common sense receyuing & apprehending two Images for one: and for the maintenance of this opinion, Auicenne yeeldeth the selfesame example, as Aristotle did.*

required to be well apprehended. Neuertheless, I am the more willing to speake somewhat of the argument, onely for the delight and contentment of such mindes, as are inclined to the Science whereof it discourseth. Wherefore concerning our present purpose, it is needfull to presuppose, the first and chiefe Elements of such a Science: which because they are common, shall require the lesse labor to proue them. The first is that whereof wee are now treating, the greatnesse of the earth, carrying with it both Land and Sea: because God did dispose them in such manner, for when he said; Let the dry Land appeare, they both being united together, made one body perfectly round. So likewise it is to be vnderstoode in all those actions which are giuen to the earth, the Sea is also therein comprized: For, when a man saith, the earth hath so many degrees in roundnesse, or it containeth so many degrees from one place to another; the sea is therein as well vnderstood as the land. So in like manner are considered the Ecclypses, heights and breadths, to hold one and the same certitude: and yet notwithstanding, Mountaines, and Valleys are not comprehended in this roundure, nor Woodes or Forrests likewise, which the earth containeth in it selfe; because such things are not wortheie of any account, with the greatnesse of this wonderful bodie.

This rotundity of Land and Water, is seated in the midst of the circuite of Heauen, in such manner, as the point & center of that round body, composed of Sea and Land, is likewise the center and number of the whole world, as well of heauen, as of the Elements.ouer and beside this definition, there is another, true and absolute, to wit, that the land and water (in regard of the starry heauen, which we call the Firmament) are so little; that all these two Elements liewe thereto but for a center, and is cuted but as a small point, in respect of his circumference. So that in whatsoever part thereof a man best liketh to helpe himselfe, by meanes of a Quadrant or an Astrabe; his labour fortheth to the like effect, as if hee made the same for the center of the earth. For in whatsoever place of the earth we are (provided that it be not in any deepe or hollow bottom) we shall discouer the moiety of hea-

uen; which proceedeth by reason of the incomprehensible distance, that is from hence beneath vp to the Firmament, with his incomparable greatnesse. That this must needs be true, it is most euident, that the verie least Starre which we discern in heauen, is much more greater then the whole earth; and yet neuertheless, it appeareth to vs but as a small point, in regard of the heauens large spaciousnesse; by the least of which things, a man may make prooue in sufficient demonstration, but it sufficeth that experience hath apparently shewne the same.

Platony approacheth it, in the 10. chapter of his first booke of Geography, Alphraganus, in his fourth Difference, Cleomedes, in his first Booke; Geber, in his second Booke; and John de Sacroboscio, as the like do all other that haue written on the Spherae.

This then being thus presupposed, let vs imagine in our mindes, that the vvater and Land do make one round circle, and that heauen is another, but much more great, as indeede it is; and that these two circles haue no other, but one common center within them. Vvich being so imagined, let vs lay two lines of equal greatnesse, which may extend themselves (in common) to the circumferences of all the two circles, according as Euclides enstrueth, cutting and diuiding the two Circles by equal portions, each portion being iustly equalled, in regard of each one of them: that is to say, that if those two lines passe on right in such manner, they will make eight parts of a great circle, and so shall make as much of the lesser, I vnderstand and meane each eight part, in respect of each ones greatnesse.

Our elders in former times, in their manner of measuring the world, gaue aduice to diuide the heauen into three hundred and threescore equal partes, which we do now cal degrees, & by consequent, the roundnesse of the earth into as manie parts, by imaginations of lines, parting from the center, and making the diuision in such manner, that the like quantitie which each one of the degrees hath, in respect of the whole heauen; the verie like shall be that of each one of the degrees for the earth, having regard to the roundure and circuite thereof. And as these portions or degrees, if you please so to terme them, then, are equal among themselves, so that some one may appeare to containe the scope of miles; the like may be easily gathered, by multiplying what distance is contained in all the rest. To know then the nature of a degree, they made this obseruation. The Pole is a fixed point in heauen, whereon the whole heauen maketh his mouing, yet it remaineth firme & stable. Therefore with an Astrolabe, or any other instrument proper thereto, being in some apt vncovered place, they would take the height which the Pole contained about the Horizon, within the limite of the selfsame sight, and noting the place which appeared conuenable to the elevation or height of the foresaide Pole: they went directly on thereto, without wandering to the Meridian, vntill such time (as with the selfsame instrument) they found it in one degree more higher, then in the first place, and therby they knew, that they had gone one degree of the earth fro that place whence they first parted, iust to that ground where they were arrived, considering, that they had paced by the respect of heauen, in regarde of the fore-named rules of both the circles. Then they would measure that which this degree contained, either by Stades, or thousands of paces; and this being thus knowne by them, they would make their account after this manner. If one degree contained so many miles, the whole roundnes of the earth did containe as many: considering, that therein was to be obserued three hundred and threecore degrees, such and as great as the same were. This was the forme and manner by them obserued, and it may well bee continued to these times, for measuring of the whole earth, as being the most certaine and infallible.

And yet neuertheless we are to know, what greatnesse each degree of the earth containeth in it selfe, and so (by consequent) how much it tendeth to in the roundity, measuring it according vnto the whole greatnesse, answerable to the experience of both ancient and modern men, skilfull, and well studied therein. The most common opinion of all other, is; that each degree or portion of three hundred and threecore, containeth five hundred Stades of ground, and euery Stade is valued to six score and five paces by our Geometricians, and according to they

Geometrical paces, each pace containing as much as two of our common paces. So that the degree containes sixty two thousand and an halfe, which amount to sixtie two thousand Geometrical paces. Ptolemy auoucheth the same; as the like doeth Martianus Capellus, and the most part of the wisest ancient Cosmographers: beside, this is the opinion in common, of the greater part of our moderne men.

Orontius Phineus holdeth the same iudgment, and sayeth, that this may easily bee experimented by traualing from Paro to Tolowse, Glareanus, & Anthony de Lebris, being both of them learned men, and diligent searchers into these matters: they do both affirme, that they haue made the like experience, holding the same for most certaine. Albeit Erastophilus, and some other Græcians hold opinion, that all degrees had seauen hundred Stades: wherein (it may seeme) they were abused, by measuring their places ouershort. I say then, that each of their degrees, consisting of three hundred and sixty, far off from five hundred Stades: the whole three hundred and sixty, will containe together, twenty two thousand, and five hundred thousand paces, which do make an hundred and eighty thousand Stades. By the which account, the round compas of the whole earth, comprehending therein the whole machine of water, being reduced to a thousand paces, will containe twentie two millions, and five hundred thousand paces. And if you would know how many French leagues or miles the whole Earth containeth, we must then allow vnto each League, the length of two Italian miles. Then, if we diuide twenty two thousand, five hundred paces in twaine, we shall find that the circuite of the earth, containeth cleuen thousand, two hundred and fiftie Leagues of France. And if we diuide the by foure; all the enuironing of the Earth, will containe five thousand, sixe hundred, and twentie five miles of Germanie; for four Italian miles, do make but one Germanie mile. Thus haue we discoursed of the earths dimension, according vnto the most common opinion receiued among men.

CHAP. XXVI.

Of the reason, why Snow (being couered with straw) doth preferre it selfe in his entire coldnesse, and warme water in his heate: considering, that two contrary effects are wrought by one and the selfsame thing: with some other secrets beside.

O men of spirit, such as affect the contemplation of Natures workes, nothing can so lightly present it self, or appeare to bee of so slender esteeme; but some one notable matter or other may be found therein, to yield contentment to their mindes, after they haue attained to the knowledge thereof. No doubt but there are many men, of whom if it were demanded, vpon what occasion, Snow (being couered with straw) conferreth it selfe (for long time) in his true coldnesse, and without melting, they hardly knew how to make anie answer. Whereunto Alexander Aphrodisæus, that excellent Peripateticus, maketh this reply. Straw hath no manifest or known quality at all, for it is neither hot nor colde; therefore diuers haue reputed and termed it, to be a thing without any quality. For this cause, being a matter so singularly temperate and delicate, euen as reaching to such a degree, that it may well be saide to be neither hot nor colde; it easily conuerteth it selfe into the quality of anie such thing, as is thereto annexed. So that coeuering or laying Snow therein, which is colde, the straw apprehendeth the colde quality thereof, and by that means is holpen and assisted, in the true coldnesse of Snow: euen as a thing of one qualitie aydeth another, without yielding any heate thereto, because it is not in it selfe. Therefore, snow being accompanied with his owne coldnesse, & defended against heat, which straw preferueth against the left entrance; it is thus conserued in his entire condition for long time, euen as if it were not couered with straw at all.

By the selfsame reason, a contrarie effect happeneth in warme or hotte water; defending the ayre that it cannot coole it, for it being likewise couered with Strawe, the straw immediately entereth the quality of the warme water; and being so sodainly heated, it helpeth & conferueth the water in his warmth, and keepeth the ayre off, that else would coole it. The same reason guides vs to vnderstand other doubts and difficulties, which some curious questionists may impose vpon vs, like vnto those before alledged. I am sure wee are not to learn, that ouer and beside our inward naturall heate, that which occasionally our warmnesse in Summer time, is the ayre onely, which (in that season) is much more hot then in any other time of the year; so that the warmer the ayre is, so much the more are we sensible of heat. If it be so then, how cometh it to passe, that we feele more freshnesse and coolenesse, and lesse heate, when wee take the ayre in Sommer, and in mouing and walking to receiue it; considering, that (according to Aristotles Motion, or mouing, causeth our heate to be the greater? For the ayre, by reason of this agitation, must needs cause the more warmnesse both in it selfe and vs, then if wee rested and sate in quiet.

The reason ensueth thus: VVee haue then more warmth in our bodies, then there is in the ayre: as wel in regard of our owne naturall heat, as also that which the ayre worketh in vs. For the ayre coming with a fresh and coole gale (I speake this because it is more temperate then we are) it maketh vs some-what the more temperate: but being still and neere vs, it warmeth it selfe in our heate. Euen in the like manner as we haue spoken of straw; for so it conferueth (yea augmenteth) our heate in vs; albeit, when it is stirred, and freshly moued, in comming more temperately vpon vs, then we our selues are; that temperature and difference which wee then feele of lesse heate, doth in the like manner qualifie and moderate ours in vs. This is the answer of the fore-named Alexander, but especially of Aristotle, vnto this question.

Neuertheless, it is to bee noted, that if we find an ayre more hot then that wherein we dwell; agitation or stirring in such an ayre will not prouoe so good as our owne, because wee shall there feele farre greater heate, as in diuers places oftentimes we do. An argument in this case, may may bee framed by hotte water, that if a man put his hand rashly thoreinto, he can hardly suffer or endure it. Notwithstanding, let him hold it firmly therein, and it yeeldeth then lesse cause of passion then if he moued it vp and downe. In regard, that the lesse part of the water environeth the coole hand, whereby it causeth some small temperature round about it: but being plunged and moued about the water, it reneweth fresh heate, and at each time approprieth new power to it selfe; for the more potent, must needs worke nouelly vpon that which is much weaker.

It may be likewise demanded, for what cause it is more hot at the end of Iune, & all along the moneth of Iuly, the Sun being then the furthest off from vs, then it is at the beginning of Iune; considering we are then in the Solstice of the Sunne, and more directly smitten with his beames? Heereunto answereth Aristotle, in his second Booke of Meteors, and the ninth Chapter, that the heate of the Sunne is not the cause thereof, neither is there any more heate felt by the Sunnes being neerer to vs, then when hee hath longest time to abide ouer vs. For in the months of Iune and Iuly, hee hath a great length of time in approaching towards vs; as also in declining, hee causeth the greater heate, because (in descending) hee heareth that part and tract of the ayre, which hee formerly had well warmed in mounting aloft.

CHAP. XXVII.

Of fodaine death hapning vnto diuers great Persons, that haue thereto bene wisied or threatened, by such as they haue committed put to death before, and their deaths haue ensued to them in such manner, & at such times, as haue bene assigned vnto them: With the notable history of an Archibishop of Mentz or Magonce.

God neuer failed in the last cause of wronged innocents, to lend his help, when a power in man hath failed.

When all helpe in man hath ceased, concerning such to whom great wrongs and injuries haue bene done; yet the powerfull arme of God hath neuer failed them. And albeit it hath not ensued so speedily, or else so visibly as they could haue wisied; yet GOD, who knoweth both how and when to be auenged on them that are the oppressors of innocents, hath wrought so graciously for his own glory; that trecheries haue come to light in due and meete times, & mens false iudgements haue felt his seuerer condemnation, and publicly enough for other mens forewarning. In this case wee could alleadge many memorable examples; but being loth to trouble you with ouer many, these few commendable Collections shall serue for this time.

I read of a Knight amongst the Templers (of whom wee haue spoken in our former Volume) who being (in the opinion of many) sentenced to death verily; as the Officers led him towards the place of execution, hee espyed Pope Clement, the fift of that name (by whole meanes he was condemned to death) looking out at a window; and by him stoode Philippe Bel, then King of France. The Knight being an Italian, borne at Naples, beholding the Pope with an vndanted countenance, with a lowde voyce spake thus vnto him.

Most cruel Clement, seeing that there is no Iudge in this world, before whom a poore innocent man may call in question the vniuersall sentence which thou hast given against mee. I appeale from thee, a most vniuersall Iudge, to the vprightest Iudge of all other, Iesus Christ himselfe, before whom I giue thee warning, and likewise King Phillip there by thee, to make your appearance, to answer the false iudgement of death which you haue given against mee. This appearance of yours before the Tribunal seat of God, I do assigne to be made within lesse then a yeare, to do me right there, where I may safely haue my cause determined, without any avarice or passion at all, as here you both haue dealt with me. The poore Knights desire sorted with his wordes, for about the same limited time, the Pope being pained with a great greife in his stomack, died; so did King Phillip: but how soeuer it hapned, it was thought to proceed from the iust iudgement of God.

The very like fortune hapned to Ferdinand the fourth, King of Castile, who hauing caused two worthy Knights to be executed, more by his owne wrathfull & angry spleen, then any warrant of iustice, being being no way to bee dissuaded from this violent cruelty, either by teares, intreats, or earnest solicitations; they (in very like manner) cited the King before the Tribunal of Iesus Christ, and to make his appearance within thirty dayes. And it is credibly auouched, that on the last of those thirty dayes, the King dyed.

The like lot also befell to a Captain of the Gallies, which belonged to the inhabitants of Geneway, whereof Baptista Fulgoso maketh this report. This Capitaine making a falli forth vpon the Sea, tooke a Foyst or small Gally appertaining to them of Cathelagna; wherein there was another Capitaine that neuer had done any iniurie to the Geneweyes. Notwithstanding, in regard of the malice which the Geneweyes bare to the Cathelagnians, hee gaue command, that this Capitaine thus taken prisoner, should forthwith be hanged. The Capitaine, shedding many teares, humbly requested, that he might not so shamefully be put to death, considering that he had neuer offended him, or his Nation. But in the end, finding no fauour or mercy in him, he made his recourse to the Diuine Iudge of all men, speaking thus to the cruell Capitaine; Seeing thou wilt needs execute on me this most vniuersall sentence, I haue no other friend but God to appeale vnto, who is the iust auenger of injured innocents. And therefore I humbly desire, that (this instant day) thy soule may appeare with mine before him, to yeeld an account for the wrong thou hast done me. Not many houres, after the Geneway Capitaine also dyed, and doubtlesse went to render a reason for his most extreme cruelty.

I could alleadge many examples more, aptly fitted to this purpose; but for the strangest of all, I will relate what hapned at Magonce or Mentz in Germany, which generally cost most deare vnto the whole City, according as it is briefly reported by Gontier, that renowned Poet, who wrote the life and actions of the Emperour Fredericke, first of that name. Conradus also the Byshop, declareth the same in his history, among many things hapning in the time of that Fredericke, and of Henrie the sixt his sonne; the History enueth in this manner.

In the City of Magonce or Mentz in Germany, in the yeare one thousand, five hundred and fifty, little more or lesse, ther liued an Arch Byshop, named Henrie, a man singular in all vertues. This Arch-bishop, according to the duty and office of a faithfull Pastor, as indeed hee was, did seuerely chastise publike sinnes and offences, because he was very ialous of Gods honour, and lone of one neighbour vnto another, the which made him to haue the greater care of his flocke. Heere vpon wicked and dissolute persons grewe hateful against him, desiring many false and slanderous accusations, where-with the Pope was plentifully informed, imposing so many crimes and delicts vpon him, that he was reputed vnnecesse for such a dignity.

These matters thus vnderstoode by the Pope, who alwayes thought him to bee a iust and holy man; being no way able to deny audience to such a crowde of accusations as desired iustice; at last he aduersified the Arch-bishop of these foule accusations. The good reuerend man, to make cleare his innocence, elected (among all his other friends) a man whom hee most affected, and on whom hee had bestowed more speciall fauours, then on any man else beside. Hee was a Priest by profession, named Arnolde, advanced vnto many great dignities, as being a man of rich spirit, eloquence, and abounding in the wealth of the world beside.

Arnolde coming to Rome, being instructed and pressed on by the diuell, concluded in his priuate thoughts, to deprive his Lord of so high a dignitie, and make application thereof to himselfe. Which that he might the better compass, hauing brought great summes of money thither with him, hee suborned two wicked Cardinals, who, in stead of speaking in his Lords fauour, should enforce all matters more against him. For they affirmed, that they stoode more obliged to God and truth, then to worldly respects or fauours of men; and therefore maintained, that the Arch-bishop was apparently culpable of all the crimes inferred against him, and thereby iustly deserved deprivation. The Pope being thus abusively perswaded by their report, thought to haue sent two Priestes thither, to acquaint him with this information confirmed against him: but (indeede) he sent the two Cardinals conferred with Arnolde, to perfect the Proceffe, by them concluded for present execution.

Arch-bishop.

They were no sooner arrived in Germany, but they summoned the Arch-Bishop to come before them, where his hearing was admitted in such sort, that sentence was given against him, whereby he was deprived of his See and dignitie, and Arnolde advanced into his place, who had sold his Master, even as Indas did our blessed Saviour. In pronouncing the judgement, the Arch-Bishop Henry then present, delivered these wordes. God knoweth, that I am most uniuersally condemned: neuertheless, I care not for making any appeale to the further censure of men: because I am assured, that I shall bee better beleued among you, then truth can be in mee. Therefore I receive this sentence, as some iust punishment for my sinnes, and yet doe appeale from your iudgement, to the eternal iust iudge Iesus Christ: before whom I asswaine you three to appeare.

These wordes were no sooner heard by the Iudges, but they fell into extremity of laughter, saying; That if he pleased to go on thither before, they would follow him at their leysure. This sentence was given in the yeare one thousand, five hundred, sixty six, which the deprived Arch-bishop endured with admirable patience; & being retired into his Monastery, he there remained the rest of his life, yet without acceptance of the habite. To conclude, God would not permit this wickednes to passe unpunished, to the end, that innocence might the better bee knowne: but about a yeare and an halfe after, this Henric dyed in his Monastery in great holinesse, and doublelesse attained the glorie long time desired.

Newes of his death being brought to Rome, the two Cardinals being very merrily met together, one of them, said: The Arch-Bishoppe Henry is gone, and must not we in haste follow him? Indeed (quoth the other) so wee made him promise; but let him tarry (wherefore he is) till wee come to him. Not many dayes after, one of them, being sodainly smitten by one of his seruants vpon the shoulder, fell downe so greuously afflicted with paine, that his bowels and entrailes issued out at his fundament, and instantly died. The other falling into phrensie and madnesse, did cate off his owne hands, and dyed very strangely. Now as concerning false Arnolde, hee exercised such cruelties and seditions among the people, that he became so hated and despised of them all; as being one day besieged in a Monastery, hee was there slayne, and afterward left lying naked in the common ditch of the Citie; where all the people, both men, women, and children, performed all cruelties vpon his body, that possibly could be deuised by them.

CHAP. XXVIII.

Of the cruelty which Alboutine, King of Lombardie, vsed to his Queene & wife Rosamond: And by what meanes he reuenged her selfe on him as length.

Among those warlike people, which issued out of Germany, and the Northern partes, to descend into Italy; the Longobards are named, who for the space of two hundred yeares & more, seized all those Lands, which (till this day) is called Lombardie, and vntill such time as Charlemaigne expelled them thence, according as in the History is amply related, written by Paulus Diaconus, in the particular Booke which he made for that purpose. He saith, that when they left Hungary (where they had for sometime dwelt) to passe into Italy, they had one named Alboutine their King: a man of great spirit, and verie valiant in actions of warre. For he conquered in battayle Cunimon, King of the Girpides, and afterwards, causing his head to bee smitten off, made a drinking Cuppe thereof, wherein hee vsed to drinke, and in triumph of his conquest and victorie. At what time, he detained (as his prisoner) a verie beautiful daughter to the fore named King, called Rosamond, whom he made his wife, and then afterwards hee went to subdue Italy, carrying his Queene along with him, in the yeare, eight hundred, sixty two.

When he had conquered many towns and Cities, he came (at length) to the City of Paulis: where (since that time) the succeeding Kinges vied to keepe their leate and continuall residing, as the very principall City of their Kingdome. Having reig-reigned three yeares and three moneths, and being then at Verona; he appoynted a solemn feast, where hee drunke to his Queene in the Cuppe made of her fathers head, and forced her to pledge him: whereat shee conceived such griefe and displeasure, that the intire loue which shee had formerly borne him, was converted into deadly hatred, with an absolute resolute and conclusion to kill him, in iust reuenge of her fathers death, & cruelty extended to her. And to assist her in this determination, she conferred with a gentleman named Hermigilde: who presently tolde her, that to the execution of such an important busines, she should require the ayde of a valiant knight in the Court, called Paradine. Which instantly hee did, but he would not yeeld thereto, because hee tooke it to be too horrid a treason. Finding her hope frustrated, and fearing lest his intent would be discovered, yet desiring nothing more in the world, then to compass the height and pitch of her enterprize: she set aside all care of honour and honesty, & being advertised by Hermigilde, that Paradine earnestly affected one of her attending Ladies, she desired thereby to effect her purpose. Being acquainted with the secret resort where Paradine & his louer alwaies met together; she found some other employment for the Lady, & made vse of her place for the time, Paradine keeping her there company a long time, imagining no other, but that it was the mistresse of his affections.

The Queene, who had spent all this while in soft whispers and dalliance, not vying any one word whereby shee might be discouered; perceiving opportunity to apply to fit her, spake thus vnto him. Knowest thou Paradine, who it is that keepeth thee company? Full well (quoth he) with my Mistresse, and then named her. Thou yest (false traytour,) replied the Queene, I am Rosamond thy Soueraignes wife, whom thou hast dared to abuse in this manner, and dye thou must by the iust wrath of Alboutine, except thou sauest thy life by killing him: aduise thee therefore, whether his life or thine owne is dearest to thee. When Paradine considered his dangerous estate, without any meanes of helpe or escape; hee resolved to kill the King: and for his better further-rance therein, both hee, the Queene, and Hermigilde tooke counsell together, plotting the proiect in this manner.

The King vsed to sleepe in the heate of the day, and all else auoyded the chamber, the Queene only excepted, and hee being a king of courage and high resolute, euer slept like a Souldier, with his Sword girded about him: which at this intended time of treason, the Queene had tyed so fast in the scabbard, as hee could by no meanes helpe himselfe therewith. Paradine and Hermigilde waiting the houre, which was vpon the Queenes issuing forth: they entred, and for all their foot treading, the King heard them, and started from his bed. VVhen he beheld two men armed with weapons, and at such a time of no suspicion: fury, not feare made him take no knowledge of them, but fought to defend himselfe with his weapon. VVhich failing him, by the meanes of so false a Queene, and they with their weapons euery where wounding him: hee caught vp a stoole, and therewith made his defence so long as he could, till in the end they deprived him of life, yet neither noise heard, nor any suspicion of murder.

The King being thus dead, and all well carried with a smooth countenance: Hermigilde possessed himselfe of the Palace, intending to make the Queene his wife, as immediately hee did. But notwithstanding all their close packing; the Lombards (not long after) came to the knowledge of their Kings death, and in what manner hee was murdered, which they purposed to reuenge with all possible speed. Wherein they were prevented, for Rosamond and her complices hauing packed vp most of her Jewells & treasure Royall, fled away thence, carrying with them Aluifinda Daughter to King Alboutine, his first wife. And for their safer security, they went to Rauenenna, where then governed a Lieutenant of the Empire, named Longinus, who kept that place for Tiberius, Sonne to the Emperour Constantine of Constantinople, by whom they were curteously entertained.

Not long after, Longinus becomming enamored of Rosamond, & desirous to enioy her in marriage, whereto he found her very tractable; counselled her to procure the death of Hermigilde, & then he would marry her. Shee that had lost all loue and

But when hee found it afterward to afflicke his body, so as he plainly perceiued himselfe to be poysoned; drawing forth his sword in extremity of rage, he compelled Rosamond to drinke vp all the rest that remayned in the Cup, so that at one instant time they both were iustly required for the death of Albaine. Tydings hereof being brought to the Lieutenant Longinus, he caused the young Lady Aluinda to be seized on, and sent her (with all her jewels and treasure) to the Emperour Tiberius, at Constantinople, with Paradise also as a prisoner: where hauing his eyes pulled forth, he liued a while, and then died most miserably.

CHAP. XXIX.

Of a pleasant, wistly, and honest deceit, which a famous and vertuous Queene used to her on husband, whereby Iames, King of Arragon was begotten, with other remembrances both of his birth and death.

LVVell remember, that in reading the Chronicle of the Kings of Arragon; I finde, that Don Peter, Count of Barcelona, who was the seventh King of Arragon, had Madam Mary in marriage, daughter to the Earle of Mount Pefulm. Nephew to the Emperour of Constantinople, the being a very beautiful and vertuous Lady. All which notwithstanding, the King was much addicted vnto other women, and vied such slender testimony of loue towards his Queene, that hee refused to keepe her company, as (in the duty of an husband) he stood obliged to doe. This strange behaviour in the King, did much afflicke and greene the Queene, because they had no childre to succeed in the Kingdome, the greatest misery (of all other) that can happen to a well settled Estate. Heerevpon, by aduice of one of the Kings Pages of his Chamber, who (it may be) had formerly done seruice in the like affaires; shee compassed the meanes (vnder title of some one of the Kings cheefe fauourites) to bee brought that night to lodge with the King. Such familiar entercourses hauing passed betwene them, as in such wanton seasons are commonly required, the King perceiuing the day-light neere approaching, in regard both of his owne honours safety and hers, made meanes to her for her speedy departure, but the taking hold of so good an occasion, spake thus vnto him.

My gracious Lord and husband, I am none such as (perhaps) you take mee to be, but hee well assured, that this night you haue slept with your true Queene and VVife. Vse what violence you shall please to mee, for I purpose not to leave your bed, vntill some man, well deseruing faith and credite, may be witness of my this nights keeping you company. To the ende, that if the fauour of heauen hath bin so gracious to me, that fruitie (long desired) may ensue by this aduventure; the world shal take true notice, that it is your owne. The King perceiuing this honest deceit of his Queene, appeared to bee well pleased therewith, and called two Gentlemen of his Chamber, to testifie the truth, according to her desire, and as (indeed) stood best with his honour. It so pleased God, that at six and conuenient time, the Queene hauing at that instant time conceived with child; at such due season as the custome of women alloweth them for trauaile, shee was deliuered of a goodly Sonne, euen on the first day of February, in the yeare one thousand, one hundred, ninety sixe. Soone after it was borne, the Mother caused it to bee carried to the Church, and (which is a thing deserving memory) as they which carried the childre entred into the Church, the Priests began to sing Te Deum laudamus, We praise thee O God. Passing from thence vnto another Church, as they were entring likewise therinto, the Priests began to sing the Psalme of Benedictus Dominus Deus Israel; Blessed be the Lord God of Israel, which gaue a great prognosticating & vndoubted hope, of some excellent vertues to succeede in the childre.

The Father and Mother, not knowing what name to giue him, caused twelue Torchcs (of equall length and making) to be allighted in one instant, the twelue Torchcs bearing the seuerall names of the twelue Apostles. With this conclusion, that the name of the Torch which first fayled, or became extinguished; the selfe-same name should bee giuen to the childre, which happened to be that of S. Iames. Heerevpon he was named Iames, because it was the name, which the men of Arragon gaue to that Apostle. Hee proued to be an excellent Prince, and of admirable gouernement, both in peace and warre, for hee made a cruell inuasion vpon the Moors, being much more very liberal to his Souldiers. Among other most notable matters, hee leuied a great Army, which he conducted into the Ile of Maioica, that then was in the Moors possession, where hee fought many stout batailles. But after he had a long while besiedged the City, he won it in the ende, and likewise other neighbouring Islands beside. Then coming into his kingdome of the Moors, especially to the City of Carthage, hee proued still the Conqueror, and neuer fayled in any of his attempts.

He had many children, as well sonnes as daughters, on whom (during his life time) he bestowed great gifts and goodly estates. Don Peter, that afterward was King of Arragon, was his Sonne. Likewise Don Iames, King of Maioica and Minorica. He had another that was Arch-bishop of Tolledo. Madame Tollant, who was Queene of Castile; and Madame Isabella that was Queene of France; and Madame Frayaga, who was married to Don Emmanell, Prince of Castile; and Don Peter, who espoused the daughter vnto the King of Nauarre. He liued seventy and two yeares, and dyed religiously, taking on him (before his death) the habite of a Monke. For he had a greuous discafe, which made him renounce his royall Scepter, with deliberate purpose, that if he might recouer his health againe, hee would employ the rest of his dayes in the seruice of God. But weaknesse encreasing more and more vpon him, he dyed in the City of Valencia, Anno 1266. and at the beginning of the Moneth of August.

CHAP. XXXII.

Of an ancient and memorable Custome, obserued by the Inhabitants of the Prouince of Carinthia, at the Coronation of their Prince: and how cruell their punishment is to Theeues.

POne Pius the second of that name, who was a man of great learning, & a diligent inquisition for the truth of Histories, as wee haue in many places formerly alleged, saith in his description of the world; that the Prouince of Carinthia, is enclosed within the territory, and vnder the gouernment of Austria. Hee likewise relateth a custome, which the Inhabitants of that Prouince haue anciently obserued, at the election and Coronation of their Princes; appearing somewhat strange, yet honest and very commendable. Vvhich custome is also confirmed by A. Sabellicus in his tenth Decade: and by Sebastian Munster, in his composed Cosmography, which is after this manner.

In this Prouince of Carinthia, there is a very great and spacious plaine of olde ruined buildings, which seeme to bee the foundation of some former auncient City.

In which place also there is a great stone, and when obedience is to be giuen at the new creation of a Prince; there is a day appointed, and a country labourer, or meane husbandman (allowed to this prehemience in regard of his lineage) hath order to seate himselfe vpon that same stone. standeth a poore Cow, that hath lately calued, which hee holdeth fastened by a corde, and on his left hand standeth a very leane and wretched Mare, tyed in like manner, and round about him is no meane crowd of labourers and country Boores. In this place, and at this Stone, the Prince that is to be entailed, must make his appearance, attended with a great number of men on horse-backe, ryding in very formal order, with twelue Banners borne before him: among which there is one more large and lightly then all the rest, carried by an Earle, thereto admitted by especiall priuledge.

The Arch-Duke, Prince or great Lord howsoever ye meane to tearme him, clothed in a Shepherds habite, commeth to the Stone wheron the poore man sitteth, & as he perceiue him to approach somewhat neere, hee demandeth with a loud voyce, what he is, that commeth towards him with such glory and felicity? Answer he instantly made him, that it is the man, who commeth to be created Prince of the Country. Then as it were with a voyce like thunder, the labourer cryeth out, Is he a iust Iudge? Will he wel maintaine iustice? Will hee preferre the defence and safety of this Country? Is hee a man franke, and free-borne? Is he valiant, vertuous, and worthy of honour and reuerence? Is he a Christian? Is hee a Defender of the faith of Iesus Christ? And all the company maketh answer, that he is such a man, and will so continue. Then hee beginneth againe, and maketh another demand, By what right or reason cometh he to dispossesse me of this place, which belongeth onely to me? To which question, the Earle that beareth the cheefest Standard, replyeth thus. If thou wilt quit and forsake this place, three score Ducates of gold shall be frankly giuen thee, & this Cow, as also this Mare shall both be thine owne, beside the rich Robe, which our King did last of all put off, shall also be thine: moreover, thou and thy family shall bee free, from paying any manner of tribute. After these words, the Prince approacheth neere to the Stone, & the poore man giueth him a gentle blow on the cheek, commanding him (in any case) to be a good Iusticer: & so descending from the Stone, he leadeth along with him the Cow and Mare, and departeth.

Then the Prince dismounting from his horse, ascendeth vp, and sitteth vpon the stone, where drawing forth his Sword, and turning to each side of the stone, still flourishing the weapon round about him; hee maketh a solemne promise before all the people, vttering the words as loud as he can speake, that he will be a iust Iudge, and a good Prince. This done, one bringeth him (in a Shepherds bonnet) a small quantity of water to drinke; and so descending from the stone, hee re-mounteth on horsebacke, and rydeth on to a Church with all his company, there to heare Mass. Which being finished, hee changeth his former plaine and rurall garments, to very Royall and Princely habites: and after a pompeous Dinner with his whole train, he returneth againe into the open field, where hee heareth all the Officers of Iustice speake vnto him, to entrust him in the lawes of the Country: and these are the vsuall ceremonies, obserued at the creation of every Prince.

There is another custome in vse among these people, for the punishment of thefts and robberies; which I hold to be vniust, and ouer-cruell, especially to bee vied among Christians. For hauing but some note or apprehension onely, that such a man standeth in repute to be a theefe; they forthwith send him to execution, without any other proceeding against him. Then three dayes after his death, they examine the witnesses with all care and diligence; when if it shall appeare by solemne inquisition, that he proueth to be guilty of the crimes alledged; they suffer him to hang vpon the Gibbet, vntill his limbes fall peece-meale from him. But if he be found to be innocent, they take him thence, and giue him honourable obsequies and funeral, with many prayers and almes-deeds, for the saluation of his soule.

With this severity doe they chastise theeues and robbers, neuertheless. I read of some other Nations, that greatly haue supported and countenanced them therein. As the Egyptians, of whom Aulus Gellius writeth in his Attick nights. And the Lacedaemonians likewise, who permitted their children to bee theeues, and learne climbing in at windowes, and wandering abroad in the night season, that they might be the more bolde and hardy for warre. Notwithstanding, Draco, hee that gaue

CHAP. XXXIII.

In what part of the Zodiacque the Sunne and Moone, and likewise the other Planets were, at their first creating. Also of the beginning of yeares, and the course of times.

HE learned Philosophers say, that men are naturally curious & couetous of knowledge. Moreover, such is the zeale of their affection in this case, and the bent of humane vnderstanding so full of strange questionings, as they cannot content themselves to know such things as they may with some ease comprehend onely: but ouer and beside, they are scrupulous and searching (through bold presumption) to know such causes as are very hard, and almost impossible. Nor hath this painefull desire bene altogether fruitlesse and vaine, though many times it fayled, and came farre short of expectation: because by contemplation and continuall study, they haue found out such matters, as seemed before vtterly impossible and supernaturall, or that they should any way be attained vnto by the capacity of men. As namely, the motions of the Heauens; the course of the Planets and other Starres, with their feuerall influences and power, and the like things beside: among which is comprized my present intended argument, and what in this Chapter I purposed to discourse on, to wit: how to know the beginning of times & yeares; and on what day the world began, or to speake better; when, or in what season God created the world; when began the year and times; and where was the Sun, or where God placed it at first, when hee began his courle; & likewise the Moone, with the other Starres and Planets.

Aristotle did little care for these questions, and infinite other Philosophers beside, who thorow defect of the light of faith, did verily beleue, that the world was eternall, without any beginning or ending. But such as haue declared themselves not to be ignorant in these things, but verily beleued the beginning of times, seeme to stand diuided betwene two opinions. There are some among them, who say, that in the instant when the world was created, the Sunne was found to be in the first point of Aries, or the Ramme, which is in the Equinoctiall of Summer, the time coming then to the eleuenth day of March. Others say, that the world began, the Sunne then being in the first point of Libra, or the Balances, which is the other Equinoctiall of Winter, commonly happening in these our dayes, on the thirteenth or fourteenth day of September. Of this opinion were diuers Egyptians, Arabes, and Greekes likewise; according as Lincolniensis reporteth, in a Treatise of the world, which he wrote to Pope Clement; & Vincenius in his historicall Mirrour.

Such as haue followed this opinion, alledged a reason for it, which (in my iudgement) is very weak, and of no force. For they say, that then the principall fruites of the earth were fully ripe, and in the very best of their fauour, because it was most requisite, that (at the beginning) the earth should present it selfe in the height of perfection. To this purpose, they produce authority out of Deuteronomy, where it is said; That God made all things perfect and complete. There are some others, who affirme, that the entrance of times, and of yeares, was on the very greatest day of all other; which was then, when the Sunne entred into the signe of Cancer, as now it is the eleuenth or twelfth day of Iune. Julius Firmicus, an ancient Author, and of great authority in Astrology, in the beginning of his third Booke, which he wrote of the worlds creation, saith: That when the world began, the Sunne was in the first degree of the signe Leo; which is the signe wherein hee hath most dominion, because it is called the house of the Sunne: the like he saith, in discovering the other Planets, by their order and degrees.

But that which relistheth of most reason in all these opinions, and appeareth most conformable to truth, is; that when both time and the heavens began to be mooved; the Sun was in the first point of Aries, which is (with vs) in March, and at which time is the entrance of Summer. This is affirmed (beside all other reasons that we can alledge) by the greater part of Historians, as well Christians as Heathens; among whom are S. Hierome, S. Ambrose, S. Basilie, and others, who doe all maintaine, that the beginning of the world, and likewise of the yeare, was in the Equinoctiall of four Summer. And although there may appeare some difference among them, because some will haue the worlds beginning to be in March, and others in April: it may well be endured, for they all agree together, that it was in the Equinoctiall, which now is in March. Notwithstanding, as wee haue formerly affirmed, the Equinoctiall is not alwaies time or constant for Iesus Christ suffered his passion on the five and twentieth day of March, which was then the Equinoctiall, and now it is the eleuenth day of the same Moneth, whereby may well be presumed, that heerefore it was in April.

For this cause, some would haue April to be the first Moneth, and others March; yet notwithstanding, they all say, that when the Sun enters into the first point or degree of Aries, then is the Equinoctiall. This opinion is grounded on the Scripture, especially on the twelfth Chapter of Exodus, where it is said: The Moneth Nisan (which is March with vs) is the entrance to your yeare. Vincentius, in the beginning of his historicall Mirrour, saith: The Hebrewes began their yeare in March, because in the like Moneth was the Equinoctiall, when as the world began. This opinion was likewise helde by some of the Gentiles; as Elpaeus in his Astrologialong

Tractise, where he saith: The Chaldeans being very great Astrologers, believed likewise, that on the first day when the world was made, the Sunne entered into the first point or degree of Aries: and this is also confidently maintained, by the most part of Astrologers, both ancient and moderne. Therefore when the Sunne came in his course thither, or to that Signe; then was the beginning of the yeare, and thence ensued the principall or beginning day. For it is a matter most manifest, that the first day wherein the world began to be made, was also made the first day of the yeare: considering, that till then, there was neither time nor yeare. And therefore the signe of Aries is reckoned (about all the rest) to be the first in order among the twelue signes.

Now, as when we come to judge of the revolution of yeares, and things to happen therein, as of necessity we must equal the figures, by the beginning of the world; even so it is as easie to proue, that God placed the Sunne in the first degree of this signe, at the beginning and creation of the world. And this may be conjectured without any great labor, by our professed in the sixth Chapter of the seventh Booke, in our first Volume, where discoursing on the time and day, when as our blessed Lord and Saviour suffered; it is affirmed, that the Sunne was in the selfe same at the creation, as it was when the great Sunne of righteousness made the regeneration of the world, suffering death and passion in humane flesh, and that happened (as is formerly saide) in the Equinoctiall of Summer, which is an argument and presupposition, that even so hee placed it, when as he created it.

Moreover, it appeareth very credible, that it was so made, because such as know any thing in Astrology, and in the Sphere, do well perceiue, that the Sunne entering into the degree of this signe, and making his revolution by the space of a whole day: there is not any part of the world, which he leaueth vnlookt on with his bright splendour. And this he doth not in any other place of the Zodiacus, because in what place elsse hee is; there are some parts of the earth where he is not seene that day; but being in this first degree, as we haue saide, there is no place where he is vnseene, as hee walketh along in his diurnal course, or dayes journey. And it standeth with good reason and conueniency, that the first day of the Sunnes setting forth on progrease, hee should begin in such a place, where hee may best visite the whole world with his beames. And that it should bee in the signe Aries, rather then in that of Libra, appeareth plainly by our former relation, that on the day of our Lords passion, the Sunne was in the selfe same place, therefore there is some particular power in this signe.

Holding this opinion then for the most certaine, I say, that the reason alledged, by such as would haue the beginning of the world, to bee in the Equinoctiall of September, is very weak. For it is not sufficient to say, that all the fruites were ripe and mellow; in regard it is no vniuersall rule: for when the fruites are ripened towards the Northerne latitude, they are not so in the South, but wholly quite contrary. And therefore I craue no helpe of their reason, who say, that the Equinoctiall of March (already proued) is the beginning of the Spring-time, & of flowers ouer all the earth, all things being then in procreation; for if with vs it be the beginning of Spring-time, it is then winter in the Southerne parts. Let our reasons then suffice, & the authority of such worthy men, to cleare all other doubt or scruple; although the Romane yeare, now in vse, seemeth to begin the first day of Ianuary: for this matter came so to passe, onely through the superstitious deuotion, which the Gentiles had to their God Ianus, coueting to haue their yeare beginne with his name, as the Christians began theirs with the Natiuity of Iesus Christ, albeit the yeare doth not then begin.

The Romanes (in like manner) began their yeare in March, according as Marcus Varro writeth, and Macrobius in his first Booke, Quid in his Fastis, and many more beside. Also God shewed his immense goodnesse, in placing our first Parents Adam and Eue, in the Northerne parts of the earth, when he banished them out of the terrestiall Paradise; & that the first season which they saw in this world, was the Spring-time, finding the earth to be Greene & flowry, with the ayre milde, sweete and temperate, which was done for the consolation of their misery and nakednesse, and so they could not haue found it, if it had not bene Spring-time.

This matter being sufficiently proued, wee must know that there are other Planets, and especially the Moone, as being one of the principall, whom some do maintaine, to be set by God in conjunction with the Sunne, on the first day of her creation. Others say, that she was in opposition, and at the full. Saint Augustine reporteth these two opinions, in his booke vpon Genesis, the first Chapter, saying further, that such as maintaine her to bee in opposition, and at the full; do alledge for their reason; that it was very inconuenient, that at her beginning, God should create her any way defectuous. Others vudge the contrary, and say it is more credible; that she began her first day in conjunction, increasing in her age answerable to our account. But to quic this controuersie, I say (in mine opinion) that God at such time as he created her, made her at full, and in opposition of the Sun. And it seemeth, that this iudgement is the most received, as of S. Augustine, in the place before alledged, and Isidore on the twelfth Chapter of Exodus, saith the very same. This appeareth conformable to holy Scripture, where it is saide: God made two great lights, the greater light to gouerne the day, and the lesser light to illuminate the night. Now in the very same instant as the Sunne began his light, hee gaue splendour to the moity of the world, because in that moity or halfe part, hee made day. But the other moity could haue no light of the Sunne, by reason of the earths shadow; therefore it seemeth consonant to reason, that in the other moity of the earth, where it was night, the Moone should extend her office of shining. For like as they were both created at one instant; so should they both fulfill their offices in one and the same instant, and the one to gouerne the day, as the other the night, according to the words of the Text, verified apparently, that the world was wholly lightened at one & the same time.

Contrariwise, if the Moone had bene in conjunction, the light common and vniuersall could not haue come till fiftene dayes after; and beside, three or foure dayes must needs haue passed, before she could lend any light to the earth, and that must be but very little too, even as when we see her to be but four or five daies old. Therefore it was very conveneable, that these two famous lights should illuminate the earth at one instant. Ifay moreover, that the Moone then being in opposition with the Sunne, these must needs have her being on the other side of the signe Libra, for in her so being, she performd the same day the effects as the Sunne did, illuminating all the world, by her measurable pace of that dayes iourney; which else she could not have done, if she had bin in any other place of the Zodiacque. Heereby it appeareth, that this opinion is the most likely; although Julius Firmicus will needs say, that the Moone (at the time of her creation) had her first seating in the fifteenth degree of the signe Cancer, where she affected most to be; & of this opinio is Macrobius in his first Booke of Scipios dreame.

As for the other Planets, it is very difficult to certifye them, and lesse profitable to know them: in which respect, I am willing to bestow the lesse paines on them. Neuerthelesse, Julius Firmicus, in his second Booke before alledged, is so bold as to name the places where each of them is seated, saying: Saturne should be in the signe Capricorne; Jupiter in Sagittarius; Mars in Scorpio; Venus in Libra; & Mars in Virgo; which are the signes wherein they have most power, and being signes likewise appointed to these Planets. Elipacius himselfe maintayneth as much, according as Ioannes Agricanus declareth in his Summary, entitled Agricano; with Macrobius in his fore-named Booke of Somno Scipionis, and thereunto consenteth Julius Firmicus, naming expressly the same signes, yet there are others, who have thought, that in the recited instant, all the Planets were found to be in conjunction with the Sunne. Gautierus the Monke, in his booke of the Ages of the world, saith, that the ancient Indians held firmly this opinion. As for my selfe, I am of the minde, that God did then set the Planets in such distant places, one from another, especially from the Sunne; that on such a chosen day, each one of them might illuminate the earth with his beames. VVhich could not be, they being in conjunction with the Sunne, because his presence, within any certaine space or proportion, so hindereth the greatest luster of their light, that they cannot bee discerned on the earth. Notwithstanding, being created according to the will of God; It sufficeth (saith Augustine) that they were made, in being perfected by the hand of God, whose workes (in what kinde soever they be) are perfect.

CHAP. XXXV.

That men may learne examples by Birdes, Flies, Wormes, and other Creatures, to leade the course of a vertuous life.

WE have already declared in our first Volume, how Beasts & Birds have enstructed men in a great part of the properties appertaining to Physicke, by purging and preserving themselves from harmes: now I am briefly to enreatre, how their example may be profitable to vs, both in body and soule. And vndoubtedly, whosoever wil consider & contemplate, on the nature & properties abiding in beasts, shall not only thence deriue good enstructions for life and safety of our humane bodies; but rules and examples beside, of good, commendable, and vertuous manners. VVhy do not men strue to purchase peace with their neighbours; seeing what concord and amity is among Beasts of all kindes, and how they keepe company, vnite themselves together in each kinde, and stand defensive one for another? VVhy shame they not to bee slothfull and negligent, perceiving & observing the care and sollicitude of the Ant, and after what manner shee maketh her provision in Summer for VVinter? VVhat vassals and subiects are they, that will not serue and honor their good Princes, noting with what loue and obedience poore little Bees serue and honour their King, and that which they doe for him beside? In which respect, such Common-weales as haue no Prince, but enjoy all things in common; may not they learne an example of living in peace and concord, by imitation of the poore Ants, who are so great in multitude, and yet preserve an order of peace & iustice among themselves? And why do not great Lords and Princes consider, what manufacture and clemency all of them are obliged vnto; when when they but behold the King of Bees, who doth no offence, neyther worketh any displeasure to the very meanest and slightest of his Subiects?

Our great Seigniors and high-minded men, may learne humility of the Camel, who falleth on his knees, to accept a heauy and ouer-chargeable burden. True and loyall married couples, may take example by the good custome among some Birds: especially Pigeons and Turtle-Doues, noting both in the Male and Female, that nothing but death can impeach their continuall companying, or hinder cyther from their first choyse. I finde written moreover, concerning Turtle-Doues, that the one dying, the other remaineth in the condition of a widdow, & finisheth the remainder of her life in widowhood. Saint Ambrose writeth, that widdowed women may learne chastity of the Turtle-Doue. As touching continency, all beasts (well nere) do lesse on vs therein: for after the Female hath conceiued, she neuer seeketh, or hath any appetite to the Male, till her full time be determined. They are likewise examples of temperance in all vices; because they eate no more then sufficeth to maintaine life, neyther sleepe they any more then necessity requirith.

To keepe our selues well and discreetly governed, the Peacocke may be our direction. For defence and maintenance of our houses, as also to liue liberally among our people; what better enstructer can we haue then the Cock? For he will part with the food out of his owne Beake, to giue it to his Hens, and when need requirith, he will expose himselfe to all perils in their defence. The great obligation, wherein children standeth bound to their Parents, and how they ought to serue and asist them, the Storke plainly witnesseth, by nourishing their aged Parents in their owne nests, as they fedde and maintayned them in their youth. Why should not men blush and be ashamed, to commit frailty and sinne through feare, knowing the inuincible courage of the Lyon? Faithfulnessse, friendship, and acknowledgement of receiued benefites, we are notably taught by the meere behaviour of Dogs; that neuer forget the Masters they haue serued, but continually loue them, neuer ceasing to bee thankfull for the poorest bread they eate. If a man would benefit himselfe by the vse of another mans goods, yet without any harme or injury done him; let him so carry himself in that case, as doth the little laboring Bee, who draweth honey out of the fairest flowers, and yet no wrong at all done to them.

VVhat meanes and order we should daily obserue, for healthfull conseruation of our liues, we are not to learne it of any one beast only, but of many, that know what food doth soonest offend them, as also in with-drawing from one place to another, according to the mutation of times. Moreover, they will liue in such soyles, as are answerable to their complexions and natures: excelling men herein as well as in all other things beside. VVhy should not men be absolutely learned, and ignorance in any thing quite removed from them, being endued with hearing and vnderstanding: considering that an Elephant learneth what soeuer is shewne and taught him; a Dog attaineth to many familiar qualities; and Birds can speake, being thereto enstructed? He that heareth the Nightingales sweet Songs, and some other melodious Birds; how can he but desire to sing musically? VVhy couet not men to be excellent builders, beholding the Swallowes skilfull construction; what arte shee declareth for her owne dwelling, and with what diversity of matter it is composed? VVhat better Geometry, then that of the Spider? VVhat better Astrologie, then that of the Ant, & likewise of a Fish (according to Galen) called Francospos, that hauing but one eye, yet looks continually vp to heauen? Haue men reason and iudgement, and yet are meere ignorant in these Artes?

How many other industrious and excellent perfections are in brute Beasts, which men either haue, or else may learne of them? Passages vnder ground, making of Caves in the earth, and knowledge how to dwell in them; came they not first from the Mole and Fox? There are certaine little VVormes, in Latine called Seres, that enstructed the meanes and manner to spin and make Silke. Next, the Spider taught how to spin thred for cloth, & so to make Nets, whereby to catch Birds. Men learned of Beasts to swim in the water, for there is no one of them but can do it; yet men cannot attaine thereto, but by practise and learning. What Physicall rules they haue taught men, and knowledge in the changes of weather, hath elle where bene handled; and yet notwithstanding we make such prouision of them, for supply of hunger and other necessities, as I know not how we could liue without their helpe. Our garments are made of theirs, and their fleish is our best Foode: both being brought home to vs from far remote countreyes, and whatsoeuer is needfull for vs, or else we send abroad to seeke after them. They labour, and make the earth playable for our vse; whence we get our bread, and the best fruites of sustentation, so that they are the principall maintenance of our liues. And although they are forelaboured, pursued, and euill entreated by the ipleness of men: yet are they still obedient, both knowing, following, and euermore dooing them seruice.

Come wee now to examples concerning the soule, as a matter of higher Argument, and much greater importance. Whence can a man cerue more worthie examples, both for vertues and good manners meete to bee in men, then from beasts? All those Vertues which naturall Philosophers hath perlwaded vnto vs, are grounded on the similitudes and parables of Beasts: Oratours serued their turnes with them; and all that haue spoken or written elegantly.

God and his Saints haue oftentimes in sacred Scripture, instructed and perswaded vs, by the properties & conditions of beasts, for the perfection of our liues: And the rules of vertue and ciuill manners do tell vs, that we should be wise like Serpents, and simple as Doves; milde, like Lambes, and strong and constant as Lyons. In like sort, by the example of brute beasts, and voide of reason; we are taught to become men reasonable, and spiritually affected. We finde many Offices & estates in the Church, applyed and figured by beastes, and according vnto their properties. By Oxen (according to S. Augustine, writing on the second Chapter of S. Iohn) such men are signified, as doe publish and preach the holie Scriptures: for they till and plough vnto the knotted furrowes of our soules, sowing therein the seedes of Gods most glorious word.

Saint Paule, and Salomon in his Prouerbes doeth say; Thou shalt not muzzle the mouth of the Ox that laboureth, Rom. 9. verse 7. Proverb. 12. chap. 14. The holy Doctors and Preachers of the Church, that with Doctrine and good Lawes doe gouerne and defend it, are termed Dogs. Saint Gregorie speaks it on the wordes of Iob: Quorum non dignabar patres ponere cum canibus gregis mei. The same Saint Gregorie, inuitheth men vnto a contemplatiue kinde of life, by the imitation of Goats, that alwayes climbe vp to high places, spending there their time in contemplation as it were: the wordes in Leuiticus seem his motive thereto, Leuitic. chapt. 12. verse 12. Out of the Herd let the Goat be offered.

Moreouer hee sayth, that Preachers should imitate the Cocke; as grounding on the wordes of Iob, who sayde; Who hath giuen vnderstanding to the Cock? Adding withall, that (like vnto the Cocke) they proclaim (in the dunne darkeness of this life) the glorious light that is to come, and awake vs with their shrill voyces, out of sleepey finnes, saying with S. Paule, The night is past, and day approacheth. And againe, It is time for vs to arise from sleepe, looke abroad yee wit, and sinne not. Phil. 1. 12.

The Church her selfe, pure, holy, and immaculate, is compared to a Dove, as Salomon declareth in his Canticles, saying. Beholde, thou art faire as my Loue, thine eyes are like the Doves. And againe in another place: O my Loue, O my Dove. We see likewise, that of the foure Euangelists three are figured by three beastes. If I would continue longer on this argument, I could finde matter enough to discourse on. But about all other, that of our Saviour and Redeemer Iesus Christ, is the most notable, who would bee figured by a Beast, as Saint Iohn speaketh in his Apocalypse, chapt. 7. verse 14. The Lion of the Tribe of Iudah hath bene victorious. And David sayeth in his Psalmes, Rouze thee like a Lion: and so in many other places, which were too long to rehearse. Beside, in S. Mathew, he teacheth himselfe a Hen, saying: O Ierusalem, Ierusalem how often would I haue gathered thee & thy children together, as the Hen gathereth hir Chickens vnder her wings, and ye would not. Seeing Christ works compared to the properties in beastes.

Man more of familie vnto God then all his other creatures.

Some men do giue worse examples to men, then brute beastes can do.

Seeing then, that Christ compareth his workes to the properties of Beastes; men may doe well to receiue instruction from them, in leading a good and holie life. And contrary wise, what shame and confusion is it to vs, to see and know, that all kinde of Beasts do follow their nature perfectly, and men (onely made reasonable) vse their owne so badly, abusing that super-excellent gift very vilely. For, he that ought most to honor God, doth most of all offend him, and farre beyonde all other creatures, dayly peruertering and adulterating his workes. So that there are some beastes, of whome men may learne much better examples, then from some kind of men among whom they liue. For they haue more apprehension of iustice, and offend farre lesse, then men that know what is their dutie, and yet do it not. And therefore, God deliuereth it by the mouth of the Prophet Esay: The Ox knoweth his Master, and the Ass his Cribbe; but Israel knoweth him not, neither will his people vnderstand him.

CHAP. XXXVI.

Of neglect in Martiall Discipline: and of an Army of Christians, that lost all their liues thorow drunkennesse, and want of following such courses, as are to be obserued in Military affayres.

In the eight chapt. of the 1 Booke in the 64 volume.

EE haue already declared, how Bayan Chinsan, Lieutenant to the Tartarian Emperor Cublay, and director of his Military forces, tooke 12 Cities and Townes (by assault) at his first annuall, for conquering the great Province of Maugy, before all the rest would yeeld themselves tributary. One of them was vtterly ruined to the very foundation and worke vfed then any other known to be, during the Empire of the said Cublay, which was about fixe and thirtie yeares. This City being called Cinginguy, was the second in wealth, greatnesse, and multitude of inhabitants, in all the rich Kingdome of Maugy, and the reason why it was wholly ruined, followeth thus.

Bayan Chinsan, pursuing his Conquests, was much whittood by a strong Cattle, builded vpon a small mountaine, very potent by naturall situation, and artificiall construction. For therein continued a powerfull Garrison, that preyed with great advantages on his Army, passing along the foote of that Mountain: and this was the reason that he would proceed on no further, till hee had deuised some better correspondencie from the people of this Garrison. And yet he durst promise to himselfe, that (within some small distance of time) he should preuaile against them, as afterwarde it prouoed true indeed.

In the meane while, and at the selfsame instant, the explorators or scouts were come backe againe, which he had sent to surueigh the estate of Cinginguy, who made knowne vnto him, that the people of the City appeared, to knowe nothing of his coming, neyther stood vpon any guard, or preparation to expect a besieging. This was the cause (to the end hee might the better prevent them) that hee forthwith dispatched a Squadron of thirty thousand men, armed at the highest, and very good soldiers, all of them being Christians (which came among the Tartarian Idolaters in open liberty, as the Iews haue done from all times of antiquity, and daily yet doe) to possesse themselves of the Citie, and hinder the entrance of any succour, either by way of power or victuals, assuring them likewise, that he would follow them with all convenient speede that might be.

This warlike band of Christians, made such speedy diligence, that (within three dayes) they arrived before the City, and lodged themselves on the Ditches side, before any in the City took notice thereof. They made the escalado in so many feuerall places, and disposed their Archers so conueniently, as no one durst peep out at any of the battlements, or else be scene vpon the wals. At length, the besieged (imagining the army that had thus engirt the, was of far greater strength then it was indeed) being overcome with feare, rendered themselves to the discretion & mercy of the assaillants, to the end, they might finde the more humanity at their handes. The gates being set open, the Christians entred, taking vp their lodgings in feuerall

all houses. And these indiscreet conquerors, without any other care of military discipline, finding the City well furnished with victuals of all kinds, & whatsoever was needfull for the life of man, but (above all) plenty of rich wines; fell to making themselves good cheere, and drinking hard, after the German manner, till they fell asleepe with the pots in their hands.

Heereupon the Inhabitants finding themselves deceived, in yeelding to so small a number of people, that had no better vnderstanding in actions of warre, neither knew how to vse the fortune so fairly befall them; began to consult heereon with themselves, and how to worke their deliuerance with as much speed, as they were ouer-hasty in losing their liberty. The Christians continuing in this drunken behauiour, without any feare at all of the Inhabitants, that lodged the Soldiers in their houses, though not halfe so many as they were able to receiue: in one night it was fully concluded, that euery host should kill his guest, and so it was accordingly performed. Afterward, they threw their bodies into the great Riuer, which runneth through the middle of the City, saying: These are the renegades and faith-breakers, men of Christian Religion, of whom the Emperour Cublay made no great account, but suffered them to carry crosses in their Ensigns, to shame them the more in their least ill demeanour.

Bayan Chinlan having surprized the foresaid castle, commanded the Captains to be hang'd, and the castle quite ruined; but pardoned all the Soldiers, iourneying afterward on to Cinguinguy: but within less then two dayes iourney, hee heard how all his men were slaine, therefore hee brought a strong siege before the City. The Inhabitants were not a little amazed, beholding so powerfull an Army to beset them, and conducted by a man so highly renowned: and therefore desired to haue a Parlee before any farther proceeding, which accordingly was granted. The summe of the Oration propounded by the Deputies, was thus. That they could not deny a manifest truth, but that they had slaine a number of runnagates, masterlesse men, seeming to haue no faith or honesty, neither shewing any open appearance of their power; but suddenly surprized their City. Moreover, that they were all Christians, more addicted vnto wine and gourmandizing, then any respect of valour or manhood: in which regard, his losse was little or none at all, by the deferred overthrow of such carelesse people, and they humbly desired pardon, if in this case they had transgressed.

Bayan returned his answer brauely and succinctly, saying. His men were warriors, that had no other direction in this businesse, but command from his mouth onely, and he had beene well informed, that they tooke the City by faire order of warre; without offending any one in their goods, or violence offered to wifes or mayds, or disarming any Inhabitant, but suffering them to continue in their wonted liberty. And in being Christians, they did not therefore deserue death, because he could as well tollerate them, as his Master the Emperour, who not onely suffered them to liue in all his Countries, without the least injury done vnto them; but hauing conquered kingdomes, wholly Christian, he neuer inuaded any matter touching their Religion. Moreover, the greater part of Officers in his Court, and the very worthiest of his warriors, were all Christians, being men more faithful, and of better conseruation, then any other Religion whatsoever.

As for their neglect in martiall discipline, he did not allow it in them, but confessed, that they deserued death therein, which (doubtlesse) himselfe would haue inflicted on them; condemning them for beeing so forward, in executing any authority belonging onely to him. For which boldnesse (with an absolute denyall of pardon or fauour) he vowed to be reuenged on the men of Cinguinguy; because (against all fidelity) they had slaine his men, and declared monstrous ingratitude for their extraordinary manuetude, and thence hee pretended to deriue his reason.

Having thus spoken, hee would see them no more, but in this rough manner dismissed them. About an houre after, he caused his Rammes and other Engines of battery, to be mounted, for destruction of the walles and houses, and within few dayes after, tooke the City, with-without any great resistance, putting all the men to the sword, that were about 14 yeares of age. Women and maides went whither themselves pleased; but for their children, they were sold at the Out-cry, to such as would giue the most mony for them: for there were certaine merchants of Bagdad, which followed the army that did trafficke onely in such kinde of merchandise, and so do yet to this day. Afterward, vittails beginning to faile, & the warlike enemy, hauing emptied the citie of all the wealth; he commanded it to be set on fire, and that the Army should not boudge thence, vntill it were intirely consumed.

Wine and gourmandizing more respected then manhood.

This City was seated on a goodly riuer, large and nauigable, whereby, the comerce which it made with other countries, returned infinite profit and wealth. In it was made the richest & fairest works wrought with the needle, both in cloth of gold and siluer, as no other City in the world beside had the like. There were also made sumptuous vessells (for all vses) both of gold and siluer, by most admirable cunning, and in great plenty: besides costly clothes of fine Cotten, gold, siluer and like. In briefe, it was the second or third City (as then) in all those parts: which was thus destroyed, thorow the drunkennes of Neistorian Christians, and by the perfidy of the Inhabitants, euen as Troyan Ilum by luxurie & whoredome, since when it was neuer rebuild'd, or inhabited. The ruines thereof may be seene to this day, whereat full many haue stood amazed, it being situated in so potent a territory: but it was thought to proceed from the iust displeasure of God, and for the bloody massacre of so many Christians.

We may now come homeward, and nearer to our selues, and speake of the like faults, as were among these Tartarian Christians, thorow lacke of knowledge, how to make vse of victorie: As not long since was seene in Francke, in the first battaile giuen neere to Dreux, betweene the French Protestants and the Catholics, in the yeare of our Lord God, 1562. vnder Charles the ninth. The Prince of Conde, being chief of those Protestants, overthrew with his horsemen (wherein he was strongest) a great part of the royall Catholique Armie, whereof Anne de Montmorancy, Constable, was commanded, putting the 20000 to flight, and the sayde Constable taken prisoner. Heereupon the Protestants becoming insolent, and vterly vnmindfull of Militarie Discipline: left their ranks, brake their order, gaue the chase, pursuing after certayne runaways, and, before they had fully conquered all their enemies; they beganne to gape after pillage with the Smart-ruters and Lance-knights. During this disorder, Monsieur de Guise, a most wise and valiant Capitaine, having yet left him a bond of braue men, beganne to set vpon those negligent fellows with his troups, and running on the Protestants (who imagined they had the whole victorie, which they knew not how to holde) got the better of them, and tooke their Leader the Prince of Conde, becoming sole maister of the field. Thus, not knowing how to vse Militarie Discipline, by breaking their ranks, following the chase, and scraping for pillage, when they had gotten the better of their enemies safe and soundly, yet not hauing wholly overcome them: did they not declare themselves very vnadvised, becoming guilty and well worthie of death: I am perswaded, that all good warriors are of that opinion. And so it happened, for thus the Protestant Armie was vterly foyled, which was (wellneare) equal in great Capraines and good men to the Royall. But such losse doth almost daily happen, where Military discipline is not obserued.

They that (at so cheape a rate) tooke the City of Cinguinguy, should haue disarmed the Citizens, seized the strongest places into their owne power, planted Courts of guard in all the most frequented parts of the City, imprisoned the chiefe persons, expelled out of the City, a greater part of the youthfull and most forward men, if they would not kill them, without vsing such courtesie after conquest. In so doing, they had kept Martiall discipline on foote, and auoyded the losse of their owne liues, besides the reproach, to their great infamie. But ouer and aboue all the rest, they should (as much as in them lay) haue abstayned from wine: For there is not anie thing, that sooner bereauech a

CHAP. XXXVII.

Of the miserable ends, and other strange traueses, endured by diuerse Kings, Emperours, Dukes, and other great Princes, within an hundred and fiftie yeares of these times.

According to the imitation of Petrarke, I am desirous to describe the vnhappie ends, and other aduersities, happening vnto diuerse famous Christian Princes; as Kings, Emperours, Dukes, Popes, and other Prelates, liuing within an hundred and fiftie yeares of these dayes, some of them being familiarly knowne to vs; omitting such as the Greekes and Latines haue set downe in their writings, because I would not be troublesome to the Reader, by repeating Histories else-where to be read, (and perhaps) knowne to him before. And if it come to passe, that any worthe person, constituted in some eminent dignitie, chauce to feele the sickenesse of Fortune, by such occasions as shall ensue in this Chapter; let him take comfort, and forsake all sadnesse; for it is no meane consolation to the miserable, to haue store of companions ranked with them in their disasters.

We will begin then with a king of Bohemia named George, who liued in the yere 1466, who was reputed to be a man of great wisedome, and was elected (in sede vacante) or inter-regnum after the death of Adolfus, who died on the very day of his marriage, solemnized at Prage, the capitall citie of his Kingdome, hauing taken in marriage Madame Magdelen, daughter to Charles the seauenth King of Fraunce. This George hauing obtayned the amitie of many in the Kingdome, and making himselfe much feared beyond many other; was installed King, and gave his daughter in marriage, to Matthias King of Hungarie. In his elder yeres

Ferdinand King of the Romaines, brother to Charles the fifth, Emperour, possessed himselfe of his Kingdome, he holding then but a small portion thereof, because hee was molested many yeares before, by the Kings of Poland, Hungaria, and some Emperours, by the solicitation of Pope Paule, the second, for fauouring of the Infantes Doctrine, in which cause he was so vehemently afflicted, that it shortened his dayes. He dyed much bemoaned; for in his youth, and while his body held the strongest vigour, hee performed many notable and worthe exploits in warres against the Turkes.

Another Prince, some short while before, Charles Bourgoyn, Sonne vnto Phillip, one of the most potent and vndoubted Christian Princes, that was in those times, being in the yere of our Lord God, one thousand four hundred and two and twenty. Hee vnderstoode himselfe to be so rich and mighty, that hee pretended to create himselfe a King. But Fredericke the third of that name, being then Emperour, would not admit such an aduancement of his Countrey. His father left him great store of coyne, and many large reuenues of diuerse Seigneuries: hauing lent foure hundred thousand crownes to Charles the seauenth, holding all the Townes and Countries, on, and about the river of Somme; as Amiens, Abeville, Saint Quintin, and others beside. Hee held also (by way of mortgage) of Stysmund, Archduke of Austria in Germany, the lands to him belonging, both on this side, and beyond the River of Rheine, and the Earledome of Ferrat, for three score and tenne thousand florins: whereby ensued, the Governour which hee placed ouer those Lands, was the cause of diuerse mishappes and ignominies, that followed vpon him very suddenly.

Moreouer, hee was Lord of fouretee goodly Prouinces; as the Duchy of Burgogne, the French Court, of Flanders, Brabant, Holland, Zeland, Friesland, Hennault, Artois, Namures, Guelldres, Luxembourg, Vtrecht, and Embourg, all which Countries valewed well a large Kingdome.

wealth, he became so proude, that hee durst vnder take the boldnesse (vpon some small suspition conceiued, that Lewes the cleuenth King of Fraunce, had intelligence with them of Liege, being then his enemies) to imprison the sayd King in the great Tower of Peronne, where they met both together, vnder the colour of friendly conference. And there he made him condiscend to follow him (like a water Spaniell) in the warres, which hee had against the Inhabitants of Liege, euen vntill hee had ruined theyr Townes, and all the Countrey: Heere seated Edward King of England, being expelled from his Kingdome; giuing him mony, and an armie by Sea, to bring it to passe.

Afterward, hee would needes coape in Armes with the Emperour, and (almost) all the Princes of Germanie: besieging the Towne of Muz (which is not farre from Coloigne) for the space of a yere, but all in vaine. Every one reputed him to be great, happy, and inuincible: but we shalosome perceiue the contrary, and how (by little and little) hee trode the path to his owne ruine, as briefly I purpose to relate. It fortuned, that this Charles had infatuated as Governour ouer those Lands, which he held mortgaged by the Arch-Duke of Austria: a thiefe and tyrant, named Peter de Hagenbach, Counte of Thierstein, who (so much as in him lay) tormented both them of Mulhouse, and the Switzers: whereupon, they took him prisoner, and hauing proceeded against him by due forme of Lawe: they degraded him of his order of Knight-hood, and afterwards beheaded him in the open Market place.

Next, the seauenty thousand florins were assigned ouer to a Banquer of Basil, and to the Duke it was signified by an Herald, that hee held no more right ouer the Countrey, then what the Arch-Duke had mortgaged vnto him. Hereat hee grew verie highly offended, and sought all meanes how to be reuenged; especially for the death of Peter de Hagenbach. Then hee assembled an Armie, being assisted by the Duke of Milaine, and the Dutchesse of Sauoy; taking Lansanna, which was confedered with the Switzers.

Thence hee went and besieged the Towne and Castle of Granson, soliciting them to yeeld themselves. They hauing humbly submitted themselves, the Duke commaunded foure score of them to be hanged, and an hundred more to be drowned, in the neerest Lake adjoining to the Cittie. This inhumane act did not onely moue the Switzers; but likewise them of high Germanie, who with an Army belonging to the Arch-Duke of Austria (whereof Harman d'Entingen was the conductor) expelled the Duke from Granson, and slew a great part of his Army; taking beside, his Artilletrie and furniture for warre, which was great and rich. Afterward, taking downe all their friends, which the Duke had caused to bee hanged, in their places they hung vp as many Bourgoyns.

The moueables of his house, which hee would alwayes haue carried along with him, were of extraordinary valew: for among them were so many rich tents, all of costly silkes, and vessels both of golde and siluer, embellished with store of precious stones, that it would require too long time to recount them. There were some Switzers, that sold great store of siluer plates, for two great blankes a peece, not knowing their valew and estimation. A Diamond, thought to bee the greatest and clearest that those times afforded; and, esteemed more worth then fiftie thousand crownes, was sold for twelue Sols. A faire bathing tubbe of siluer, richly gilded, wherein he used to bathe himselfe, was sold for foure pounds. I cannot heere set downe, the rich clothes of Tapistrie, wrought with vauable workes of silke and golde, for him to treade on wherefoeuer hee went. To be brieue, the Reader would be wearied in rehearfall of the incredible wealth and riches, which this vnfortunate prince lost, and whereof his greatest enemies made their triumph.

Then falling into a long and greuous sickenesse, at the length hee recovered, and taking courage to himselfe againe, hee returned the second time against the power and force of the Switzers. Hee had formerly taken Nand from Renè, Duke of Lorraine; wherefore the sayde Duke of Lorraine forthwith ioyned his forces with the Switzers.

The Duke of Bourgogne being before Moras, the people of the Towne yllsd forth, and so beset the army of the Bourguignons, that twenty thousand (according to Fasciculus Temporum) or twentie two thousand, and seven hundred (according to the Mother of Histories) were ther slain. The spoyle was left to the Duke of Lorraine, who likewise recouered Nancy againe afterward.

A third time likewise, the Duke of Bourgogne, being not a little offended, that he should be vanquished by so mean a Prince as the Duke of Lorraine, and hee recouering the Towne of Nancy; returned with fresh forces, and besiedged it againe with fourteen thousand able fighting men, beside some other bandes in expectation. The Duke of Bourgogne was discomfited, and all his army; but by no means could his body be found. The Bourguignons could not be perfwaded that hee was slaine; but hauing escaped from the field, hee had cryed himselfe into Germanie, where he had vowed to liue in seven years penitence.

There were some Bourguignons, that made sale of precious Stones, Horses, and such like things, to be paid againe vpon his returne, and namely to Brachelles, in the Diocesse of Spire. There was a poore Begger, imagined to bee the Duke of Bourgogne, because he liued in the like estate of penance; which made verie many traualle to see him, and bestow very liberrall almes on him. Naucler reporteth, that he saw the poore man begging in the same place. The King of France, hearing the Duke was dead, seized on Montdidier, Roye, Peronne, Abbeville, Montreuil, Arras, Hesdin, and the two Bourgognes, to win the Dutchy and Countie. The men of Gauins tooke his Daughter, that gouerned his estates very poorely, and married her as themselves pleased; she hauing pur to death the Chancellor, and other of his best officers. Thus you see how this great Prince ended his life, accompanied with many misfortunes.

Vladislaus, King of Poland, a young and gallant Prince, was called by the Hungarians to be their King, in the yeare 1440. He conceiued such glory by seeing himselfe King of two such mighty Kingdoms, that he thought himselfe to be invincible. Whereupon, being desirous to imploy his valour in warre against some enemy, that might take notice of his courage and power; he brake faith and Truce, which the Hungars had made with the Turk the yeare before. In the first battayle hee gaue, he was quickly slayne, and hadde but a short enioying of his two Kingdoms; for, thorow the inconstancie of Fortune, his pretended felicity was soon cut off, and all his supposed power utterly quailed.

The Emperor of the East, Constantine Paleologus, some fifteen yeares after, went to keepe company with this young King Vladislaus, in the other world. For Constantinople, the Metropolitane Cittie of his Empire, was besiedged and taken by Mahomet the second, sir-named the Great, thorow the negligence and treacherie of John Iustinian of Geneway; Mahomet hauing 300000. able fighting men, and four hundred Cannons, and the sledge continued threecore dayes. The Emperour (in flight) was met withall, and murdered neere vnto the Gate: his head being carried vpon a Laurels point, and so conueighed quite thorow the Cittie, while his body was trodden vnto dirt with their feete. Mahomet also cauted a Crucifixe to bee erected, and wrote vpon it (in scornfull derision) these words: This is the GOD of the Christians: commanding likewise, that euery one should cast dung and filthe vpon the sayre image.

The wife to the Emperour, with her daughters, and the very Noblest Ladies attending on them, were brought before Mahomet; and after all reproach was done vnto them, euen the verie greatest Villanies in the world, their bodies were hacked and hewne in peeces.

Some few dayes after, there was another King (but of three dayes standing) put to death likewise. VVhich I may by no means omit, because it was the forenamed John Iustinian the Genewefe, a traitorous Villaine. For hee had concluded with Mahomet, that if he would make him King, he would yeelde vp Constantinople, or be the meanes whereby hee should surprize it. Mahomet kept promise with him; for hee constituted him a King for three dayes space: and on the fourth day, hee commanded his head to bee smitten off. So sayeth Fasciculus Temporum; and that that these things happened in the yeare, one thousand foure hundred fifty three, about the Moneth of May.

I am sure few people are ignorant, in what Beds of state, the noble Kings of France vsd to take their rest, and vnder what rich Pauillions; yet the iniquity of our times hath bene such, that a Kings lodging hath bene more vile then a laxe. I speake of King Charles the eight of that name, who returning home to his kingdom, hauing bene in Italy, where hee conquered the kingdom of Naples, and the great Dukedomes of Calabria and Apulia, and wonne two famous battayles in those countries: vpon a Palme Sunday Eue, being the seuenth of Aprill, one thousand foure hundred ninety eight, leading his Queene by the hand, Anne of Britaigne, to see certaine Gentlemen play at the Tennis, in a Ditch belonging to the Castle of Amboise, entred into an olace, broken, vncovered Gallery, where he gaue his head a great blow against the upper part of the doore, albeit himselfe was but of lowe stature. Taking hold vpon some staves for his recovery, neere vnto a noysome place, where euery one that would (by custome) vsd to let passe their vrine, and other vnpleasantness of the body; he was contented to endure it, and stood there merrily discourfing with the Queene, and other noble persons there present, iudging who deferred best of them that played. Suddenly hee was overcome with a rheume or catarre, which taking from him all his strength and motion in euery part of his body, he was deperied likewise of his speech. This was perceived by all there-about him, and how he lay vpon the ground, in such a foule, stinking, and vncomely place; yet no one had the care, or subiect-like affection, to beare him thence to his royall bed, which was not about twenty paces off.

Hee languished in this manner, for the space of nine houres, and dyed there in that noysome place. Is it not a matter deseruing admiration, that so worthy a King should dye in so vile a place, being in his owne house, among his Officers, and many of the Nobility? Hee that was King of the sweete smelling Floure-de-Luce, to expire and end his dayes, not among heards or flowers of pleasing sauour: but in a place full of filth, then which, the whole world could yeelde no worse?

And to shew yee, that great Princes are as subiect to dye in battayles, as the simplest Souldiours: James, King of Scotter, may serue as an example, for hee was slayne in the field, with twoo Bithoppes, a great part of his Nobility, and many men of warre, that happened in the yeare of our Lord, one thousand five hundred and thirteene. And the yeare following, John d'Albrat king of Nauarre, lost his Kingdome, which was seized by Ferdinand King of Spain, because hee stood accursed by Pope inthus, for assisting King Lewes the twelfth, in warre against him; and aboue all, in the battaille of Raenma, which vntill this present his Successours neuer enioyed.

And Lewes Sforza, Duke of that rich and goodly Countrey of Milaine, was led prisoner into France, lying before the French to Nauarre, a City of his Dukedome; hee was confined to imprisonment, with the great Tower of Bourge, where (in great want and pouertie) hee finished his dayes.

What shall wee say of King Frances, first of that name, the Father of Learning, whose wisdom and magnanimitie, could not warrant him against the Ambulcades of Fortune, no more then any of them before remembered? Hee fell into the hands of Charles the fifth, Emperour, enuious of his greatness, and had bene his competitor in the Empire, opposing himselfe against many of his designes. Hee detained him prisoner about a yeare; during which time, hee had a most yrkesome discafe, which compelled him (for enioying of his liberty, to yeeld to many hard and grieuous conditions. As, to renounce and disclaime a multitude of rights, which hee pretended to many Dukedomes, Earledomes, and Kingdoms. Beside, hee gaue so great a quantity of money, as well for his expences, as discharge of martiall affaires, and his ransom withall, that his kingdom (for euery after) felt the smart thereof.

And not onely haue temporall Princes felt the rigour of inconstant Fortune; but Ecclesiasticall persons also, howsoever high and great degree they haue carried in the world. For in the year 1410. Pope Iohn was put in prison, flying from the Councell of Constance, and was gnen in guard to Lewis, Count Palatine, depouled from his Office, and one called Martine, fite of that name, feated in his place, being likewise very inhumanly entreated, for the space of three yeares. Afterwardes, by the humanity of the sayde Martine, he was set at liberty, and created Cardinall: whereby euery man may perceiue, how farre this Iohn was falne from his former degree.

In the year 1466. the byshop of Liege brother to the fore-named Duke of Bourgonie, by his wife, who was of the house of Bourbon: beside his Office, hee was a Prince of the Empire, a Lord both spirituall and temporal, and holding so great and rich a country, as that of Liege. He was taken prisoner by his subiectes, and a great fort of his friends and officers (among whom were ten Abbots and Prototonaries, or Canons, al of worthy houses) massacred in his presence, & himselfe kept prisoner for long time, and in great misery. At length hee got safely away, hauing (by money) won his Guards consent thereto.

At Florence, in the year 1448. the arch-Bishop of the sayde place, being clothed in his habitments of Priethood, and saying Masse, was suddenly surprized, and hangd or strangled at a Window, by the hands of the hangman; beside foure Cardinalls massacred by the people, and many other Ecclesiasticall perions beheaded.

And although Popes (as hath beene held) by their great and spirituall authority, might impose silence vpon Christian Princes, from vndertaking warres, but to keepe themselves in quiet, and likewise to take armes at his command, for the affairs of the Christian world; yet it came so to passe, that Pope Clement was taken prisoner, and locked vp seven months space in his castle of S. Angelo, kept by a guard of Spaniards and Germanes, and all of them Heretikes (wel-neere) about him. The City of Rome was greuously pilld, the Temples ransacked and prophaned; all which happened by the Souldiours of Charles the fift, a Catholike Emperour, in the year 1527.

After these men of Ecclesiasticall profession, it shall not differ much from our purpose, to conclude this chapter with the death of three potent Kings, that died all three in one day: to the end, wee may obserue how vnhappy it is for Princes, to thinke that they can well manage their affaires, in medling amongst the quarrels of other Princes, as pusillat euery way as themselves.

It came to passe, that two Princes contended for the kingdom of Fez and Marocco, situated in Barbarie of Affrica: the one of them being named Muley Mahumet, Nephew to the other that demanded these Realmes, called Abdelmelec. This Mahumet, who enioyed those Kingdomes ten or twelue yeares, was assailed three or foure times by Abdelmelec, hauing gotten assistance of the Turke, and wonne til the best in foure fought battailes. So that in the end, the inhabitants of Fez and Marocco receyued Abdelmelec: because Mahumet was a Tyrant, had very few friends, contemning euery one, and trusting altogether in his strength and Treasures, after all his losses in those former Battayles.

Sebastian, King of Portugall, made offer to him of his ayde and friendship, but hee refused it, vntill such time as hee had neyther place or person to retire vnto, nor any to follow him. Moreover, hee had spent the great heapes of money which hee had gotten together during his reigne, & now withdrew himselfe into the Mountaines, which are fixe Leagues off from the City of Marocco. There hee liued about feauen or eight months, like a theefe or robber, with some few companies of needie persons, which yet againe were cut off by the troopes of Abdelmelec; and Mahumet constrained to wander in the most vnacceffable places of the Mountaines, where hee endured a million of miseries, for the space of a whole yeare, lying in continuall feare and distrust, onely thorough his conceyued opinion, that hee should bee taken, or betrayed in his secret walks.

In breefe, necessity compelled him to repent his former denials, and to require the friendly succour offered him, by that braue King of Portugall. Sebastian: vnto whom hee sent an expresse Messenger, and (afterward) two of his Captaines. In the meane while, hee found the means to defend cent from the Mountaines, by wayes of little or no resort, and sought for his safety in Tanger, a Towne which the Portugales held in Affrica: where hee was well entertained by the Gouvernour, who knew some part of Sebastians minde towards him, and therefore furnished the two Captaines with well armed hostemen, for the dispatch of their Embassie in Portugall.

King Sebastian was very ioyfull to see these Ambassadors, because hee was naturally addicted to Armes, and the disposition of his person (joynd with his height of courage) incessantly spurred him on to this businesse. And in this respect, hee did but awaite some apt ouerture, for making his passage into Affrica, forming his pretext, vpon an earnest desire (as hee would always say) which hee had to aduance Christian Religion, and to extirpate that of the Mahumetists. Whereupon he suddenly promised (without any better consideration of the businesse) to succour Muley Mahumet, and to re-seate him in his kingdomes againe: hee made promise (I say) to such a one, as himselfe had before sought vnto, for this effect, by so large a passage over the Seas, and two severall times had beene misprized by him. The Pope, the King of Spaine, and many other great personages, could not dissuade him from this enterprize, but still hee persisted in treading the path vnto his owne death, death that followed him so hard at the heeles. So did hee set on into Affrica, with thirteene hundred sayle, as well of great as small Vesselles in that Fleete, the very fayrest and goodliest that had bene in those times. His Army was composed of Lance-knight, Spaniards, Italians, Portugales, and some small number of Affricane Moores, which took part with the Portugales, and thirty fixe Pieces of Ordnance for the field, well fitted and furnished. In all, there was not about fixteene thousand men of warre; setting aside the Soldiours boyes, Waggoners, Strumpets, Castadours, and other such like people very vnprofitable for the field.

Abdelmelec (wee may well perswade our selves) slept not all this while carelessly, for hee brought threecore thousand men to the field, as well Pykes as Harquebuziers, and twenty fixe Peeces of Orde

nance for the field, well appointed & gouerned by most expert men. Abdelmelec was very lorry, that hee should haue any conquest against Christians, in regard hee bare them much affection; not because hee feared the Portugales, but as foreseeing, that Barbary would proue the graue to the King of Portugall; who (indeede) was too weake to encounter with him, that went so farre beyond him in power. And in due consideration of the case, hee would oftentimes thus say to himselfe. King Sebastian should bee more resolute, then so vnaduisely to runne vpon his owne ruine: for he would take two kingdomes from me, which in right and iustice doe appertaine to me, and giue them vnto a Negro, wherein Christ endome can no way be eased or accommodated, neyther is it a thing which God (being iust) will permit.

The report and rumors spread abroad, of *Abdelmelec*s valiant carriage, was the cause that euery one came to offer him seruice and obeyance; and from euery Prouince they brought humgody presents and gifts of inestimable value. Many Christian Kings tooke pleasure in his friendship, and embraced him as their kinde well willer: esteeming themselves happy in his acquaintance. So that from diuers places, great store of Christians traiailed into his countreies, where they receiued gracious entertainment, and hee shewed them much better countenance, then to any other men that resorted thither, helping them liberally in their necessities. On the contrary part, Muley Mahumet oppressed the Christians all the time of his reigne, or else permitted, that all greefes and molestations should bee done vnto them: wherefore King Sebastian (in this respect) did greatly forget himselfe.

Now to deteine the Reader no longer in suspence, the two Armies disposed themselves for the encounter, and mette in a field, which contained about two miles in spaciousness, so euen and plaine, that there was not any tree, grasse, brambles, or stones, to offer the least hinderance. The Army of Sebastian, had the River of Arache behinde it, and that of Abdelmelec, the River of Alcassar. Muley Mahumet, for whom this Tragedy was to be acted, contrary to his oath and promise, did not bring with him any ayde for Sebastian, hauing

How the two Armies came to encounter in the field.

The treachery of Mahumet with King Sebastian.

having formerly made him beleene, that more then halfe the Army of Abdelmelec, would come and ioyne with him: which came not so to passe, for both the Armies meeting together, each side fought valiantly for it selfe, and the Christians sustained the worse. Muley Mahomet was one of the first that fled, shaping his course towards the riuer of Arache, where thinking to passe the foord, & it being choked with mud and slime, and his horse sticking fast therein, he gaue him the spur so furiously, that losing his stirrups, and not knowing how to helpe himselfe by swimming, hee fell into the water, and so was both drowned and suffocated in the myre. As for K. Sebastian, after that all his men were slain, or (at least) put to flight; he was asslaid on all sides (having but 7 or 8 knights with him) among whom also he was slaine, & lay on the ground among his owne people, that fought for their liues as much as men could do.

Now concerning Abdelmelec, some 8 or 10 dayes before the battaile, he fell into a greuous sicknesse, by eating a messie of milke in a neere adioyning Village, which so curdled on his stomacke, as hee could not compasse any auoydance of it. Neuerthelesse, on the day of battaile, hee would needs mount on horse-backe, and presente into the thickest of the fight, where finding himselfe more weake then euer; he was conuayed into his Litter, wherein he died immediately. But his death was very closely concealed, vntill the battaile was finished, and won on his side. Thus we may see, that (in one day) three Kings died by three severall meanes: for Muley Mahomet was drowned; Sebastian finished his life in fight; & Abdelmelec died by sickness. Their bodies also received divers sorts of handling or vlage: for the body of Mahomet was flayed, & the skinned stuffed with haire, was carried thorow all the Cities in the kingdomes of Fez & Marracco, in signe of open infamy. The body of the king of Portugall, Sebastian, was buried in the Town of Alcazarguier, without any Priest for the funerall obsequies, or any sheete to couer his body; but stark naked, according as it was found, when acknowledgement was taken of it among the other dead bodies: yet one of the groomes of his chamber, despoyling himselfe thereof, gaue him a poore paire of linnen breeches, & a most wretched doublet, which was no way disliked by the Mahometans. The fore-said Abdelmelec faued himselfe miraculously, for once whole Christian Army, either Soldiers or other, there did not escape 200. Abdelmelec was carried away dead in his Litter, royally apparelled, and more then twenty miles off from that place, hee was buried in a costly Sepulcher, among his Predecessors, and there was granted rents and reuenues, to diuers Priests of the Mahometane Religion, to pray to God (after their manner) for his soule.
